In purchasing a full and complete English Dictionary—a work to be used through life—it is important to "GET THE BEST." That Webster's Unabridged is such, appears, from the following

FACTS.

1. Its Definitions. In this, the leading object of a Dictionary, Dr. Webster stands confessed pre-eminent, compared with past or current English Lexicographers.

"Webster's is the BEST DEFINING Dictionary in the English language."—Horace Mann.

"THE ACCURACY AND EXTENT OF ITS DEFINITIONS."—WM. H. PRESCOTT, the Historian.

"In its Definitions—the object for which nine-tenths of our references to such a work are made—it stands without a rival in the annals of English lexicography."—London Dictionary.

"Webster's definitions are distinguished by clearness, terseness and completeness."—Dr. Ogilvie, Editor Imperial Dictionary.

2. Especially its Scientific definitions.—In the additions to the present Pictorial Edition, as well as the former ones, Prof. DANA, of Yale College—who takes high rank among American scholars—and other distinguished scientific men, have given their special attention to this department.

"I have been in the habit of using Dr. Webster's Dictionary for several years past, in preference to all others, because it far excels them all, so far as I know, in giving and defining scientific terms."

President Hitchcock.

"Another important feature of Webster is the introduction of the terms of science and art—distinguished in this from Todd's Johnson, in which thousands of such words are either not inserted, or are explained imperfectly."—London Imperial.

3. Its Etymology.—"The Etymological part surpasses anything that has been done for the English Language by any earlier laborers."

George Bancroft.

"Has entered more deeply into Etymological researches, and with greater success, than any of his predecessors. Indeed, he stands, on this ground, not only unrivaled but alone."—N. American Review.

"On the great head of Etymology, I know nothing to supply its place."

Daniel Webster.

4. Its Pronunciation. Avoiding the extreme peculiarities of Walker which have never found favor with the truly refined and educated, either in this country or Great Britain, and not attempting too much, by striving to indicate to the eye that which can only be learned through the ear,—

Prof. Goodrich says,—"After a diligent study of the subject for the last thirty years, after visiting England with a view to satisfy my own mind by inquiries on the spot, after a correspondence with distinguished English scholars continued down to the present time, I feel authorized to say, that the Revised Edition of Dr. Webster's Dictionary does exhibit the actual pronunciation of our language in England, as accurately and completely as any single Dictionary which has ever been published."

The London Imperial, the leading English Dictionary, follows Webster's system of notation entire. SMART, the most distinguished of living English Orthœpists, approves entirely of Prof. Goodrich's recent labors in this department, and communicated his views to the latter freely during their progress, while Prof. RUSSELL, the American elocutionist, declares the "critical judgment and refined taste of Prof. Goodrich have left little to be desired on this point."

5. Its Orthography.—The American public has with sufficient distinctness passed its verdict of approval upon Webster's system of orthography. Founded in reason, favoring the irresistible tendency of the language to simplicity, convenience and system, over TEN MILLIONS of School Books, THIRTY MILLIONS of Periodical issues, and innumerable volumes of miscellaneous works are published annually, following Webster as their general guide.

6. Its Vocabulary.—Nearly ten thousand new words are added to the present edition, collected with assiduous care by numerous laborers in this country and Great Britain since the issue of the former edition. It thus presents, it is confidently believed, a more complete vocabulary of the words of the living, current English Language, as now written, spoken and read, than can anywhere else be found. In the words now added take, as example, the following from a single page—Baby-jumper, Bucksheesh, Baggage-car, Bag-man, Bajocco, Balance-sheet, Ball-valve, Balzarine, Bandala, Bandoline, Banjo, Barege, Barmacine, Barology, Baracoon, Baston, Basque, Bat's-wing, (a form of gas-burner.) Many thousand words collected have been rejected, and to encumber the volume with useless compounds, self-explaining derivatives, or words entirely obsolete, and appropriate only in a glossary to works of remote origin, as Chaucer, &c., would be, either to enlarge the volume so as to preclude its popular use, or to cut short for this purpose the space better devoted to full and clear definitions.

7. Synonyms.—This feature occupies about 70 Quarto pages, and has over 2000 words; those of like meaning grouped together, are thus discriminated in their exact shades of likeness and difference, so as greatly to facilitate the precise and accurate use of language. Those conversant with Dr. Goodrich's former labors of this character, and examining the present Table in its fullness and completeness, will be prepared to find this feature of very great value. Not so complete and valuable a work in this department alone, it is believed, can elsewhere be found. We are having ample testimony of this.

8. Pictorial Illustrations.—These, 1500 in number, are of a size, character and finish, truly to illustrate the words and objects referred to, while more diminutive, or less perfect ones, must, evidently, very much fail of this object. The grouping of those of the same class together answers a very important purpose. As to the execution of the Illustrations, a distinguished English Publisher states that not more than one Artist in Great Britain equals these in the style of his work; and the Illinois Teacher declares, "We had the curiosity to examine with a magnifier some of these engravings, and compare them with the steel engravings on bank notes, and found the illustrations (of the Dictionary) often equally good, sometimes superior."

9. Citations.—Illustrative sentences from the best writers are often given, showing the use of the word in its connections.

10. The Tables.—Giving pronunciation of Scriptural Names, Greek and Latin Proper Names, Geographical Names, 8000 Distinguished Persons of Modern Times, Words and Phrases from the Latin, French, Italian and Spanish, Mottoes of the States, Abbreviations explained, Arbitrary Signs, peculiar use of Words and Terms in the Bible, &c., &c.

11. Its Cheapness.—No volume, it is believed, published in this country, beside the Bible, is sold so low in proportion to the quantity of matter it contains,—1750 large quarto pages, in fine, yet distinct type. Especially is this true of any copy-right work, when the vast amount of labor expended upon Webster's Dictionary is considered. In addition to Dr. Webster's own life-long toil, nearer twenty than ten years of earnest literary labor have since been devoted to its perfection.

12. Its general recognition, as a guide to the meaning, derivation, pronunciation and spelling of words, securing an acknowledged authority, and a common standard,—so that we can use language as others use it.

"If we would have uniformity we must adopt Webster, for he can not be displaced; but others may be."—Prof. Stowe.

AN AMERICAN DICTIONARY
 OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE
By Noah Webster.

There are three English Dictionaries, known to have been used by Abraham Lincoln, that have been preserved and are today in the possession of well known collectors.

While living in Indiana, Lincoln made use of a "Bailey's Etymological English Dictionary," owned by his uncle Mordecai Lincoln.

In Springfield, Illinois, he had two of his own, one being a Webster's Dictionary for Primary Schools" the issue of 1833, which he gave to a friend, with the remark that he "had a larger one."

At the White House, President Lincoln used a Webster's American Dictionary of the English Language, unabridged, bearing the date of issue 1858. Probably this was the "larger one" he had been using at Springfield. For complete description, see the Lambert sale catalog, page 16.

NATIONAL STANDARD.

Not only the reasonableness and utility of Webster's system, and the general progressive tendency of the language in that direction, but the test of experience, the general extent to which it already prevails, in the school book, periodical, and other popular issues of the country, justify the full belief that that system, in all its general features, is to become universally prevalent. We append four or five letters from as many leading School Book publishing houses, as showing (yet but very partially) the extent to which the Websterian orthography prevails:

To this aggregate of over SIX MILLIONS, we might add other series, Town and Holbrook's (Boston), Sargent's Readers (Boston), Webb's (New York), Goodrich's (Louisville, Ky.), to say nothing of the issues of Messrs. Mason Brothers, (the publishers of Webster's School Dictionaries,) of Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co., of Philadelphia, (publishers of Webster's Octavo and University Dictionaries, and the most extensive Book Jobbing House in the United States, if not in the world,) of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, (late publishers of Webster's Octavo Dictionary,) and others, and it would be entirely safe to say ten millions of volumes of School Books are annually published in the United States, recognizing Webster as their general standard of orthography, while not a single publishing house in the country, as far as we are aware, has ever publicly recognized any other Dictionary than Webster as its standard of Orthography, with the single exception of the publishers of another Dictionary. An extensive School Book publishing house, whose names are not mentioned above, of the highest standing as to sound judgment and business capacity and integrity, write us: "We have adopted Webster's Orthography in our books, both because it is already the most extensively adopted, and because we thought it sure to be still more so."

Take another pregnant fact:—we have before us the names of well-known PERIODICALS, issued in this country, avowing Webster in like manner as their guide, the authenticated annual issues of which are over thirty millions, and could we procure details from publishers of other periodicals, we believe it would aggregate double that number. Indeed, it is not too much to say, that the American press, as a whole, in the vastly preponderating extent of its issues, recognizes Webster as its general standard on this point. We are sure, too, that instead of creating confusion, and discord, and diversity, that system has done and is doing more to secure uniformity of usage, and a consistent system, than all other causes combined.

Springfield, 1860. G. & C. MERRIAM.

"The eighty pages of Illustrations, comparable in fineness to those of Bank Notes, are worth the price of the Book."—Ch. Herald.

Recommendations from Presidents of Colleges.

Within the last few weeks the Publishers have received flattering testimonials of the merits of this edition from nearly thirty Presidents of as many of the leading Colleges of the United States. Among them are from Presidents Frelinghuysen of Rutgers, Walker of Harvard, Hopkins of Williams, Stearns of Amherst, Cummings of Middletown, Nott of Union, Wayland of Providence, Jackson of Hobart, Woods of Brunswick, Lord of Dartmouth, Pease of Burlington, Ballou of Tufts, Gale of Galeville, Ciampi of Holy Cross, Murphy of Abingdon, Labasee of Middlebury, Andrews of Marietta, Fisher of Hamilton, Read of Huntliff, Sturtevant of Illinois, Reynolds of Illinois, Collins of Wilkinson, Anderson of Rochester, &c. In them are expressions like the following:

"An honor to American science, taste and criticism." "An enduring value and authority." "Never found any work which so uniformly satisfied my inquiries." "Has ever since been my constant companion in my practice at the bar, and for the last five years upon the bench. I have ever found it a safe counselor, and an indispensable help in the preparation and decision of cases." "For the sake of my country and the English language, I rejoice in the wonderful standard excellence, as well as celebrity, your Dictionary has attained. It is a work for the present and for all coming time." "Stands unquestionably pre-eminent." "There seems every prospect that it will be the standard book for this country at least, if not for England. I am content it should be so." "This truly great and national work." "A complete apparatus for all purposes of reading and understanding English and American literature. It is difficult to conceive of anything that could be added to fit it for these ends." "A vast treasury of knowledge, the whole of which is needed by every one who uses the English language, either as a writer, a speaker, or a reader." "Ought to be a part of the furniture of every American house." "We long ago accepted Webster as the standard in our college, and the experience of every term strengthens our conviction of the wisdom of our choice." "So long as you continue to incorporate all the improvements which are developed in the science of lexicography," &c., &c.

Perhaps, however, the opinions of no gentlemen upon such a subject can be more satisfactory than those of our selected for their qualifications to take charge of the educational interests of the country—more especially our great Common School system—watching constantly with intelligent scrutiny every influence bearing in this direction. Whose opinions can be more valuable, therefore, than those of such gentlemen, as to the English Dictionary best fitted in its Definitions, Vocabulary, Orthography, Pronunciation, Synonyms, Illustrations, Tables, and other features, to aid in true mental culture?

Nearly every State Superintendent of Public Instruction in the Union, or corresponding officer, where such an one exists, has recommended Webster's Dictionary in the strongest terms. Among them are those of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Michigan, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Carolina, Alabama, California, and also Canada—TWENTY-TWO in all.

STATE PURCHASES.

The State of NEW YORK has placed 10,000 copies of Webster's Unabridged in as many of her Public Schools.

The State of WISCONSIN, 3,950—nearly every School.

The State of NEW JERSEY, 1,500—nearly every School.

The State of MICHIGAN made provision for all her Schools.

The State of MASSACHUSETTS has supplied her Schools—nearly all.

More than ten times as many are sold of Webster's Dictionaries, as of any other Series in this country.

At least four-fifths of all the School Books published in this country own Webster as their standard, and of the remainder, few acknowledge any standard.

PUBLISHERS' PREFACE.

In laying before the public a new edition of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, the Publishers would briefly state the nature of the additions and improvements which it embodies.

Prominent among these are the Pictorial Illustrations, the object, character, and plan of which are sufficiently set forth in the Introduction to that department, on pp. lxxxi, lxxxii. Being some fifteen hundred in number, executed by a skillful artist, with mutual and appropriate references between the Illustrations and the word illustrated, they will constitute, it is hoped, an attractive and valuable feature in a work of this kind.

A Table of Synonyms has been prepared by the Editor, Dr. Goodrich, which it is hoped will prove a valuable accession to this volume. The plan of giving full and distinct lists of synonymous words in a general dictionary, was first introduced into this country in the Royal Octavo abridgment of the present work, for 1847. That plan is here carried out in the way originally contemplated, by adding in this Table brief discriminations between many hundreds of important words which are closely allied in meaning. The reader will see from the remarks introductory to the Table that this is only an application on a broad scale, of one mode adopted by Dr. Webster, for giving clearness and precision to his definitions. It is also peculiarly appropriate in a work like this, which aims at great exactness as a defining dictionary; since it affords an opportunity of giving in connection with the leading terms of our language, those nicer discriminations and shades of thought which it is impossible to reach in the way of ordinary definitions. Nor can this object be accomplished by merely citing passages which contain the words in question. Unless the distinctive meaning of the several words is previously given, little or no aid is afforded as to their proper use and application, by adducing such passages. This will be seen by turning to such a work as Platt's Dictionary of English Synonyms, which is framed chiefly upon this plan. On the first page, we find under the words abandon, desert, leave, &c., such examples as these: "Men are abandoned by their friends; we desert a post or station; leave the country," &c. But these words may be equally well interchanged. Men may be deserted by their friends; we may abandon a post or station, &c. Such examples, therefore, afford no light or guidance as to the proper use of these words. So, if the phrase be given "the officer abandoned his post," the question may arise whether he really abandoned, or deserted, or surrendered, or left it. He may have abandoned it on the approach of an enemy, or as no longer important to maintain; he may have deserted it unworthily or treacherously; he may have surrendered it to a superior force; he may have left it temporarily.—Discriminations of this kind, on a limited scale, were given by the Editor some years ago in two abridged dictionaries designed for the use of academies and higher seats of learning. These were so highly appreciated by distinguished scholars, that we have prevailed on him to introduce them into the present edition of Dr. Webster's large work. They are here presented with much greater fullness than in any work with which the name of the Editor has heretofore been connected. The materials for this Table of Synonyms have been collected by the labor of some years with reference to a distinct work on this subject. They form between six and seven hundred distinct articles, being a greater number than is contained by any similar work in our language, except that of Crabb, which is so prolix and confused that few have been ready to use it when engaged in literary composition. They will meet, it is believed, a want which has been extensively felt on this subject, and give an added value to Webster's American Dictionary.

The Appendix, immediately following the general vocabulary, embraces more than nine thousand new words and meanings, which have been collected by the Editor, during the period that has elapsed since the issue of the revised edition of 1847. In this collection he has been aided by gentlemen familiar with various special departments of science, and has availed himself of every other source of information within his reach. It would have been easy to swell the list many fold. A desire merely to present a large vocabulary, can hardly be thought a legitimate object of ambition to the lexicographer. The rejection of unimportant compounds, unauthorized or entirely obsolete words, or terms of no real value or prospective permanency in our language, is quite as desirable as the introduction of such as are really useful and important. We think a good degree of completeness will be found in this department.

Gift. mr. & mrs. Ralph E. Bigby 2-18-57

A Table is given which we consider of much value, showing the proper Pronunciation of some eight thousand names of Distinguished Persons of Modern Times. When the preparation of this Table was commenced, nothing of the kind, so far as is known, had ever appeared, and it was, therefore, with us an original conception. Nothing of the kind, as far as we are aware, is now before the public, of such extent and value. The List has been prepared with much care, and such an approximation to completeness and accuracy secured as was practicable. Of course a difference of opinion will exist in regard to the pronunciation of some names, and it has not been easy to determine, in all cases, whether an anglicised, or vernacular, pronunciation, should be given. It is believed, however, the Table will be found of very great convenience, in a matter with regard to which no reliable guide has heretofore been before the public. It has been prepared, mainly, by a gentleman long a resident in Europe, and familiar with many of the modern languages.

The other Tables—Peculiar use of Words and Terms in the Bible, Words, Phrases, Idioms and Proverbs, of popular English use, in the Latin, French, Spanish and Italian languages, Abbreviations, Arbitrary Signs, &c., will sufficiently explain themselves.

In acknowledging the favor which Webster's American Dictionary, Unabridged, has received, we trust the additions and improvements now presented, will show a proper appreciation of that favor by the publishers. The work combines the advantages of Dr. Webster's own life-long toil, and, at the same time, the labors of an eminent scholar and living lexicographer, in the person of its present editor. We trust these added improvements justify our past and present assurance, that the public appreciation will be met by a corresponding care on our part that it shall at no time be found susceptible of an unfavorable comparison with any work of the kind before the public.

PREFACE TO THE REVISED EDITION.

BY THE EDITOR.

THE demand for THE AMERICAN DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE has increased so rapidly within a few years past, that the publishers have felt the necessity of its being stereotyped, for the greater convenience of the public, in a single quarto volume. In deciding upon this measure, they were desirous that the work should be thoroughly revised anew, and that each department which it embraces, should be brought down, as far as possible, to the latest advances of science, literature, and the arts, at the present day. With this view, it was placed in the hands of Rev. CHAUNCEY A. GOODRICH, Professor in Yale College, as one of the members of Dr. WEBSTER's family, in the expectation of his obtaining such additional aid as might be necessary for the accomplishment of this design. The Editor has not acted, however, upon his own personal responsibility in executing this trust. He has, from time to time, laid open the sheets to the inspection of the other members of the family; and no important alterations have been made, especially in any of the leading characteristics of the work, except with the concurrence, or at the request, of Dr. Webster's legal representatives. In laying before the public an edition thus prepared, the fruit of nearly three years of care and attention, the Editor will be expected to make some brief statement of the principles on which he has conducted the revision, and the results of his labors as exhibited in the present volume.

This work was first published, in two quarto volumes, in the year 1828. At the expiration of twelve years, or in the year 1840, a second edition was published by the Author, in two royal octavo volumes. Of this he thus speaks in the Advertisement prefixed: "The improvements in this edition of the AMERICAN DICTIONARY consist chiefly in the addition of several thousand words to the vocabulary, the divisions of words into syllables, and the correction of definitions in several of the sciences, which are made conformable to recent discoveries and classifications. For the latter improvements, the Author is indebted chiefly to Professor TULLY, of the Medical College in New Haven. To these improvements may be added the introduction and explanation of many phrases from foreign languages, frequently used by English authors, and in conversation; and also of many foreign terms used in books of music." In conducting this revision, Dr. Webster was aided in some part of his labors by his son, WILLIAM G. WEBSTER, Esq., of New Haven; who, also, at a subsequent period, prepared the revised Addenda, under the direction of his father. The later improvements of the Author, down to the period of his death, are here inserted under their proper heads, from the manuscripts which he left. By these successive revisions, and the one which has now been made, new matter, to the amount of more than three hundred pages, has been added to the work; all of which, by the use of a smaller type, and by careful compression, is now brought within the compass of this volume. Of the course pursued in the revision, it will now be proper briefly to speak.

In respect to the Etymologies, the Editor has not considered it as lying within his province, to make any material alterations. In a very few cases of obvious necessity, some slight change has been made. But the chief labor, in reference to this part of the work, has been bestowed on the difficult task of giving with accuracy the numerous words from Oriental and foreign languages, which are used in tracing the origin of our own.

The chief value of a dictionary consists in its Definitions;—in giving a clear, full, and accurate exhibition, of all the various shades of meaning which belong, by established usage, to the words of a language. It is in this respect, especially, that Dr. WEBSTER'S Dictionary has been generally considered superior to every other, both of this country and of England. To this point, therefore, the labors of the Editor have been mainly directed. No efforts have been spared to obtain the most recent and valuable works not only in lexicography, but in the various departments of science and the arts embraced in the American Dictionary. As these subjects are in a state of continual progress, every important word, in its various applications, has been diligently examined and compared with the statements made on each topic, by the latest and most approved authorities. Smart's English Dictionary, in the edition of 1846, has been carefully collated with this work, and also the unfinished one, in a course of publication, by Gilbert, so far as the numbers have appeared. Reference has likewise constantly been made to Richardson's Dictionary,—although this had been previously examined by Dr. Webster,—and also to the Analytical Dictionary of Booth. Each of the articles in Brande's Encyclopedia of Science, Literature, and Art, has been collated with the corresponding portions of this Dictionary, as the starting-point, when necessary, of investigation in larger treatises. The Penny Cyclopedia has been consulted at every step, especially in matters of science; and the Encyclopedia Americana (based on the German Conversations-Lexikon) has been relied upon, particularly on subjects of continental literature, philosophy, history, art, &c. In order to secure greater accuracy, numerous special dictionaries, or vocabularies confined to some single department, have also been collated with this work; and the ablest treatises on important branches of science and art have been diligently examined. In architecture, the chief reliance has been placed on the Oxford Glossary of Architecture, (1845,) and the Encyclopedia of Architecture, (1842,) by Gwilt, author of the articles on this subject in Brande's Encyclopedia. In agriculture, Johnson's Farmer's Encyclopedia, (1844,) and Gardner's Farmer's Dictionary, (1846,) have been chiefly used. In general antiquities, the large treatise of Fosbroke has been frequently consulted, while in classical antiquities, the principal reliance has been placed on the recent dictionary of Smith, (1846,) as a work of the highest authority. In respect to the antiquities of the church, the elaborate work of Coleman (1841) has been frequently consulted; and Hook's Church Dictionary (1844) has been collated throughout, with reference to the rites, ceremonies, vestments, &c., of the Church of England, and also of the Roman Catholic and Greek Churches. In botany, use has principally been made of the writings of Lindley and Loudon. In natural history, Partington's British Cyclopedia of Natural History, (1835–7,) and Jardine's Naturalist's Library, (1834–43,) have been much consulted, in connection with the articles on these subjects in the Penny Cyclopedia and similar works. In geology, mineralogy, and some associated branches of natural history, Humble's Dictionary of terms in these departments (1840) has been compared with this work throughout. In respect to mercantile subjects, banking, coins, weights, measures, &c., McCulloch's Commercial Dictionary (1845) has been collated at every step, as the standard work on these subjects. In manufactures and the arts, Dr. Ure's Dictionary of Manufactures, Arts, and Mines, with its Supplement, (1845,) has been relied upon as of the highest authority. In engineering and mechanical philosophy, Hebert's Engineer's and Mechanic's Cyclopedia (1842) has been carefully collated, with a constant reference to the more popular and recent dictionaries of Francis, Grier, and Buchanan, in the editions of 1846. In seamanship, the Dictionary of Marine Terms, in Lieutenant Totten's Naval Text-Book, (1841,) has been taken as a guide. In military affairs, the dictionary of Campbell (1844) has been followed, in connection with the more extended articles contained in Brande and the Penny Cyclopedia, on the kindred topics. In the fine arts, much use has been made of the dictionary of Elmes. In domestic economy, the Encyclopedia of Webster and Parkes on this subject (1844) has furnished many important statements, on a great variety of topics, presented for the first time in a scientific form; and to this has been added Cooley's Cyclopedia of Practical Receipts (1846,) as exhibiting much collateral information, in respect to the arts, manufactures, and trades. Such, in general, are the authorities which have been relied on in this revision.

But it is obviously impossible for any one mind to embrace with accuracy all the various departments of knowledge which are now brought within the compass of a dictionary. Hence arise most of the errors and inconsistencies which abound in works of this kind. To avoid these as far as possible, especially in matters of science, the Editor at first made an arrangement with Dr. JAMES G. PERCIVAL, who had rendered important assistance to Dr. Webster in the edition of 1828, to take the entire charge of revising the scientific articles embraced in this work. This revision, however, owing to causes beyond the control of either party, was extended to but little more than two letters of the alphabet; and the Editor then obtained the assistance of his associates in office, and of other gentlemen in various professional employments. To these he would now return his acknowledgments, for the aid they have afforded. The articles on law have been collated with Blackstone and Bouvier's Law Dictionary, by the Hon. ELIZUR GOODRICH, formerly Professor of Law in Yale College, and the errors discovered, which were few in number, have been carefully corrected. The departments of ecclesiastical history and ancient philosophy have been thoroughly revised by the Rev. JAMES MURDOCK, D.D., late Professor in the Andover Theological Seminary, who has furnished, in many instances, new and valuable definitions. The terms in chemistry have been submitted to Professor SILLIMAN, of Yale College; and whatever changes were requisite in the explanations, have been made under his direction. In the departments of botany, anatomy, physiology, medicine, and some branches of natural history, Dr. Webster received assistance, in the revision of 1840, as mentioned above, from Dr. WILLIAM TULLY, late Professor in the Medical Institution of Yale College. Still further aid has been received from the same source in the present revision, and much of the accuracy of this work, in these branches, will be found owing to the valuable assistance he has thus afforded. On topics connected with Oriental literature, aid has frequently been obtained from Professor GIBBS, of Yale College. A part of the articles on astronomy, meteorology, and natural philosophy, in the edition of 1828, passed under the revision of Professor OLMSTED, of Yale College. This revision has now been extended to all the articles on these subjects throughout the work, and new definitions have been furnished in numerous instances. The definitions in mathematics, after having been compared with those given in the dictionaries of Hutton, or Barlow, have been submitted to Professor STANLEY, of Yale College, and the alterations have, in all cases, been made under his direction. In the sciences of geology and mineralogy, a thorough revision of the whole volume has been made by JAMES D. DANA, Esq., Geologist and Mineralogist of the United States Exploring Expedition, and associate editor of the American Journal of Science and Arts, to whom the Editor is likewise indebted for assistance on various other subjects, which has greatly enhanced the value of the work. In practical astronomy and the science of entomology, aid has been frequently received from EDWARD C. HERRICK, Esq., Librarian of Yale College. The articles on painting and the fine arts have, to a great extent, passed under the inspection of NATHANIEL JOCELYN, Esq., Painter, of New Haven, and new definitions have in many cases been furnished.

A correspondence has likewise been carried on with literary friends in England, and especially with one of the contributors to the Penny Cyclopedia, with a view to obtain information on certain points, in respect to which nothing definite could be learned from any books within the reach of the Editor. Extended lists of words have been transmitted for examination, and returned with ample notes and explanations. Much obscurity has thus been removed in respect to the use of terms which have a peculiar sense in England, especially some of frequent occurrence at the universities, in the circles of trade, and in the familiar intercourse of life. To the friends who have given their assistance in these various departments, the Editor would return his cordial thanks. Whatever improvement the work may have gained from this revision, in respect to clearness, accuracy, and fullness of definition, will be found owing, in a great degree, to the aid which they have thus afforded.

With regard to the insertion of new words, the Editor has felt much hesitation and embarrassment. Some thousands have been added in the course of this revision, and the number might have been swelled to many thousands more, without the slightest difficulty. There is, at the present day, especially in England, a boldness of innovation on this subject, which amounts to absolute licentiousness. A hasty introduction into our dictionaries, of new terms, under such circumstances, is greatly to be deprecated. Our vocabulary is already encumbered with a multitude of words, which have never formed a permanent part of English literature, and it is a serious evil to add to their number. Nothing, on the contrary, is so much needed as a thorough expurgation of our dictionaries in this respect,—the rejection of many thousands of words which may properly find a place in the glossaries of antiquarians, as a curious exhibition of what has been proposed, but never adopted, as a part of our language, but which, for that reason, can have no claim to stand in a dictionary designed for general use. All words, indeed, which are necessary to an understanding of our great writers, such as Bacon, Spenser, Shakespeare, &c., ought, though now obsolete, to be carefully retained; and in the present revision a considerable number of this class have been introduced for the first time. Other words have likewise been admitted to a limited extent, namely, the familiar terms of common life in England, which have been much used of late by popular writers in Great Britain. Many of these need to be explained for the benefit of readers in this country; and, if marked as "familiar," "colloquial," or "low," according to their true character, they may be safely inserted in our dictionaries, and are entitled to a place there, as forming a constituent part of our written and spoken language. One of the most difficult questions on this subject, relates to the introduction of technical and scientific terms. Most of our general dictionaries are, at present, without any plan as to the extent and proportion in which such words should be inserted; nor can they ever be reduced to order until each department is revised by men of science who are intimately acquainted with the subjects, and who are competent to decide what terms ought to be admitted into a general dictionary, and what terms should be reserved for special dictionaries devoted to distinct branches of science. Something of this kind, on a limited scale, has been attempted in the progress of this revision. Lists of words have been obtained from the gentlemen mentioned above, which might properly be inserted in this volume; and very few terms of this class have been admitted except under their direction. In accordance with their advice, a small number have been excluded; but in this respect the Editor has not felt at liberty to carry out his views in their full extent.

In respect to Americanisms, properly so called, it is known to those who are conversant with the subject, that they are less numerous than has been generally supposed. Most of those familiar words, especially of our older states, which have been considered as peculiar to our country, were brought by our ancestors from Great Britain, and are still in constant use there as local terms. The recent investigations of Forby, Holloway, and Halliwell, have thrown much light on this subject; and the names of these authors are, therefore, frequently placed under the words in question, to indicate their origin and their present use in England. Notes have also been added to some words which are peculiar to our country; but their number is comparatively small.

In reference to Orthography, some important alterations have been made, but in strict conformity, it is believed, with the Author's principles on this subject. The changes in our orthography recommended by Dr. Webster, are of two distinct kinds, and rest on very different grounds. These it may be proper for a moment to consider. His main principle was, that the tendencies of our language to greater simplicity and broader analogies, ought to be watched and cherished with the utmost care. He felt, therefore, that whenever a movement toward wider analogies and more general rules, had advanced so far as to leave but few exceptions to impede its progress, those exceptions ought to be set aside at once, and the analogy rendered complete. On this ground, he rejected the u from such words as favour, labour, &c. Of these we have a large number, which came to us, in most cases, from Latin terminations in or, through the Norman French, but encumbered with the silent u, as in emperour, authour, editour, &c. From this entire class, except about twenty words, the u has been gradually dropped; and in respect to these, scarcely any two persons can be found, however strenuous for retaining it, who are in practice consistent with each other, or with themselves, as to the words in which this letter is used. In fact, we have reached a point where, unless we take Webster and the dictionaries which agree with him as our guide, we have no standard on the subject; for Johnson, Walker, and others, retain the u in numerous words, into which no one would think of introducing it at the present day. Public convenience, therefore, demands that we do at once what must ultimately be done. No one can believe that the progress of our language will be arrested on this subject. The u will speedily be omitted in all words of this class, unless, from the sacredness of its associations, it be retained in Saviour, which may stand for a time as a solitary exception. Nor is it Dr. Webster who is the innovator in this case, but the English mind, which has for two centuries been throwing off a useless encumbrance, and moving steadily on toward greater simplicity in the structure of our language. Such, too, is the case with certain terminations in re, pronounced like er; as, centre, metre, &c. We have numerous words of this class derived from the French, all of which originally ended in re; as cider, (cidre,) chamber, (chambre,) &c. These have been gradually conformed to the English spelling and pronunciation, till the number in re is reduced to not far from twenty words with their derivatives; and in respect to them also the process is still going on. Center is, to a considerable extent, the spelling of the best mathematical writers. Meter is the word given by Walker in his Rhyming Dictionary, from a sense of the gross inconsistency of attaching to this word and its derivative diameter a different termination. Others are gradually undergoing the same change. Dr. Webster proposes, therefore, to complete the analogy at once, and conform the spelling of the few that remain to the general principles of our language. Acre, lucre, and massacre, present the only difficulty, from their liability, if changed, to be mispronounced, and may therefore be suffered to stand as necessary exceptions. Another departure from the principles of English orthography which Dr. Webster has endeavored to correct, is one that was pointed out by Walker, in very emphatic terms, nearly fifty years ago. The principle in question is this,—that, in adding to a word the formatives ing, ed, er, &c., a single consonant (if one precedes) is doubled when the accent falls on the last syllable, as in forgetting, beginning, &c., but is not doubled when the accent falls on any of the preceding syllables, as in benefiting, gardening, &c. Walker, in his fifth Aphorism, says, "Dr. Lowth justly remarks that an error frequently takes place in the words worshipping, counselling, &c., which, having the accent on the first syllable, ought to be written worshiping, counseling. An ignorance of this rule has led many to write bigotted, for bigoted; and from this spelling has frequently arisen a false pronunciation. But no letter seems to be more frequently doubled improperly than l. Why we should write libelling, levelling, revelling, and yet offering, suffering, reasoning, I am totally at a loss to determine; and unless l can give a better plea than any other letter of the alphabet for being doubled in this situation, I must, in the style of Lucian in his trial of the letter T, declare for an expulsion." These were the deliberate and latest opinions of Walker. If he had taken the trouble to carry them into his vocabulary, instead of relying on a mere remark of this kind for the correction of the error—if he had simply stated, under about forty verbs, how the participle should be spelt, (for he did not give participles in his Dictionary,) and had altered six or eight words, as worshipper into worshiper, traveller into traveler, &c., the error would probably, by this time, have been wholly eradicated from our orthography; and Dr. Webster would have escaped much ignorant vituperation, for following in the footsteps of Walker and of Lowth. Walker also says in his Aphorisms, "Why should we not write dullness, fullness, skillful, willful, as well as stiffness and gruffness?" The principles of our language plainly require us to do so; and Dr. Webster felt that the change might easily be made. The words which need to be reduced to this analogy are only about eight in number, including installment and inthrallment, which, if spelt with a single l, are liable to be mispronounced, instăl ment, &c. Again, the words expense, license, recompense, which formerly had a c, in the last syllable, have now taken an s, because the latter consonant is the only one used in the derivatives; as, expensive, &c. A similar change is needed in only three words more to complete the analogy, namely, defense, offense, and pretense; and these Dr. Webster has changed. It is sometimes asked, "Why not change fence also?" For the simple reason, that its derivatives are spelt with a c, as fenced, fencing; and the word therefore stands regularly with others of its own class. Finally, Dr. Webster proposes to drop the u in mould and moult, because it has been dropped from gold, and all other words of the same ending.—Such are the principal changes under this head, introduced by Dr. Webster into his Dictionary. In the present edition, the words are spelt in both ways, for the convenience of the public, except in cases where this seemed to be unnecessary or was found to be inconvenient. These changes, considering the difficulty that always belongs to such a subject, have met with far more favor from the public, than was reasonably to be expected. Most of them have been extensively adopted in our country. They are gaining ground daily, as the reasons by which they are supported are more generally understood; and it is confidently believed that, being founded in established analogies, and intended merely to repress irregularities and remove petty exceptions, they must ultimately prevail.

The other class of changes mentioned above rests on a different basis,—that of Etymology. These will be estimated very differently, according to the acquaintance of different persons with the language from which the words are derived. When Dr. Webster substituted bridegoom for bridegroom, fether for feather, &c., the German critics highly applauded the change. They predicted its speedy and universal reception, because similar improvements, on a much broader scale, had been easily made in their language. But Dr. Webster found the case to be widely different among us. After an experiment of twelve years, he restored the old orthography to a considerable number of such words. In the present edition, it is restored in respect to nearly all that remain, from the full conviction, that, however desirable these changes may be, in themselves considered, as they do not relate to the general analogies of the language, and can not be duly appreciated by the body of the people, they will never be generally received.*

On the subject of Pronunciation, much labor has been bestowed in the progress of this revision. A careful comparison has been made with the latest authorities, and wherever changes seemed desirable, and could be made in consistency with the Author's principles, they have been here introduced. They key to pronunciation has been somewhat enlarged, and placed at the bottom of each page for greater ease of reference, and the pointed letters have been used to a still greater extent. Many thousand words have been re-spelled, and no efforts have been spared to render the work, in all respects, a complete Pronouncing Dictionary. In the progress of these labors, the Editor has been frequently struck with the wisdom of Dr. Webster in not attempting too much as to marking the pronunciation. Most of the later orthoëpists, as Knowles, Smart, &c., have made their system of notation so extensive and complicated, and have aimed to exhibit so many nice shades of distinction, as in many cases to perplex rather than aid.

The Publishers, being desirous to make this, in all respects, a complete work of reference, have introduced, at the close of the volume, a list of Greek and Latin Proper Names, with their pronunciation, prepared by Professor THACHER, of Yale College; a list of Scripture Proper Names, prepared by Professor PORTER, of Yale College; and a Pronouncing Vocabulary of Modern Geographical Names, prepared also under the superintendence of Professor PORTER. Of these a full account will be found in the several prefaces by which they are accompanied.

In conclusion, the Editor would acknowledge his obligations to the gentlemen who have aided him for more than two years, in these labors,—Mr. SAMUEL W. BARNUM, M. A., of Yale College, and WILLIAM G. WEBSTER, Esq., of New Haven. The intimate acquaintance of the latter with his father's views, has made his counsel and coöperation of great value in the progress of this revision.

To the overseers of the mechanical execution of this work, at the BOSTON TYPE AND STEREOTYPE FOUNDRY, the Editor would likewise make his acknowledgments for many valuable suggestions during the progress of the revision, and for the watchful care and assiduity with which they have performed the difficult task of giving accuracy to the details of this volume.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

In the year 1783, just at the close of the Revolution, I published an elementary book for facilitating the acquisition of our vernacular tongue, and for correcting a vicious pronunciation, which prevailed extensively among the common people of this country. Soon after the publication of that work, I believe in the following year, that learned and respectable scholar, the Rev. Dr. Goodrich, of Durham, one of the trustees of Yale College, suggested to me the propriety and expediency of my compiling a Dictionary, which should complete a system for the instruction of the citizens of this country in the language. At that time, I could not indulge the thought, much less the hope, of undertaking such a work; as I was neither qualified by research, nor had I the means of support, during the execution of the work, had I been disposed to undertake it. For many years, therefore, though I considered such a work as very desirable, yet it appeared to me impracticable; as I was under the necessity of devoting my time to other occupations for obtaining subsistence.

About thirty-five years ago, I began to think of attempting the compilation of a Dictionary. I was induced to this undertaking, not more by the suggestion of friends, than by my own experience of the want of such a work, while reading modern books of science. In this pursuit, I found almost insuperable difficulties, from the want of a dictionary, for explaining many new words, which recent discoveries in the physical sciences had introduced into use. To remedy this defect in part, I published my Compendious Dictionary in 1806; and soon after made preparations for undertaking a larger work.

My original design did not extend to an investigation of the origin and progress of our language, much less of other languages. I limited my views to the correcting of certain errors in the best English dictionaries, and to the supplying of words in which they are deficient. But after writing through two letters of the alphabet, I determined to change my plan. I found myself embarrassed at every step, for want of a knowledge of the origin of words, which Johnson, Bailey, Junius, Skinner, and some other authors, do not afford the means of obtaining. Then, laying aside my manuscripts, and all books treating of language, except lexicons and dictionaries, I endeavored, by a diligent comparison of words having the same or cognate radical letters, in about twenty languages, to obtain a more correct knowledge of the primary sense of original words, of the affinities between the English and many other languages, and thus to enable myself to trace words to their source.

I had not pursued this course more than three or four years, before I discovered that I had to unlearn a great deal that I had spent years in learning, and that it was necessary for me to go back to the first rudiments of a branch of erudition which I had before cultivated, as I had supposed, with success.

I spent ten years in this comparison of radical words, and in forming a Synopsis of the principal Words in twenty Languages, arranged in Classes under their primary Elements or Letters. The result has been to open what are to me new views of language, and to unfold what appear to be the genuine principles on which these languages are constructed.

After completing this Synopsis, I proceeded to correct what I had written of the Dictionary, and to complete the remaining part of the work. But before I had finished it, I determined on a voyage to Europe, with the view of obtaining some books and some assistance which I wanted; of learning the real state of the pronunciation of our language in England, as well as the general state of philology in that country; and of attempting to bring about some agreement or coincidence of opinions, in regard to unsettled points in pronunciation and grammatical construction. In some of these objects I failed; in others, my designs were answered.

It is not only important, but in a degree necessary, that the people of this country should have an American Dictionary of the English Language; for, although the body of the language is the same as in England, and it is desirable to perpetuate that sameness, yet some differences must exist. Language is the expression of ideas; and if the people of one country can not preserve an identity of ideas, they can not retain an identity of language. Now, an identity of ideas depends materially upon a sameness of things or objects with which the people of the two countries are conversant. But in no two portions of the earth, remote from each other, can such identity be found. Even physical objects must be different. But the principal differences between the people of this country and of all others, arise from different forms of government, different laws, institutions, and customs. Thus the practice of hawking and hunting, the institution of heraldry, and the feudal system of England originated terms which formed, and some of which now form, a necessary part of the language of that country; but, in the United States, many of these terms are no part of our present language, — and they can not be, for the things which they express do not exist in this country. They can be known to us only as obsolete or as foreign words. On the other hand, the institutions in this country which are new and peculiar, give rise to new terms or to new applications of old terms, unknown to the people of England; which can not be explained by them, and which will not be inserted in their dictionaries, unless copied from ours. Thus the terms land-office; land-warrant; location of land; consociation of churches; regent of a university; intendant of a city; plantation, selectmen, senate, congress, court, assembly, escheat, &c., are either words not belonging to the language of England, or they are applied to things in this country which do not exist in that. No person in this country will be satisfied with the English definitions of the words congress, senate, and assembly, court, &c.; for although these are words used in England, yet they are applied in this country to express ideas which they do not express in that country. With our present constitutions of government, escheat can never have its feudal sense in the United States.

But this is not all. In many cases, the nature of our governments, and of our civil institutions, requires an appropriate language in the definition of words, even when the words express the same thing as in England. Thus the English dictionaries inform us that a justice is one deputed by the king to do right by way of judgment — he is a lord by his office — justices of the peace are appointed by the king's commission — language which is inaccurate in respect to this officer in the United States. So constitutionally is defined, by CHALMERS, legally; but in this country the distinction between constitution and law requires a different definition. In the United States, a plantation is a very different thing from what it is in England. The word marshal, in this country, has one important application unknown in England, or in Europe.

A great number of words in our language require to be defined in a phraseology accommodated to the condition and institutions of the people in these States, and the people of England must look to an American Dictionary for a correct understanding of such terms.

The necessity, therefore, of a dictionary suited to the people of the United States is obvious; and I should suppose that, this fact being admitted, there could be no difference of opinion as to the time when such a work ought to be substituted for English dictionaries.

There are many other considerations of a public nature, which serve to justify this attempt to furnish an American work which shall be a guide to the youth of the United States. Most of these are too obvious to require illustration.

One consideration, however, which is dictated by my own feelings, but which, I trust, will meet with approbation in correspondent feelings in my fellow-citizens, ought not to be passed in silence; it is this: — "The chief glory of a nation," says Dr. Johnson, "arises from its authors." With this opinion deeply impressed on my mind, I have the same ambition which actuated that great man, when he expressed a wish to give celebrity to BACON, to HOOKER, to MILTON, and to BOYLE.

I do not indeed expect to add celebrity to the names of FRANKLIN, WASHINGTON, ADAMS, JAY, MADISON, MARSHALL, RAMSAY, DWIGHT, SMITH, TRUMBULL, HAMILTON, BELKNAP, AMES, MASON, KENT, HARE, SILLIMAN, CLEAVELAND, WALSH, IRVING, and many other Americans distinguished by their writings or by their science; but it is with pride and satisfaction that I can place them, as authorities, on the same page with those of BOYLE, HOOKER, MILTON, DRYDEN, ADDISON, RAY, MILNER, COWPER, DAVY, THOMSON, and JAMESON.

A life devoted to reading and to an investigation of the origin and principles of our vernacular language, and especially a particular examination of the best English writers, with a view to a comparison of their style and phraseology with those of the best American writers, and with our colloquial usage, enables me to affirm, with confidence, that the genuine English idiom is as well preserved by the unmixed English of this country, as it is by the best English writers. Examples to prove this fact will be found in the Introduction to this work. It is true that many of our writers have neglected to cultivate taste, and the embellishments of style; but even these have written the language in its genuine idiom. In this respect, FRANKLIN and WASHINGTON, whose language is their nereditary mother tongue, unsophisticated by modern grammar, present as pure models of genuine English as ADDISON or SWIFT. But I may go further, and affirm, with truth, that our country has produced some of the best models of composition. The style of President SMITH; of the authors of the FEDERALIST; of Mr. AMES; of Dr. MASON; of Mr. HARPER; of Chancellor KENT; [the prose] of Mr. BARLOW; of Dr. CHANNING; of WASHINGTON IRVING; of the legal decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; of the reports of legal decisions in some of the particular states; and many other writings; in purity, in elegance, and in technical precision, is equaled only by that of the best British authors, and surpassed by that of no English compositions of a similar kind.

The United States commenced their existence under circumstances wholly novel and unexampled in the history of nations. They commenced with civilization, with learning, with science, with constitutions of free government, and with that best gift of God to man, the Christian religion. Their population is now equal to that of England; in arts and sciences, our citizens are very little behind the most enlightened people on earth; in some respects, they have no superiors; and our language, within two centuries, will be spoken by more people in this country than any other language on earth, except the Chinese, in Asia; and even that may not be an exception.

It has been my aim in this work, now offered to my fellow-citizens, to ascertain the true principles of the language, in its orthography and structure; to purify it from some palpable errors, and reduce the number of its anomalies, thus giving it more regularity and consistency in its forms, both of words and sentences; and in this manner to furnish a standard of our vernacular tongue, which we shall not be ashamed to bequeath to five hundred millions of people, who are destined to occupy, and I hope to adorn, the vast territory within our jurisdiction.

If the language can be improved in regularity, so as to be more easily acquired by our own citizens and by foreigners, and thus be rendered a more useful instrument for the propagation of science, arts, civilization, and Christianity; — if it can be rescued from the mischievous influence of sciolists, and that dabbling spirit of innovation, which is perpetually disturbing its settled usages and filling it with anomalies; — if, in short, our vernacular language can be redeemed from corruptions, and our philology and literature from degradation; it would be a source of great satisfaction to me to be one among the instruments of promoting these valuable objects. If this object can not be effected, and my wishes and hopes are to be frustrated, my labor will be lost, and this work must sink into oblivion.

This Dictionary, like all others of the kind, must be left, in some degree, imperfect; for what individual is competent to trace to their source, and define in all their various applications, popular, scientific, and technical, seventy or eighty thousand words! It satisfies my mind that I have done all that my health, my talents, and my pecuniary means, would enable me to accomplish. I present it to my fellow-citizens, not with frigid indifference, but with my ardent wishes for their improvement and their happiness; and for the continued increase of the wealth, the learning, the moral and religious elevation of character, and the glory, of my country.

To that great and benevolent Being, who, during the preparation of this work, has sustained a feeble constitution, amidst obstacles and toils, disappointments, infirmities, and depression; who has borne me and my manuscripts in safety across the Atlantic, and given me strength and resolution to bring the work to a close, I would present the tribute of my most grateful acknowledgments. And if the talent which he intrusted to my care, has not been put to the most profitable use in his service, I hope it has not been "kept laid up in a napkin," and that any misapplication of it may be graciously forgiven.

The improvements in this edition of the American Dictionary consist chiefly in the addition of several thousand words to the vocabulary, the division of words into syllables, and in the correction of definitions in several of the sciences, which are made conformable to recent discoveries and classifications. For the latter improvements, the author is indebted chiefly to Professor Tully, of the Medical College in New Haven.

To these improvements may be added the introduction and explanation of many phrases from foreign languages, frequently used by English authors and in conversation; and also of many foreign terms used in books of music.

MEMOIR OF THE AUTHOR.

BY THE EDITOR.

It is natural for those who make frequent use of a work like this, to desire some knowledge of the author's life, and especially of that long course of intellectual labor, by which he contributed so largely to the literary treasures of our language. To gratify this desire is the object of the present Memoir. A brief outline will be given of the leading occurrences of his life, with particular reference to the occasions which called forth the principal productions of his pen. The materials of this sketch were obtained from Dr. Webster himself, about ten years before his death, and were first used in the preparation of a memoir inserted in the "National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans," in the year 1833. That memoir has been re-written, with large additions, and is now brought down to the period of the author's death.

Noah Webster was born in Hartford, Connecticut, about three miles from the center of the city, on the 16th of October, 1758. His father was a respectable farmer and justice of the peace, and was a descendant, in the fourth generation, of John Webster, one of the first settlers of Hartford, who was a magistrate, or member of the colonial council from its first formation, and, at a subsequent period, governor of Connecticut. His mother was a descendant of William Bradford, the second governor of the Plymouth colony. The family was remarkable for longevity. His father died at the advanced age of nearly ninety-two. He and one of his brothers lived considerably beyond the age of eighty. His remaining brother died in his eightieth year; and of his two sisters, one was advanced beyond seventy, and the other had nearly reached the same age, at the period of their death.

Mr. Webster commenced the study of the classics, in the year 1772, under the instruction of the clergyman of the parish, the Rev. Nathan Perkins, D. D., and in 1774 was admitted a member of Yale College. The war of the revolution, commencing the next year, interrupted the regular attendance of the students on their usual exercises, and deprived them of no small part of the advantages of a collegiate course of instruction. In his Junior year, when the western part of New England was thrown into confusion by General Burgoyne's expedition from Canada, Mr. Webster volunteered his services under the command of his father, who was captain in the alarm list, a body comprising those of the militia who were above forty-five years of age, and who were called into the field only on pressing emergencies. In that campaign, all the males of the family, four in number, were in the army at the same time. Notwithstanding the interruption of his studies by these causes, Mr. Webster graduated with reputation in 1778.

The class to which he belonged produced an unusual number of men who were afterward distinguished in public life. Among these may be mentioned Joel Barlow, author of the Columbiad, and minister of the United States to the court of France; Oliver Wolcott, secretary of the treasury of the United States under the administration of Washington, and subsequently governor of the State of Connecticut; Uriah Tracy, a distinguished member of the senate of the United States; Stephen Jacob, chief justice, and Noah Smith, associate judge, of the Supreme Court of Vermont; Zephaniah Swift, chief justice, and Ashur Miller, associate judge, of the Supreme Court of Connecticut; besides a number of others who were either members of Congress, or among the leaders of our great political parties, at the commencement of the present century.

The period at which Mr. Webster entered upon life, was an unpropitious one for a young man to be cast upon the world without property. The country was impoverished by the war to a degree of which it is difficult, at the present day, to form any just conception; there was no prospect of peace; the issue of the contest was felt, by the most sanguine, to be extremely doubtful; and the practice of the law, which Mr. Webster intended to pursue, was in a great measure set aside by the general calamity. It was under these circumstances that, on his return from the Commencement when he graduated, his father gave him an eight dollar bill of the Continental currency, (then worth about four dollars in silver,) and told him that he must thenceforth rely on his own exertions for support. As a means of immediate subsistence, he resorted to the instruction of a school, and, during the summer of 1779, resided at Hartford, Connecticut, in the family of Mr., afterward Chief Justice, Ellsworth. An intimate friendship was thus formed between these two gentlemen, which was interrupted only by the death of the chief justice.

Not having the means of obtaining a regular education for the bar, Mr. Webster, at the suggestion of a distinguished counselor of his acquaintance, determined to pursue the study of the law in the intervals of his regular employment, without the aid of an instructor; and, having presented himself for examination, at the expiration of two years, was admitted to practice in the year 1781. As he had no encouragement to open an office, in the existing state of the country, he resumed the business of instruction, and taught a classical school, in 1782, at Goshen, in Orange county, New York. Here, in a desponding state of mind, created by the unsettled condition of things at the close of the war, and the gloomy prospects for business, he undertook an employment which gave a complexion to his whole future life. This was the compilation of books for the instruction of youth in schools. Having prepared the first draught of an elementary treatise of this kind, he made a journey to Philadelphia in the autumn of the same year, and, after exhibiting a specimen of the work to several members of Congress, among whom was Mr. Madison, and to the Rev. S. S. Smith, D. D., at that time a professor, and afterward president, of the college at Princeton, he was encouraged by their approbation to prosecute his design. Accordingly, in the winter following, he revised what he had written, and, leaving Goshen in 1783, he returned to Hartford, where he published his "First Part of a Grammatical Institute of the English Language." The second and third parts were published in the years immediately following. These works, comprising a Spelling Book, an English Grammar, and a compilation for reading, were the first books of the kind published in the United States. They were gradually introduced into most of the schools of our country; and to so great an extent has the Spelling Book been used, that, during the twenty years in which he was employed in compiling his American Dictionary, the entire support of his family was derived from the profits of this work, at a premium for copyright of less than a cent a copy. About twenty-four millions of this book have been published, down to the present year, 1847, in the different forms which it assumed under the revision of the author; and its popularity has gone on continually increasing. The demand for some years past, has averaged about one million copies a year. To its influence, probably, more than to any other cause, are we indebted for that remarkable uniformity of pronunciation in our country, which is so often spoken of with surprise by English travelers.

In entering thus early on his literary career, Mr. Webster did not confine himself to the publication of his own works. At a period when nothing had as yet been done to perpetuate the memorials of our early history, he led the way in this important branch of literary effort, by the publication of that highly valuable and characteristic work, Governor Winthrop's Journal. Having learnt that a manuscript copy was in possession of Governor Trumbull, of Connecticut, he caused it to be transcribed, at his own expense, by the governor's private secretary, and risked more than the amount of his whole property in its publication. The sale never remunerated him for the expenses thus incurred.

At the period of Mr. Webster's return to Hartford, in 1783, the state was agitated by violent dissensions, on the subject of a grant made by Congress to the army, of half pay for life, which was afterward commuted for a grant of full pay for five years beyond their term of service. To this grant it was strongly objected, that, if the army had suffered by the reduced value of the bills in which they were paid, the country at large had sustained an equal loss by the depreciation of the currency, and by other causes. So strong was the excitement on this subject, that public meetings were held throughout the state, to prevent the laws of Congress from being carried into effect; and at length a convention met at Middletown with the same design, at which two thirds of the towns in Connecticut were represented. In this state of things, Mr. Webster, though only twenty-five years of age, came forward to vindicate the measures of Congress, and wrote a series of papers on the subject, under the signature of HONORIUS, which were published in the Connecticut Courant, and read extensively throughout the state. The effect was great. At the next election, in April, 1784, a large majority of the legislature were supporters of Congress in their measures. So highly were Mr. Webster's services appreciated on this occasion, that he received the thanks of Governor Trumbull in person, and was publicly declared, by a member of the council, to have "done more to allay popular discontent, and support the authority of Congress at this crisis, than any other man."

These occurrences in his native state, together with the distress and stagnation of business in the whole country, resulting from the want of power in Congress to carry its measures into effect, and to secure to the people the benefits of a stable government, convinced Mr. Webster, that the old confederation, after the dangers of the war were past, was utterly inadequate to the necessities of the people. He therefore published a pamphlet, in the winter of 1784–5, entitled "Sketches of American Policy," in which, after treating of the general principles of government, he endeavored to prove that it was absolutely necessary, for the welfare and safety of the United States, to establish a new system of government, which should act not on the states, but directly on individuals, and vest in Congress full power to carry its laws into effect. Being on a journey to the Southern States, in May, 1785, he went to Mount Vernon, and presented a copy of this pamphlet to General Washington. It contained, the writer believes, the first distinct proposal, made through the medium of the press, for a new constitution of the United States.

One object of Mr. Webster's journey to the south was, to petition the state legislatures for the enactment of a law securing to authors an exclusive right to the publication of their writings. In this he succeeded to a considerable extent; and the public attention was thus called to a provision for the support of American literature, which was rendered more effectual by a general copyright law, enacted by Congress soon after the formation of our government. At a much later period, (in the years 1830–31,) Mr. Webster passed a winter at Washington, with the single view of endeavoring to procure an alteration of the existing law, which should extend the term of copyright, and thus give a more ample reward to the labors of our artists and literary men. In this design he succeeded; and an act was passed more liberal in its provisions than the former law, though less so than the laws of some European governments on this subject.

On his return from the south, Mr. Webster spent the summer of 1785 at Baltimore, and employed his time in preparing a course of lectures on the English language, which were delivered, during the year 1786, in the principal Atlantic cities, and were published in 1789, in an octavo volume, with the title of "Dissertations on the English Language."

The year 1787 was spent by Mr. Webster at Philadelphia, as superintendent of an Episcopal academy. The convention which framed the present constitution of the United States were in session at Philadelphia during a part of this year; and when their labors were closed, Mr. Webster was solicited by Mr. Fitzsimmons, one of the members, to give the aid of his pen in recommending the new system of government to the people. He accordingly wrote a pamphlet on this subject, entitled an "Examination of the Leading Principles of the Federal Constitution."

In 1788, Mr. Webster attempted to establish a periodical in New York, and for one year published the "American Magazine," which, however, failed of success; as did also an attempt to combine the efforts of other gentlemen in a similar undertaking. The country was not yet prepared for such a work.

In 1789, when the prospects of business became more encouraging, after the adoption of the new constitution, Mr. Webster settled himself at Hartford in the practice of the law. Here he formed or renewed an acquaintance with a number of young men just entering upon life, who were ardently devoted, like himself, to literary pursuits. Among these may be mentioned his two classmates, Barlow and Wolcott; Trumbull, author of McFingal; Richard Alsop; Dr. Lemuel Hopkins; and, though somewhat older, the Rev. Nathan Strong, pastor of the First Congregational Church, who, in common with the three last mentioned, was highly distinguished for the penetration of his intellect and the keenness of his wit. The incessant contact of such minds, at the forming period of their progress, had great influence on the literary habits of them all, in after life. It gave them a solid and manly cast of thought, a simplicity of taste, a directness of statement, a freedom from all affectation and exuberance of imagery or diction, which are often best acquired by the salutary use of ridicule, in the action and reaction on each other of keen and penetrating minds. It had, likewise, a powerful influence on the social circles in which they moved; and the biographer of Governor Wolcott has justly remarked, that at this time "few cities in the Union could boast of a more cultivated or intelligent society than Hartford, whether men or women."

In the autumn of the same year, encouraged by the prospect of increasing business, Mr. Webster married the daughter of William Greenleaf, Esq., of Boston, a lady of a highly cultivated intellect, and of great elegance and grace of manners. His friend Trumbull speaks of this event in one of his letters to Wolcott, who was then at New York, in his characteristic vein of humor. "Webster has returned, and brought with him a very pretty wife. I wish him success; but I doubt, in the present decay of business in our profession, whether his profits will enable him to keep up the style he sets out with. I fear he will breakfast upon Institutes, dine upon Dissertations, and go to bed supperless." The result, however, was more favorable than it appeared in the sportive anticipations of Trumbull. Mr. Webster found his business profitable, and continually increasing, during his residence of some years in the practice of the law at Hartford.

This employment he was induced to relinquish, in 1793, by an interesting crisis in public affairs. General Washington's celebrated proclamation of neutrality, rendered necessary by the efforts of the French minister, Genet, to raise troops in our country for the invasion of Louisiana, and to fit out privateers against nations at peace with the United States, had called forth the most bitter reproaches of the partisans of France; and it was even doubtful, for a time, whether the unbounded popularity of the Father of his Country could repress the public effervescence in favor of embarking in the wars of the French revolution. In this state of things, Mr. Webster was strongly solicited to give the support of his pen to the measures of the administration, by establishing a daily paper in the city of New York. Though conscious of the sacrifice of personal ease which he was called upon to make, he was so strongly impressed with the dangers of the crisis, and so entirely devoted to the principles of Washington, that he did not hesitate to accede to the proposal. Removing his family to New York, in November, 1793, he commenced a daily paper, under the title of the Minerva, and afterward a semi-weekly paper, with that of the Herald, names which were subsequently changed to those of the Commercial Advertiser, and New York Spectator. This was the first example of a paper for the country, composed of the columns of a daily paper, without recomposition — a practice which has now become very common. In addition to his labors as sole editor of these papers, Mr. Webster published, in the year 1794, a pamphlet which had a very extensive circulation, entitled "The Revolution in France."

The publication of the treaty negotiated with Great Britain by Mr. Jay, in 1795, aroused an opposition to its ratification of so violent a nature, as to stagger for a time the firmness of Washington, and to threaten civil commotions. Mr. Webster, in common with General Hamilton and some of the ablest men of the country, came out in vindication of the treaty. Under the signature of Curtius, he published a series of papers, which were very extensively reprinted throughout the country, and afterward collected by a bookseller of Philadelphia in a pamphlet form. Of these, ten were contributed by himself, and two by Mr., afterward Chancellor, Kent. As an evidence of their effect, it may not be improper to state, that Mr. Rufus King expressed his opinion to Mr. Jay, that the essays of Curtius had contributed more than any other papers of the same kind, to allay the discontent and opposition to the treaty; assigning as a reason, that they were peculiarly well adapted to the understanding of the people at large.

When Mr. Webster resided in New York, the yellow fever prevailed at different times in most of our large Atlantic cities; and a controversy arose among the physicians of Philadelphia and New York, on the question whether it was introduced by infection, or generated on the spot. The subject interested Mr. Webster deeply, and led him into a laborious investigation of the history of pestilential diseases at every period of the world. The facts which he collected, with the inferences to which he was led, were embodied in a work of two volumes, octavo, which, in 1799, was published both in this country and in England. This work has always been considered as a valuable repository of facts; and during the prevalence of the Asiatic cholera in the year 1832, the theories of the author seemed to receive so much confirmation, as to excite a more than ordinary interest in the work, both in Europe and America.

During the wars which were excited by the French revolution, the power assumed by the belligerents to blockade their enemies' ports by proclamation, and the multiplied seizures of American vessels bound to such ports, produced various discussions respecting the rights of neutral nations in time of war. These discussions induced Mr. Webster to examine the subject historically; and, in 1802, he published a treatise full of minute information and able reasoning on the subject. A gentleman of competent abilities, who said he had read all that he could find on that subject, in the English, French, German, and Italian languages, declared that he considered this treatise as the best he had seen. The same year, he also published "Historical Notices of the Origin and State of Banking Institutions and Insurance Offices," which was republished in Philadelphia by one Humphrey, without giving credit to the author; and a part of which, taken from this reprint, was incorporated into the Philadelphia edition of Rees's Cyclopedia.

At this time, Mr. Webster resided at New Haven, to which place he had removed in the spring of 1798. For a short period after his departure from New York, he wrote for the papers mentioned above, which, although placed under the care of another editor, continued for a time to be his property. He very soon succeeded, however, in disposing of his interest in them, and from that time devoted himself entirely to literary pursuits.

In the year 1807, Mr. Webster published "A Philosophical and Practical Grammar of the English Language." This was a highly original work, the result of many years of diligent investigation. The author's views may be gathered from the motto on the title page, taken from Lord Bacon's Aphorisms, — "Antisthenes, being asked what learning was most necessary, replied, 'To unlearn that which is naught.'" He considered our English Grammars as objectionable in one important respect, namely, that of being too much conformed to those of the Latin and Greek languages in their nomenclature and classification. True philosophy, he maintained, requires us to arrange things, and give them names, according to their real nature. But our language is rude and irregular, in comparison with those of the ancients. It can not be reduced to the same orderly system. The several parts of it can not be brought under the same names and classifications. We need, therefore, a nomenclature of our own, in some important particulars. Thus the word pronoun properly denotes a substitute for a noun. But, in many cases, words of this class are substitutes for clauses, or parts of sentences, and not for single nouns. There are also other words, not ordinarily ranged among pronouns, which act equally as substitutes, that is, perform the office of pronouns. Mr. Webster, therefore, proposed to lay aside the word pronoun, and apply the term substitute to this whole class, as describing their true office. Other changes were proposed, of the same nature, and for the same reasons. No one, who examines the subject with attention, can doubt the advantages of Mr. Webster's nomenclature, in itself considered. It enabled him to give an analysis of sentences, and to explain constructions, in a manner incomparably superior to that of the ordinary systems. His intimate acquaintance with the sources of our language prepared him to account, in the most satisfactory manner, for many puzzling forms of expression. Still, the prejudice against a change of nomenclature is so great, that this work has been far less known than it ought to be. It contains much valuable matter found in no other work, and is believed to be the most truly philosophical Grammar which we have of the English language.

After publishing his Grammar, Mr. Webster entered, in the same year, (1807,) on the great work of his life, which he had contemplated for a long period, — that of preparing a new and complete Dictionary of the English language. As preliminary to this, he had published, in 1806, a dictionary in the octavo form, containing a large number of words not to be found in any similar work, with the definitions corrected throughout, though necessarily expressed in very brief terms. From this time, his reading was turned more or less directly to this object. A number of years were spent in collecting words which had not been introduced into the English dictionaries; in discriminating with exactness the various senses of all the words in our language, and adding those significations which they had recently received. Some estimate may be formed of the labor bestowed on this part of the work, from the fact that "The American Dictionary of the English Language" contained, in the first edition, twelve thousand words, and between thirty and forty thousand definitions, which are not to be found in any preceding work. The number has been swelled, by subsequent additions, to about thirty thousand new words. Seventy years had elapsed since the first publication of Johnson's Dictionary; and scarcely a single improvement had been attempted in the various editions through which it had passed, or the numerous compilations to which it had given rise, except by the addition of a few words to the vocabulary. Yet in this period the English mind was putting itself forth in every direction, with an accuracy of research and a fertility of invention which are without a parallel in any other stage of its history. A complete revolution had taken place in almost every branch of physical science; new departments had been created, new principles developed, new modes of classification and description adopted. The political changes which so signally marked that period, the excitement of feeling and conflict of opinion resulting from the American and French revolutions, and the numerous modifications which followed in the institutions of society, had also left a deep impress on the language of politics, law, and general literature. Under these circumstances, to make a defining dictionary adapted to the present state of our language, was to produce an entirely new work; and how well Mr. Webster executed the task, will appear from the decision of men best qualified to judge, both in this country and in Europe, who have declared that his improvements upon Johnson, are even greater than Johnson himself made on those who preceded him. Still more labor, however, was bestowed on another part of the work, viz., the etymology of our leading terms. In this subject, Mr. Webster had always felt a lively interest, as presenting one of the most curious exhibitions of the progress of the human mind. But it was not till he had advanced considerably in the work as originally commenced, that he found how indispensable a knowledge of the true derivation of words is, to an exact development of their various meanings. At this point, therefore, he suspended his labors on the defining part of the Dictionary, and devoted a number of years to an inquiry into the origin of our language, and its connection with those of other countries. In the course of these researches, he examined the vocabularies of twenty of the principal languages of the world, and made a synopsis of the most important words in each; arranging them under the same radical letters, with a translation of their significations, and references from one to another, when the senses are the same or similar. He was thus enabled to discover the real or probable affinities between the different languages, and, in many instances, to discover the primary, physical idea of an original word, from which the secondary senses have branched forth. Being thus furnished with a clew to guide him among the numerous, and often apparently inconsistent, significations of our most important words, he resumed his labors on the defining part of the Dictionary, and was able to give order and consistency to much that had before appeared confused and contradictory. The results of his inquiries into the origin and filiation of languages, were embodied in a work, about half the size of the American Dictionary, entitled "A Synopsis of Words in Twenty Languages." This, owing to the expense of the undertaking, has not yet been published; though its principal results, so far as our language is concerned, are briefly given in tracing the etymology of our leading terms.

During the progress of these labors, Mr. Webster, finding his resources inadequate to the support of his family at New Haven, removed, in 1812, to Amherst, a pleasant country town within eight miles of Northampton, Massachusetts. Here he entered, with his characteristic ardor, into the literary and social interests of the people among whom he was placed. His extensive library, which was open to all, and his elevated tone of thought and conversation, had naturally a powerful influence on the habits and feelings of a small and secluded population. It was owing, in part, probably, to his removal to this town, that an academy was there established, which is now among the most flourishing seminaries of our land. A question having soon after arisen respecting the removal of Williams College from a remote part of the state to some more central position, Mr. Webster entered warmly into the design of procuring its establishment at Amherst, as one of the most beautiful and appropriate locations in New England. Though the removal did not take place, so strong an interest on the subject was awakened in Amherst and the neighboring towns, that a new college was soon after founded there, in the establishment of which Mr. Webster, as president of its first board of trustees, had great influence, both by his direct exertions to secure it patronage, and by the impulse which he had given to the cause of education in that part of the state.

In 1822, Mr. Webster returned with his family to New Haven, and, in 1823, received the degree of LL. D. from Yale College.

Having nearly completed his Dictionary, he resolved on a voyage to Europe, with a view to perfect the work by consulting literary men abroad, and by examining some standard authors, to which he could not gain access in this country. He accordingly sailed for France in June, 1824, and spent two months at Paris in consulting several rare works in the Bibliothèque du Roi, and then went to England, where he remained till May, 1825. He spent about eight months at the University of Cambridge, where he had free access to the public libraries; and there he finished "The American Dictionary." He afterward visited London, Oxford, and some of the other principal cities of England, and in June returned to this country. This visit to England gave him an opportunity to become acquainted with literary men and literary institutions in that country, and to learn the real state of the English language there.

Soon after Dr. Webster returned to this country, the necessary arrangements were made for the publication of the work. An edition of twenty-five hundred copies was printed in this country, at the close of 1828, which was followed by an edition of three thousand in England, under the superintendence of E. H. Barker, Esq., editor of the Thesaurus Græcæ Linguæ of Henry Stephens. With the publication of the American Dictionary, at the age of seventy, Dr. Webster considered the labors of his literary life as brought, in a great measure, to a close. He revised a few of his earlier works for publication, and particularly his "History of the United States," a book designed for the higher classes of schools, for youth who are acquiring a taste for history, and for men of business who have not time to peruse larger treatises.

In 1840, Dr. Webster published a second edition of the American Dictionary, consisting of three thousand copies, in two volumes, royal octavo. The improvements consisted chiefly in the addition of a number of thousand words to the vocabulary, the correction of definitions in several of the sciences, in conformity with later discoveries and classifications, and the introduction and explanation of many phrases from foreign languages, and of foreign terms used in books of music.

In 1843, he published "A Collection of Papers on Political, Literary, and Moral Subjects," in one volume, octavo. This was composed chiefly of tracts and disquisitions, which had been published at an earlier period of his life, either in the form of pamphlets, or of papers read before literary and philosophical societies, and printed among their Transactions. It contains his "Observations on the French Revolution," his "Essay on the Rights of Neutral Nations," and the papers signed Curtius, in vindication of Mr. Jay's treaty with Great Britain. To these is added an elaborate dissertation "On the supposed Change in the Temperature of Winter," which was read before the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, in the year 1799. In this he controverts the opinion which has generally prevailed, that the temperature of the winter season, in northern latitudes, has suffered a material change, and become warmer in modern than it was in ancient times. The subject was one which required very great minuteness and extent of historical research, and this paper contains the result of a series of investigations, which had been carried on, in conjunction with the author's other pursuits, for a period of more than ten years. Many of the facts which it presents are of a very curious and striking nature. There is, probably, no other treatise which exhibits the historical evidence on this subject with so much fullness and accuracy. In addition to this, the volume contains a number of other papers of an interesting character, and the whole collection forms a truly valuable record of the author's earlier labors.

In thus tracing the principal events of Dr. Webster's life, we have reached the commencement of the year in which he died; and it may here be proper to pause for a moment, and consider some of those qualities and habits of mind, which prepared him for this long course of public service and literary labor. The leading traits in the character of Dr. Webster were enterprise, self-reliance, and indomitable perseverance. He was naturally of a sanguine temperament; and the circumstances under which he entered on the active duties of life, were eminently suited to strengthen the original tendencies of his nature. Our country was just struggling into national existence. The public mind was full of ardor, energy, and expectation. His early associates were men of powerful intellect, who were engaged, to a great extent, in laying the foundations of our government, and who have stamped the impress of their genius on the institutions of their country. As the advocate of the Federal Constitution, and a strenuous supporter of Washington's administration, he was brought into habits of the closest intimacy with Alexander Hamilton, John Jay, Oliver Wolcott, Timothy Pickering, and the other great men on whom Washington relied for counsel and aid in organizing the new government. The journal which he established at New York was their organ of communication with the public, in the great commercial emporium of the United States. He was thus placed on terms of constant and confidential intercourse with the leading members of the cabinet, and the prominent supporters of Washington throughout the country. While he had their respect as a ready and energetic writer, he enjoyed their counsel, imparted with the utmost freedom, as to the manner in which he might best conduct the defense of their common principles. The natural result, especially on a mind constituted like his, was the formation of all his habits of thought and action, into a resemblance to theirs. Energy, self-reliance, fearlessness, the resolute defense of whatever he thought right and useful, the strong hope of ultimate success, — these became the great elements of his intellectual character. He carried them with him, at a subsequent period, into all his literary pursuits, and they sustained him under the pressure of difficulties which would have crushed the spirit of almost any other man.

One of the habits which Dr. Webster formed in this early course of training, was that of arranging all his acquired knowledge in the most exact order, and keeping the elements of progressive thought continually within his reach. Although his memory was uncommonly quick and tenacious, he saw, as the editor of a daily journal, how idle and unsafe it is, to rely on mere recollection for the immense mass of materials which a public writer must have ever at command. He learnt, therefore, to preserve documents of all kinds with the utmost care. All that he had ever written, all that had been written against him, every thing that he met with in newspapers or periodicals which seemed likely to be of use at any future period, was carefully laid aside in its appropriate place, and was ready at a moment's warning. He had also a particular mark by which he denoted, in every work he read, all the new words, or new senses of words, which came under his observation. He filled the margin of his books with notes and comments containing corrections of errors, a comparison of dates, or references to corresponding passages in other works, until his whole library became a kind of Index Rerum, to which he could refer at once for every thing he had read.

Another habit which resulted in part from his early pursuits, was that of carrying on numerous and diversified employments at the same time. To men of the present generation, Dr. Webster is known chiefly as a learned philologist; and the natural inference would be, that he spent his whole life among his books, and chiefly in devotion to a single class of studies. The fact, however, was far otherwise. Though he was always a close student, — reading, thinking, and writing at every period of his life, — he never withdrew himself from the active employments of society. After his first removal to New Haven, he was for a number of years one of the aldermen of the city, and judge of one of the state courts. He also frequently represented that town in the legislature of the state. During his residence at Amherst, he was called, in repeated instances, to discharge similar duties, and spent a part of several winters at Boston as a member of the General Court. He entered with zeal into all the interests of the town and county where he lived, its schools and academies, its agriculture and mechanic arts, its advance in taste and refinement. He gave freely of his time, his counsel, and the efforts of his pen, when requested, in public addresses, or through the medium of the press, for the promotion of every kind of social improvement. Equally large and diversified was the range of his intellectual pursuits. There was hardly any department of literature which he had not explored with lively interest, at some period of his life. He wrote on a greater variety of topics than perhaps any other author of the United States; — on the foundations of government, the laws of nations, the rights of neutrals, the science of banking, the history of his country, the progress of diseases, and the variations of climate; on agriculture, commerce, education, morals, religion, and the great means of national advancement, in addition to the principal theme of his life, philology and grammar. Such was the activity of his mind, and the delight he found in new acquisitions, that a change of employment was all the relief he needed from the weariness of protracted study. The refreshment which others seek in journeys, or the entire suspension of intellectual effort, he found, during most of his life, in the stimulus afforded by some new and exciting object of pursuit. Mental exertion was the native element of his soul; and it is not too much to say, that another instance of such long-continued literary toil, such steady, unfaltering industry, can hardly be found in the annals of our country.

The last of those mental habits which will now be traced, was that of original investigation, of thorough and penetrating research. The period at which Dr. Webster came forward in public life was one, to an uncommon extent, in which every important subject was discussed in its principles. It was a period when the foundations of our civil polity were laid, and when such men as Hamilton, Madison, and Jay, became "the expounders of the constitution," and the advocates of the new government. All things conspired to make the discussions of that day masterly exhibitions of reasoning and profound investigation, — the character of the men engaged, the conflict of great principles, and the weighty interests suspended on the issue. Dr. Webster for some years took a large share in these discussions, both in pamphlets and through the journal which he conducted. The habits which he thus formed went with him into all the literary pursuits of his subsequent life. They made him a bold, original thinker, — thorough in all his investigations, and fearless in proclaiming the results. He had no deference for authority, except as sustained by argument. He was no copyist, no mere compiler. Every thing he wrote, from a chapter in "The Prompter," to his "Introduction to the American Dictionary," bore the same impress of original thought, personal observation, and independent inquiry.

It is unnecessary to say how perfectly these habits were adapted to prepare Dr. Webster for the leading employment of his life, the production of the American Dictionary. Nothing but his eager pursuit of every kind of knowledge, and his exact system in bringing all that he had ever read completely under his command, could have enabled him to give in his first edition more than twelve thousand words and forty thousand definitions, which could then be found in no other similar work. Nothing but his passion for original investigation prevented him from building, like Todd, on the foundation of Johnson, or arranging Horne Tooke's etymologies, like Richardson, with some additions and improvements, under their proper heads in a dictionary. But, commencing with the Diversions of Purley as the starting-point of his researches, he was led by the character of his mind to widen continually the field of his inquiries. He passed from the western languages to the eastern, in tracing the affinities of his native tongue. He established some of those great principles which have made etymology a science, and led the way in that brilliant career of investigation, by which the German philologists are throwing so clear a light on the origin and filiation of the principal languages of the globe. But into these studies he would never have entered, nor even thought of attempting such a work as an original dictionary of the English language, except under the impulse of those other traits, — that sanguine temperament, that spirit of self-reliance, that fearless determination to carry out every thing that he thought useful and true, to its utmost limits, — which were spoken of above, as forming the master principle of his character. It is difficult to conceive, at the present day, how rash and hopeless such an undertaking then appeared, on the part of any citizen of the United States. It was much as though we should now hear of a similar design by one of the settlers of New Holland. He was assailed with a storm of ridicule at home and abroad; and even his best friends, while they admired his constancy, and were fully convinced of his erudition, had strong fears that he was engaged in a fruitless effort, — that he would never have justice done him, in bringing his work before the world under such adverse circumstances. Nothing, plainly, but uncommon ardor, boldness, and self-confidence, could have sustained him under the pressure of these difficulties. But such qualities, it must be confessed, notwithstanding all the support they afford, are not without their disadvantages. They often lead to the adoption of hasty opinions, especially in new and intricate inquiries. Of this Dr. Webster was aware. He saw reason to change his views on many points, as he widened the sphere of his knowledge. In such cases, he retracted his former statements with the utmost frankness; for he had not a particle of that pride of opinion which makes men so often ashamed to confess an error, even when they have seen and abandoned it. This ardor of mind is apt, also, to lead men into a strength and confidence of statement which may wear at times the aspect of dogmatism. If Dr. Webster should be thought by any one to have erred in this respect, the error, it should be remembered, was one of temperament, — the almost necessary result of that bold, self-relying spirit, without which no man could have undertaken, much less have carried through, the Herculean task of preparing the American Dictionary. Those, however, who knew him best, can testify, that his strength of statement, however great it might be, was never the result of arrogance or presumption. He spoke from the mere frankness of his nature; he practiced no reserve; he used none of that cautious phraseology with which most men conceal their feelings, or guard against misconstruction. He was an ardent lover of truth, and he spoke of the discoveries which he believed himself to have made, much as he would have spoken of the same discoveries when made by others. He was aware that there must be many things in a book like this, especially on a science so imperfect in its development as etymology, which would not stand the test of time. But he never doubted, even in the darkest seasons of discouragement and obloquy, that he could at last produce such a work, that the world "should not willingly let it die." The decision of the public verified his anticipations, and freed him from the charge of presumption. Three very large editions, at a high price, have already been exhausted in this country and England. The demand is still increasing on both sides of the Atlantic; and the author might well be gratified to learn, that a gentleman who asked, some years since, at one of the principal bookselling establishments of London, for the best English dictionary on their shelves, had this work handed to him, with the remark, "That, sir, is the only real dictionary which we have of our language, though it was prepared by an American."

In his social habits, Dr. Webster was distinguished by dignified ease, affability, and politeness. He was punctilious in his observance of all the nicer proprieties of life. There was nothing that annoyed him more, or on which he remarked with greater keenness, than any violation of the established rules of decorum, any disposition to meddle with the concerns of others, or to encroach on the sanctity of those rights and feelings, which, as they can not be protected by law, must owe their security to delicacy of sentiment in an enlightened community. He had an uncommon degree of refinement in all his thoughts and feelings. Never, in his most sportive or unguarded moments, did any sentiment escape him which was coarse or vulgar. He had, in this respect, almost a feminine purity of mind. It might be truly said of him, as was remarked concerning one of his distinguished cotemporaries in public life, that he was never known to utter an expression which might not have been used with entire freedom in the most refined female society. In his pecuniary transactions, he was acknowledged by all to be not only just, but liberal. It was a principle with him, for life, never to be in debt. Every thing was paid for at the time of purchase. In all his dealings and social intercourse, he was remarkably direct, frank, and open. He had but one character, and that was "known and read of all men." Whatever faults might be imputed to him, no one ever suspected him of double dealing; no one ever thought he was capable of a mean or dishonorable action.

In the discharge of his domestic duties, Dr. Webster was watchful, consistent, and firm. Though immersed in study, he kept in his hands the entire control of his family arrangements, down to the minutest particulars. Every thing was reduced to exact system; all moved on with perfect regularity and order, for method was the presiding principle of his life. In the government of his children there was but one rule, and that was instantaneous and entire obedience. This was insisted upon as right, — as, in the nature of things, due by a child to a parent. He did not rest his claim on any explanations, or on showing that the thing required was reasonable or beneficial. While he endeavored to make it clear to his children that he sought their happiness in whatever he required, he commanded as one having authority, and he enforced his commands to the utmost, as a duty which he owed equally to his children and to God, who had placed them under his control. He felt that, on this subject, there had been a gradual letting down of the tone of public sentiment, which was much to be deplored. Many, in breaking away from the sternness of Puritan discipline, have gone to the opposite extreme. They have virtually abandoned the exercise of parental authority, and endeavored to regulate the conduct of their children by reasoning and persuasion, — by the mere presentation of motives, and not by the enforcement of commands. If such persons succeed, as they rarely do, in preserving any thing like a comfortable state of subordination in their families, they fail at least in the accomplishment of one great end for which their offspring were committed to their care. They send forth their children into life, without any of those habits of submission to lawful authority which are essential to the character of a good citizen and a useful member of society. In the intellectual training of his children, on the other hand, Dr. Webster had much less of system and complicated machinery, than many are disposed to adopt. His great principle was not to overdo, — to let nature have free scope, and to leave the development of the mind, within certain limits, to the operation of awakened curiosity directed to its proper objects. He therefore threw open his extensive library to his children at an early period of their lives, and said, in the words of Cotton Mather, "Read, and you will know." He felt that children should learn to acquire knowledge by severe effort; that the prevailing disposition to make every thing easy is unphilosophical and wrong; that the great object of early training is to form the mind into a capacity of surmounting intellectual difficulties of any and every kind. In his view, also, the young have much to learn in early life, the use of which they can not then comprehend. They must learn it by rote, particularly the spelling of so complicated a language as ours; and all those systems which lead forward children no faster than they can understand and apply every word they spell, he considered as radically erroneous. He wished, on the contrary, at this early period of ready memory and limited comprehension, to store the mind with many things which would afterward be found of indispensable use; things which are learnt with the utmost reluctance, or rather, in most cases, are not learnt at all, in the more advanced stages of intellectual progress. He felt that there must necessarily be much of drudgery in the formation of a thoroughly educated mind. He thought it wise, therefore, to commence those tasks which it involves, from the earliest period at which the youthful intellect can endure them. Upon these principles he constructed his Spelling Book, and other works for the use of children. He designed to make them instructive, and not mere books of amusement. Whether his views were incorrect or unphilosophical, the public will judge.

In respect to religion, Dr. Webster was a firm believer, during a large part of his life, in the great distinctive doctrines of our Puritan ancestors, whose character he always regarded with the highest veneration. There was a period, however, from the time of his leaving college to the age of forty, when he had doubts as to some of those doctrines, and rested in a different system. Soon after he graduated, being uncertain what business to attempt or by what means he could obtain subsistence, he felt his mind greatly perplexed, and almost overwhelmed with gloomy apprehensions. In this state, as he afterward informed a friend, he read Johnson's Rambler with unusual interest; and, in closing the last volume, he made a firm resolution to pursue a course of virtue through life, and to perform every moral and social duty with scrupulous exactness. To this he added a settled belief in the inspiration of the Scriptures and the governing providence of God, connected with highly reverential views of the divine character and perfections. Here he rested, placing his chief reliance for salvation on a faithful discharge of all the relative duties of life, though not to the entire exclusion of dependence on the merits of the Redeemer. In this state of mind he remained, though with some misgiving and frequent fluctuations of feeling, to the winter of 1807–8. At that time, there was a season of general religious interest at New Haven, under the ministry of the Rev. Moses Stuart, now a professor in the Andover Theological Seminary. To this Dr. Webster's attention was first directed, by observing an unusual degree of tenderness and solemnity of feeling in all the adult members of his family. He was thus led to reconsider his former views, and inquire, with an earnestness which he had never felt before, into the nature of personal religion, and the true ground of man's acceptance with God. He had now to decide not for himself only, but, to a certain extent, for others, whose spiritual interests were committed to his charge. Under a sense of this responsibility, he took up the study of the Bible with painful solicitude. As he advanced, the objections which he had formerly entertained against the humbling doctrines of the gospel, were wholly removed. He felt their truth in his own experience. He felt that salvation must be wholly of grace. He felt constrained, as he afterward told a friend, to cast himself down before God, confess his sins, implore pardon through the merits of the Redeemer, and there to make his vows of entire obedience to the commands and devotion to the service of his Maker. With his characteristic promptitude, he instantly made known to his family the feelings which he entertained. He called them together the next morning, and told them, with deep emotion, that, while he had aimed at the faithful discharge of all his duties as their parent and head, he had neglected one of the most important, that of family prayer. After reading the Scriptures, he led them, with deep solemnity, to the throne of grace, and from that time continued the practice, with the liveliest interest, to the period of his death. He made a public profession of religion in April, 1808. His two oldest daughters united with him in the act, and another, only twelve years of age, was soon added to the number.

In his religious feelings, Dr. Webster was remarkably equable and cheerful. He had a very strong sense of the providence of God, as extending to the minutest concerns of life. In this he found a source of continual support and consolation, under the severe labors and numerous trials which he had to endure. To the same divine hand he habitually referred all his enjoyments; and it was known to his family, that he rarely, if ever, took the slightest refreshment, of any kind, even between meals, without a momentary pause, and a silent tribute of thanks to God as the giver. He made the Scriptures his daily study. After the completion of his Dictionary, especially, they were always lying on his table, and he probably read them more than all other books. He felt, from that time, that the labors of his life were ended, and that little else remained but to prepare for death. With a grateful sense of past mercies, a cheering consciousness of present support, and an animating hope of future blessedness, he waited with patience until his appointed change should come.

During the spring of 1843, Dr. Webster revised the Appendix of his Dictionary, and added some hundreds of words. He completed the printing of it about the middle of May. It was the closing act of his life. His hand rested, in its last labors, on the volume which he had commenced thirty-six years before. Within a few days, in calling on a number of friends in different parts of the town, he walked, during one afternoon, between two and three miles. The day was chilly, and immediately after his return, he was seized with faintness and a severe oppression on his lungs. An attack of peripneumony followed, which, though not alarming at first, took a sudden turn after four or five days, with fearful indications of a fatal result. It soon became necessary to inform him that he was in imminent danger. He received the communication with surprise, but with entire composure. His health had been so good, and every bodily function so perfect in its exercise, that he undoubtedly expected to live some years longer. But though suddenly called, he was completely ready. He gave some characteristic directions as to the disposal of his body after death. He spoke of his long life as one of uniform enjoyment, because filled up at every stage with active labors for some valuable end. He expressed his entire resignation to the will of God, and his unshaken trust in the atoning blood of the Redeemer. It was an interesting coincidence, that his former pastor, the Rev. Mr. Stuart, who received him to the church thirty-five years before, had just arrived at New Haven on a visit to his friends. He called immediately; and the interview brought into affecting comparison the beginning and the end of that long period of consecration to the service of Christ. The same hopes which had cheered the vigor of manhood, were now shedding a softened light over the decay and sufferings of age. "I know in whom I have believed," — such was the solemn and affecting testimony which he gave to his friend, while the hand of death was upon him, — "I know in whom I have believed, and that He is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day." Thus, without one doubt, one fear, he resigned his soul into the hands of his Maker, and died on the 28th day of May, 1843, in the eighty-fifth year of his age.

In his person, Dr. Webster was tall, and somewhat slender, remarkably erect throughout life, and moving, even in his advanced years, with a light and elastic step.

Dr. Webster's widow survived him more than four years, and died on the 25th day of June, 1847, in the eighty-second year of her age. He had seven children who arrived at maturity, — one son, William G. Webster, Esq., who resides at New Haven, and six daughters. Of these, the oldest is married to the Hon. William W. Ellsworth, of Hartford, late governor, and now judge of the Supreme Court of Connecticut; the second to the author of this sketch; the third, now deceased, was first married to Edward Cobb, Esq., of Portland, Maine, and afterward to the Rev. Professor Fowler, of Amherst, Mass.; the fourth, also deceased, was married to Horatio Southgate, Esq., of Portland, Maine, and left at her death a daughter, who was adopted by Dr. Webster, and is now married to Henry Trowbridge, Jun., Esq., of New Haven; the fifth is married to the Rev. Henry Jones, of Bridgeport, Conn.; and the sixth remains unmarried, in the family of her brother.

In conclusion, it may be said that the name of NOAH WEBSTER, from the wide circulation of some of his works, is known familiarly to a greater number of the inhabitants of the United States, than the name, probably, of any other individual except the FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY. Whatever influence he thus acquired was used at all times to promote the best interests of his fellow-men. His books, though read by millions, have made no man worse. To multitudes they have been of lasting benefit, nor only by the course of early training they have furnished, but by those precepts of wisdom and virtue with which almost every page is stored.

INTRODUCTION.

DEFINITION OF LANGUAGE.

LANGUAGE or Speech is the utterance of articulate sounds or voices, rendered significant by usage, for the expression and communication of thoughts.

According to this definition, language belongs exclusively to intellectual and intelligent beings, and, among terrestrial beings, to man only; for no animal on earth, except man, can pronounce words. The word language is sometimes used in a more comprehensive sense, and applied to the sounds by which irrational animals express their feelings or affections; as to the neighing of the horse, the lowing of the ox, the barking of the dog, and to the cackling and chirping of fowls; for the sounds uttered by these animals are perfectly understood by the respective species. So also language is figuratively applied to the signs by which deaf and dumb persons manifest their ideas; for these are instruments of communicating thoughts.

But language in its proper sense, as the medium of intercourse between men, or rational beings, endowed with the faculty of uttering articulate sounds, is the subject now to be considered.

Written language is the representation of significant sounds by letters, or characters, single or combined in words, arranged in due order, according to usage.

ORIGIN OF LANGUAGE.

We read in the Scriptures, that God, when he had created man, "blessed them; and said to them, Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea," &c. God afterward planted a garden, and placed in it the man he had made, with a command to keep it, and to dress it; and he gave him a rule of moral conduct, in permitting him to eat the fruit of every tree in the garden, except one, the eating of which was prohibited. We further read, that God brought to Adam the fowls and beasts he had made, and that Adam gave them names; and that when his female companion was made, he gave her a name. After the eating of the forbidden fruit, it is stated that God addressed Adam and Eve, reproving them for their disobedience, and pronouncing the penalties which they had incurred. In the account of these transactions, it is further related that Adam and Eve both replied to their Maker, and excused their disobedience.

If we admit, what is the literal and obvious interpretation of this narrative, that vocal sounds or words were used in these communications between God and the progenitors of the human race, it results that Adam was not only endowed with intellect for understanding his Maker, or the signification of words, but was furnished both with the faculty of speech and with speech itself, or the knowledge and use of words as signs of ideas, and this before the formation of the woman. Hence we may infer that language was bestowed on Adam, in the same manner as all his other faculties and knowledge, by supernatural power; or, in other words, was of divine origin: for, supposing Adam to have had all the intellectual powers of any adult individual of the species who has since lived, we can not admit as probable, or even possible, that he should have invented and constructed even a barren language, as soon as he was created, without supernatural aid. It may indeed be doubted whether, without such aid, men would ever have learned the use of the organs of speech, so far as to form a language. At any rate, the invention of words and the construction of a language must have been by a slow process, and must have required a much longer time than that which passed between the creation of Adam and of Eve. It is, therefore, probable, that language, as well as the faculty of speech, was the immediate gift of God. We are not, however, to suppose the language of our first parents in paradise to have been copious, like most modern languages; or the identical language they used, to be now in existence. Many of the primitive radical words may and probably do exist in various languages; but observation teaches that languages must improve and undergo great changes as knowledge increases, and be subject to continual alterations, from other causes incident to men in society.

A BRIEF ACCOUNT OF THE ORIGIN AND PROGRESS OF THE PRINCIPAL LANGUAGES, ANCIENT AND MODERN, THAT HAVE BEEN SPOKEN BY NATIONS BETWEEN THE GANGES AND THE ATLANTIC OCEAN.

We learn from the Scriptures that Noah, who, with his family, was preserved from destruction by the Deluge, for the purpose of re-peopling the earth, had three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth. This fact, a little obscured by tradition, was retained by our rude German ancestors, to the age of Tacitus.*

Japheth was the eldest son; but Shem, the ancestor of the Israelites and of the writers of the Scriptures, is named first in order.

The descendants of Shem and Ham peopled all the great plain situated north and west of the Persian Gulf, between that Gulf and the Indian Ocean on the east, and the Arabic Gulf and the Mediterranean Sea on the west, with the northern coast of Africa; comprehending Assyria, Babylonia or Chaldea, Syria, Palestine, Arabia, Egypt, and Libya. The principal languages or dialects used by these descendants, are known to us under the names of Chaldee, or Chaldaic, which is called also Aramean, Syriac, Hebrew, Arabic, Ethiopic, Samaritan, and Coptic. Of these, the Chaldee and Hebrew are no longer living languages, but they have come down to us in books; the Samaritan is probably extinct or lost in the modern languages of the country, but the language survives in a copy of the Pentateuch; the Coptic is nearly or quite extinct, and little of it remains; the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic are yet living languages, but they have suffered and are continually suffering alterations, from which no living language is exempt.

These languages, except the Coptic, being used by the descendants of Shem, I call Shemitic, or Assyrian, in distinction from the Japhetic. As the descendants of Japheth peopled Asia Minor, the northern parts of Asia, about the Euxine and Caspian, and all Europe, their languages have, in the long period that has elapsed since their dispersion, become very numerous.

All languages having sprung from one source, the original words from which they have been formed must have been of equal antiquity. That the Celtic and Teutonic languages in Europe are, in this sense, as old as the Chaldee and Hebrew, is a fact not only warranted by history and the common origin of Japheth and Shem, but susceptible of proof from the identity of many words yet existing in both stocks. But there is a marked difference between the Shemitic and Japhetic languages; for even when the radical words are unquestionably the same, the modifications, or inflections and combinations which form the compounds, are, for the most part, different.

As it has been made a question which of the Shemitic languages is the most ancient, and much has been written to prove it to be the Hebrew, I will state briefly my opinion on what appears to me to be one of the plainest questions in the history of nations. We have for our certain guides, in determining this question — 1st, The historical narrative of facts in the Book of Genesis; and 2d, The known and uniform progress of languages, within the period of authentic profane history.

* Celebrant, carminibus antiquis, Tuistonem deum terrâ editum, et filium Mannum, originem gentis conditoresque. Manno tres filios assignant.—De Mor. Germ. 2.

"In ancient songs they celebrate Tuisto, a god sprung from the earth, and his son Mannus, [Man] the origin and founders of their nation To Mannus they assign three sons."

1. The Scripture informs us that, before the dispersion, the whole earth was of one language and of one or the same speech; and that the descendants of Noah journeyed from the east, and settled on the plain of Shinar, or in Chaldea. The language used at that time, by the inhabitants of that plain, must then have been the oldest or the primitive language of man. This must have been the original Chaldee.

2. The Scripture informs us, that in consequence of the impious attempts of the people to build a city, and a tower whose top might reach to heaven, with a view to make themselves a name and prevent their dispersion, God interposed and confounded their language, so that they could not understand each other; in consequence of which, they were dispersed "from thence over the face of all the earth."

3. If the confusion of languages at Babel originated the differences which gave rise to the various languages of the families which separated at the dispersion, then those several languages are all of equal antiquity. Of these the Hebrew, as a distinct language, was not one; for the Hebrew nation was of posterior origin.

4. All the words of the several great races of men, both in Asia and Europe, which are vernacular in their several languages, and unequivocally the same, are of equal antiquity, as they must have been derived from the common Chaldee stock which existed before the dispersion. The words common to the Syrians and Hebrews could not have been borrowed from the Hebrew; for the Hebrews originated from Heber and Abram, several centuries after Syria and Egypt were populous countries. This fact is attested by the Scripture history, which declares that when Abram migrated from Chaldea, and came into Canaan or Palestine, "the Canaanite was then in the land;" and when he returned from Egypt, "the Perizzite dwelt in the land." These declarations, and the history of Abimelech, and of the war of four kings or chieftains with five, as also of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, prove Syria to have been at that time well peopled. The language of the inhabitants, then, must have been coëval with the nation, and long anterior to the Hebrew as a distinct dialect. It may be added, that in the early periods of the world, when no books existed, nations, living remote or distinct, never borrowed words from each other. One nation living in the midst of another, as the Hebrews did among the Egyptians, may adopt a single word, or a few words; but a family of words thus adopted, is an occurrence rarely or never known. The borrowing of words, in modern times, is almost wholly from the use of books.

5. It is probable that some differences of language were produced by the confusion; but neither that event nor any supernatural event is necessary to account for the differences of dialect or of languages now existing. The different modern languages of the Gothic or Teutonic stock all originated in the natural course of events; and the differences are as great between them as they are between the languages of the Shemitic stock.

6. Soon after two races of men of a common stock have separated and placed themselves in distant countries, the language of each begins to diverge from that of the other, by various means. — 1. One tribe or nation will suffer one word to become obsolete and be forgotten; another will suffer the loss of another; sometimes a whole family of words will be lost; at other times, a part only; at other times, a single word only of a numerous family will be retained by one nation, while another nation will retain the whole. 2. The same word will be differently applied by two distant races of men, and the difference will be so great as to obscure the original affinity. 3. Words will be compounded by two nations in a different manner, the same radical words taking a different prefix or suffix, in different languages. Thus wisdom in English is in German weisheit, [wisehead, wisehood,] from wise, weis. The English mislead is in Danish förleder, from lead, leder. 4. The pronunciation and orthography of words will often be so much changed, that the same word in two languages can not, without difficulty, be recognized as identical. No person, without a considerable attention to the changes which letters have suffered, would at once suspect or believe the English let and the French laisser to be the same word.

7. As Abram migrated from Chaldea, he must have spoken the Chaldee language; and probably, at that time, the Syriac, Arabic, and Egyptian, had not become so different, as to render it impracticable for him to converse with the inhabitants of Palestine and Egypt. But the language of Abram's descendants, and that of the land of Shinar or the Chaldee, must, in the natural course of things, have begun to diverge soon after the separation; and the changes in each language, being different, would, in the course of a few centuries, form somewhat different languages. So in the days of Hezekiah, the Syriac and Hebrew had become, in a degree, distinct languages. 2 Kings xviii. In which of these languages the greatest number of alterations were produced, we do not know; but, from the general observations I have made in my researches, it appears that the Chaldee dialect, in the use of dental letters instead of sibilants, is much the most general in the Celtic and Teutonic languages of Europe. Thus the German only has a sibilant in wasser, when the other Teutonic languages have a dental, water. I think also that there are far more words in the European languages which accord with the Chaldee or Arabic, than there are words which accord with the Hebrew. If this observation is well founded, the Hebrew must have suffered the loss of more primitive words than the other languages of the Shemitic family. This, however, is true, that all of them have lost some words, and in some cases the Hebrew retains what the others have lost.

8 The Hebrew Scriptures are, by many centuries, the most ancient writings extant. Hence probably the strange inference, that the Hebrew is the oldest language; as if the inhabitants of Chaldea and Syria had had no language for ages before the progenitor of the Hebrews was born.

9. The vernacular words in the Celtic and Teutonic languages of modern Europe, which are evidently the same words as still exist in the Shemitic languages, are of the same antiquity; being a part of the common language which was used on the plain of Shinar, before the dispersion.

The descendants of Japheth peopled the northern part of Asia, and all Europe; or, if some colonies from Egypt planted themselves in Greece at an early period, they or their descendants must have been merged in the mass of Japhetic population. Certain it is, that the Greek language is chiefly formed on the same radical words as the Celtic and Teutonic languages.

The Japhetic tribes of men, whose descendants peopled the south and west of Europe, were first established in the country now called Persia, or, by the natives themselves, Iran. Of this fact, the evidence now existing is decisive. The numerous words found in the Greek, Latin, Gaelic, English, and the kindred tongues, which are still used in Persia, prove, beyond all question, that Persia must have been the residence of the people whose descendants introduced into Europe the languages from which the modern languages are derived. The fact proves further, that a great body of the original Persians remained in their own country, and their descendants constitute the mass of the population at this day.

In the early stages of society, men dwelt or migrated in families, tribes, or clans. The family of Abraham and Jacob in Asia, and the clans of the Gaels in Scotland, exhibit to us the manner in which societies and nations were originally formed. The descendants of a man settled around him, and formed a clan, or tribe, of which the government was patriarchal. Such families often migrated in a body, and often the personal characteristics of the progenitor might be distinctly traced in his descendants for many generations. In process of time, some of these families became nations; more generally, by means of wars and migrations, different tribes became blended, and the distinction of families was lost.

In rude ages, the families or tribes of men are named from some characteristic of the people; or, more generally, from the place of their residence. The Greeks gave the name of Scythia to the north of Europe and Asia, but the primitive inhabitants of the west of Europe they called Κελτοι, Kelts, Celts, a word signifying woods men.* These were descendants from the same ancestors as the Greeks and Romans themselves, but they had pushed their migrations into Gaul, Spain, and Britain. The first settlers or occupiers of these countries were driven forward by successive hordes, until they were checked by the ocean; there they made their stand, and there we find their descendants at this day. These may be considered as the descendants of the earliest settlers or first inhabitants of the countries where they are found. Among these are the inhabitants of France, south of the Garonne, and those of the north of Spain, called by the Romans Aquitani and Cantabri, in more modern times Gascoigns, Basques, and Cantabrians, who still retain their native language; and in Great Britain, the Gaels in Scotland, and the natives of the north and west of Ireland, who also retain their primitive language.*

* Welsh celt, a cover or shelter, a Celt: celtiad, an inhabitant of the covert or wood; celu, to conceal, Lat. celo. In Gaelic the word is coilt or ceilt. The Celts were originally a tribe or nation inhabiting the north of Italy, or the still more northern territory.

The first inhabitants of the north and west of Europe, known to the Greeks and Romans, to whom we are indebted for our earliest accounts of that region, were the Cimbri, who inhabited the peninsula of Denmark, now called Jutland, and the tribes which belonged to the Teutonic and Gothic races which were established in Germany and on both sides of the Baltic. Whether tribes of Celtic origin had overspread the latter countries before the arrival of the Gothic and Teutonic races, and all Europe had been inhabited by the Celts even to the borders of Sarmatia, has been a question much disputed by historians and antiquaries. The German and French writers generally contend that the Celts inhabited all the north of Europe, as far at least as Sarmatia; but some respectable English writers are of a different opinion. Now, it is agreed that the Welsh are descendants of the Cimbri, inhabitants of Jutland; and their language bears a strong affinity to the Celtic languages which still exist — a fact that countenances the opinion of the German and French writers. But the dispute is of little moment; the Celtic, Teutonic and Gothic races being all of the Japhetic stock, migrating from Asia through Asia Minor at different times, and pursuing different courses westward. The first tribes probably sought the warm climates along the north coast of the Mediterranean, and established themselves in Greece and Italy. Others followed the course of the Danube and its subsidiary streams, till they fell upon the rivers that conducted them to the Baltic. The first inhabitants of Greece and Italy were probably of the Celtic race; but if they were, it is very evident that tribes of the Teutonic or Gothic races invaded those countries before they were civilized, and intermingled with the original inhabitants. The Pelasgi may have been among the number. This is an inference which I draw from the affinities of the Greek and Latin languages with those of Teutonic origin. The Teutonic and Gothic races impressed their language upon all the continent of Europe west of the Vistula, and from that river to the Rhine, or rather to the Seine, anterior to the conquest of Gaul by Julius Cesar. The same races, invading and conquering the south of Europe, in the fourth and fifth centuries, on the downfall of the Roman empire, infused a portion of their language into the Italian and Spanish, which is still distinguishable.

The ancient Sarmatia, including Poland and Russia, was probably peopled originally by races of men who passed into Europe by the country north of the Euxine. Their original residence was along the Rivers Kur and Araxes, or on the mountains between the Euxine and Caspian. The name of the Russ or Russians is clearly recognized in the Roxolani of Pliny and Ptolemy, and possibly the ancestors of this race may have entered Europe by Asia Minor. That the Teutonic races, originally from Persia, inhabited Asia Minor, and migrated westward by that course, is evident from the names which they impressed on mountains, rivers, and places. Such are the Cragus of Pliny, the Welsh and English crag;† Perga in Pamphylia, now burg or bergen; Thymbreck, the name of a small stream near the site of Troy, a word in which we recognize the English brook; it was contracted by the Greeks into Thymbrius.‡

It is admitted by all gentlemen acquainted with Oriental literature, that the Sanscrit, or ancient language of India, the parent of all the dialects of that great peninsula, is radically the same language or from the same stock as the Greek and Latin; the affinities between them being remarkably clear and decisive. If so, the inhabitants of India and the descendants of the Celtic and Teutonic nations are all of one family, and must have all migrated from one country after the separation of the nations of the Shemitic stock from those of the Japhetic race.§

Whether that country was Persia, or Cashmir, or a country farther east, is a point not easily determined. One important inference results from this fact — that the white men of Europe, and the black or tawny men of India, are direct descendants from a common ancestor.

Of the languages of Europe, the Greek was first improved and refined, and next to that the Latin. The affinity between these languages and those of the west and north of Europe is very striking, and demonstrates their common origin. It is probable, however, that there are some words in the Greek derived from Africa, if Egyptian colonies were established in Greece, as historians inform us.

The modern Italian, Spanish, French, and Portuguese, are composed chiefly of Latin words, much altered, however, both in orthography and inflections. Perhaps nine tenths of all the words now found in those languages are of Latin origin; being introduced by the Romans, who held Gaul in subjection five or six centuries, and Spain much longer; or being borrowed from Latin authors since the revival of letters. All these languages, however, retain many words of Celtic origin; the primitive language not having been entirely extirpated. In some instances, the same word has been transmitted through both channels, the Celtic and the Latin, and is yet retained. Thus in French céder, and in Italian cedere, is directly from the Latin cedo; while the French congedier and Italian congedare are composed of the same word, with a prefix, derived from the Celtic, and retained in the Welsh gadaw, to quit, to leave, [L. concedo.] And this same verb probably appears also in quit, a word common to the Teutonic and to the Celtic languages. — See Conge, in the Dictionary.

It must be observed further, that the Spanish language contains some words of African origin, introduced by the Carthaginians before the Roman conquest of Spain, or afterward by the Moors, who for several centuries were masters of that country. It contains also some words of Gothic origin, introduced by the Goths, who conquered that country, at the downfall of the Roman empire. The French also contains some words of Teutonic origin, either from the Belgic tribes, who occupied the country to the Seine at the time of Cesar's invasion, or from the Franks, who established the dynasty of the Merovingian kings in the fifth century, or from the Normans, who obtained possession of the northern part of that kingdom in the tenth century, or from all these sources.

The German, Dutch or Belgic, Anglo-Saxon, Danish, and Swedish languages are of Teutonic or Gothic origin.‖ They are all closely allied; a great part of the words in them all being the same or from the same roots, with different prefixes or affixes. There is, however, a greater difference between the Danish and Swedish, which are of the Gothic stock, and the German and Dutch, which are of Teutonic origin, than between two languages of the same stock, as between the Danish and Swedish. The Norwegian, Icelandic, and some of the languages or dialects of Switzerland, belong to the same stock; but of these I have no particular knowledge.

The Basque or Cantabrian in Spain, the Gaelic in the north of Scotland, and the Hiberno-Celtic or native language of Ireland, are the purest remains of the ancient Celtic. From a comparison of a vocabulary of the Gaelic and Hiberno-Celtic, I find little or no difference between them; and from a long and attentive examination of this language, and of the languages of Teutonic origin, I find less difference between them than most authors have supposed to exist.

The Armoric or language of Brittany, in the north-west angle of France, and the Cornish, in the south-west of England, are also of Celtic origin. The Cornish is now extinct; but the Armoric is a living language.

* I purposely omit all consideration of the different families, tribes, or nations, which first peopled Greece and Italy. In Greece we read of the Γραικοι or Γραικοι, the Hellenes, the Achæans, the Dorians, the Æolians, the Ionians, the Pelasgi, &c.; in Italy, of the Illyrians, the Liburni, the Siculi, the Veneti or Heneti, the Iberi, Ligures, Sicani, Etrusci, Insubres, Sabini, Latini, Samnites, and many others. But as these nations or their descendants gave the name of Celts to the Umbri, or nations that dwelt in the north, in the less cultivated parts of Europe, and to the inhabitants of Gaul; and as all the tribes, under whatever denomination they were known, were branches of the great Japhetic stock, I shall call them by that general name, Celts; and under the general name of Goths or Teutons, shall comprehend the various tribes that inhabited the north of Germany, and the country north of the Baltic, or Scandinavia.

A late writer seems to consider the Teutonic races as the only ancestors of the Greeks and Romans. But from Celtic words still found in the Greek and Latin, words not belonging to any of the Gothic or Teutonic languages, it is demonstrably certain that the primitive settlers in Greece and Italy belonged to the Celtic races. Thus the Greek βραχιων, Lat brachium, the arm, is formed on the Gaelic braigh, raigh, W. braiç, a word not found among the Teutonic nations. So the Welsh mociaw, to mock, is found in the Greek μωκαομαι, and French moquer, to mock, and Ir. mogadh, a mocking; but not in any of the Gothic or Teutonic languages. Many similar facts prove that the Celtic races were among the earliest inhabitants of Greece.

† Plin. H. N. lib. 5, cap. 27. Strabo, lib. 7. 6, informs us that the Dalmatians had the singular practice of making a division of their fields every eighth year Hence perhaps the name, from deal, and math or madh, country.

‖ In strictness, the Swedish and Danish are of Gothic origin, and the German and Saxon, of Teutonic origin.

The English, as now spoken, is a language composed of words from several others. The basis of the language is Anglo-Saxon, or, as I shall, for the sake of brevity, call it, Saxon, by which it is closely allied to the languages of Teutonic and Gothic origin on the continent. But it retains a great number of words from the ancient languages of Britain, the Belgic or Lloegrian, and the Cymraeg or Welsh, particularly from the latter, and some from the Cornish. Cesar informs us, that before he invaded Britain, Belgic colonies had occupied the southern coast of England; and the inhabitants of the interior, northern and western parts, were the ancestors of the present Welsh, who call themselves Cymry, and their country Cymru, a name which indicates their origin from the Cimbri, inhabitants of the modern Denmark, or Cimbric Chersonese, now Jutland.

The modern Welsh contains many Latin words introduced by the Romans, who had possession of Britain for five hundred years. But the body of the language is probably their vernacular tongue. It is more nearly allied to the languages of Celtic origin than to those of the Teutonic and Gothic stock; and of this British language, the Cornish and Armoric are dialects.

It has been commonly supposed that the Britons were nearly exterminated by the Saxons, and that the few that survived escaped into the west of England, now Wales. It is true that many took refuge in Wales, which their descendants still retain; but it can not be true that the other parts of England were entirely depopulated. On the other hand, great numbers must have escaped slaughter, and been intermixed with their Saxon conquerors. The Welsh words, which now form no unimportant part of the English language, afford decisive evidence of this fact. It is probable, however, that these words were for a long time used only by the common people, for few of them appear in the early Saxon writers.

The English contains also many words introduced by the Danes, who were for some time masters of England; which words are not found in the Saxon. These words prevail most in the northern counties of England; but many of them are incorporated into the body of the language.

After the Conquest, the Norman kings endeavored to extirpate the English language, and substitute the Norman. For this purpose, it was ordained that all law proceedings and records should be in the Norman language; and hence the early records and reports of law cases came to be written in Norman. But neither royal authority, nor the influence of courts, could change the vernacular language. After an experiment of three hundred years, the law was repealed; and since that period, the English has been, for the most part, the official, as well as the common language of the nation. A few Norman words, however, remain in the English; most of them in law language.

Since the Conquest, the English has not suffered any shock from the intermixture of conquerors with the natives of England; but the language has undergone great alterations, by the disuse of a large portion of Saxon words, and the introduction of words from the Latin and Greek languages, with some French, Italian, and Spanish words. These words have, in some instances, been borrowed by authors directly from the Latin and Greek; but most of the Latin words have been received through the medium of the French and Italian. For terms in the sciences, authors have generally resorted to the Greek; and from this source, as discoveries in science demand new terms, the vocabulary of the English language is receiving continual augmentation. We have also a few words from the German and Swedish, mostly terms in mineralogy; and commerce has introduced new commodities of foreign growth or manufacture, with their foreign names, which now make a part of our language. Such are camphor, amber, arsenic, and many others.

The English, then, is composed of,

1st, Saxon and Danish words of Teutonic and Gothic origin.

2d, British or Welsh, Cornish and Armoric, which may be considered as of Celtic origin.

3d, Norman, a mixture of French and Gothic.

4th, Latin, a language formed on the Celtic and Teutonic.

5th, French, chiefly Latin corrupted, but with a mixture of Celtic.

6th, Greek, formed on the Celtic and Teutonic, with some Coptic.

7th, A few words directly from the Italian, Spanish, German, and other languages of the continent.

8th, A few foreign words, introduced by commerce, or by political and literary intercourse.

Of these, the Saxon words constitute our mother tongue, being words which our ancestors brought with them from Asia. The Danish and Welsh also are primitive words, and may be considered as a part of our vernacular language. They are of equal antiquity with the Chaldee and Syriac.

AFFINITY OF LANGUAGES.

On comparing the structure of the different languages of the Shemitic and Japhetic stocks, we can not but be struck with the fact, that although a great number of words consisting of the same or of cognate letters, and conveying the same ideas, are found in them all, yet in the inflections, and in the manner of forming compounds and derivatives, there are remarkable differences between the two great families. In the modifications of the verb, for expressing person, time, and mode, very little resemblance is observable between them. If we could prove that the personal terminations of the verb, in the Japhetic languages, were originally pronouns, expressive of the persons, we should prove an affinity between the words of the two races in a most important particular. Some attempts of this kind have been made, but not with very satisfactory results.*

In the formation of nouns, we recognize a resemblance between the English termination th, in birth, truth, drouth, [Saxon drugothe,] warmth, &c., and the Shemitic terminations ירת and ות; and the old plural termination en, retained in oxen, and the Welsh plural ending ion, coincide nearly with the Arabic termination of the dual number ان an, and the regular masculine plural termination ون on, as well as with the Chaldee, Hebrew, and Syriac ין in. And it is justly remarked by Mitford, that in the variety of plural terminations of nouns, there is a striking resemblance between the Arabic and the Welsh. There is one instance, in the modern languages of Teutonic origin, in which we find the Arabic nunnation: — this is the German and Dutch binnen, the Saxon binnan or binnon, signifying within, Hebrew and Chaldee בין, Ar. بين bin, without the mark of nunnation when it signifies within; but when it signifies separation, space, interval, the original sense, it is written بين, and pronounced, with the nunnation, like the Teutonic word binnon.

One mode of forming nouns from verbs in the Shemitic languages is by prefixing m. I know of no instance of this manner of formation in the Japhetic languages, except in some names which are of Oriental origin. Mars is said to be from αρης, but if so, the word was undoubtedly formed in the East. So we find Morpheus, the god of sleep, to be probably formed with the prefix m, from the Ethiopic ΛΟΖϬ aorf, to rest, to fall asleep; whence we infer that Morpheus is sleep deified.†

But as many words in all the languages of Europe and Asia are formed with prepositions, perhaps it may be found, on examination, that some of these prefixes may be common to the families of both stocks, the Japhetic and the Shemitic. We find in German gemüth, in Dutch gemoed, from muth, moed, mind, mood. We find mad in Saxon is gemaad; polish, the Latin polio, is in Welsh caboli; mail in Italian is both maglia and camaglia; belief in Saxon is geleaf, and in German glaube. We find that in the Shemitic languages, מלא signifies to fill or be full, and we find in the Arabic كمل kamala, has the same signification. In Syriac, ܓܠ gal, signifies to remove; and ܟܓܠ kagal, signifies to wander in mind, to be delirious. In Chaldee and Syriac, דמר is to wonder, precisely the Latin demiror, which is a compound of de and miror.

We find also that nations differ in the orthography of some initial sounds, where the words are the same. Thus the Spanish has

---

* According to Dr. Edwards, there is a remarkable resemblance between the Shemitic languages and the Muhhekaneew, or Mohegan, one of the native languages of New England, in the use of the pronouns as prefixes and affixes to verbs. — Observations, &c. p. 13.

† Ludolf, Col. 446, 447.

llamar, llorar, for the Latin clamo, ploro; and the Welsh has llawr, for the English floor, llabi, a tall, lank person, coinciding with flabby, llac for slack, and the like

As the prepositions and prefixes, in all languages, constitute an important class of words, being used in composition to vary the sense of other parts of speech, to an almost unlimited extent, it may be useful to give them a particular consideration.

The simple prepositions are, for the most part, verbs or participles, or derived from them; when verbs, they are the radical or primary word, sometimes varied in orthography by the addition or alteration of a single vowel, or perhaps, in some cases, by the loss of the initial consonant, or aspirate. Such are the Greek παρα, περι, κατα; the Latin con and per; the English for, which retain their original consonants. The following, of, by, in, on, un; the Latin ab, ad, pro, præ, re; the Greek απο, επι, προ, may have lost the initial or final consonants; of for hof; in for hin; ab for hab; pro for prod. In some words this loss can only be conjectured; in others, it is known or obvious. Thus the English by and be was originally big, as it is in the Saxon; and the Latin re is written also red, evidently a derivative of an Arabic verb still existing; the Latin sub and super are formed probably from the Greek ὑπο, ὑπερ, by the change of an aspirate into ς, or the Greek words have lost that letter. The English but in the phrase "They are all here but one," is a participle; the Saxon butan, or buton; Dutch buiten, from buiten, to rove. Among is the Saxon gemang the verb, or the participle of gemengan, to mingle.

In general, the primary sense of the preposition is moving, or moved. Thus to in English, and ad in Latin, primarily denote advancing toward a place or object; as in the sentence, "We are going to town." From, of, Lat. ab, Gr. απο, denote motion from a place or object. The French près is from the Italian presso, and this is the Latin participle pressus, pressed; hence it denotes near, close.

In some instances prepositions are compounds, as the English before; that is, be or by fore, by the front; and the French auprès, at or near.

Prepositions, from their frequent use, and from the ease with which their primary signification is modified to express differences of position, motion, or relation, as occasions demand, have, in many instances, a great variety of applications; not, indeed, as many as lexicographers sometimes assign to them, but several different, and sometimes opposite significations; as, for examples, the English for, with, the Latin con, and the Greek παρα. For, which is from the root of the Saxon faran, Greek πορευομαι, to pass, denotes toward, as in the phrase "A ship bound for Jamaica;" or it denotes in favor of, as, "This measure is for the public benefit;" or, "The present is for a friend." But it denotes also opposition or negation, as in forbear, forgive, forbid.

With is a verb, but has rather the sense of a participle. It is found in the Gothic with a prefix, ga-withan, to join or unite. Its primary sense, then, is joined, close; hence, in company; as in the sentences — "Go with him," "Come with me." It has the sense also of from, against, contrariety, opposition, as in withdraw, withstand, without. In Saxon it had also the sense of toward, as "with eorthan," toward the earth; also of for, denoting substitution or equivalent in exchange, as, "sylan with dæges weorce," to give for a day's work; also of opposite, over against, as, "with tha sæ," opposite the sea.

Con, in Latin, generally signifies with, toward or to, denoting closeness or union, approach, joint operation, and the like, as in concurro, conjungo, congredior; but it has also the sense of against or opposition, as in contendo.

The Greek παρα is doubtless from the root of the English fare, Saxon faran, to go, to pass. It signifies from, that is, departure — also at, to, Latin ad; near, with, beyond, and against.

To understand the cause of the different and apparently contrary significations, we are to attend to the primary sense. The effect of passing to a place is nearness, at, presso, près, and this may be expressed by the participle, or, in a contracted form, by the verb. The act of passing or moving toward a place, readily gives the sense of such prepositions as to, and the Latin ad, and this advance may be in favor or for the benefit of a person or thing, the primary sense of which may perhaps be best expressed by toward; "A present or a measure is toward him." But when the advance of one thing toward another is in enmity or opposition, we express the sense by against; and this sense is especially expressed when the motion or approach is in front of a person, or intended to meet or counteract another motion. Hence the same word is often used to express both senses, the context determining which signification is intended. Thus for in English, in the sentence, "He that is not for us is against us," denotes in favor of. But in the phrase "for all that," it denotes opposition. "It rains; but for all that, we will take a ride," that is, in opposition to that, or notwithstanding the rain, we will ride.

The Greek παρα, among other senses, signifies beyond, that is, past, and over, Hebrew עבר.

The prepositions which are used as distinct words, are called separable prepositions, or more generally prepositions: — those which are used only in composition, are called inseparable prepositions. For the sake of brevity, I give to all words or single letters, prefixed to other words in composition, the general name of prefixes.

One of the best modes of ascertaining the true sense of a preposition, is, to examine its various uses in composition, and discover what effect it has in modifying the signification of the word to which it is prefixed.

Prepositions, used in compounds, often suffer the loss or change of a letter, for the sake of euphony, or the ease of pronunciation. Thus ad in Latin becomes af in affero; con becomes col in colligo; the Greek παρα loses a letter in παρειμι, as does αντι in many words.

The following sketch of the principal prepositions and prefixes in several languages of Europe, will exhibit some of the affinities of these languages, and, in a degree, illustrate the uses of this class of words.

SAXON AND GOTHIC.

And, Saxon and Gothic, signifies against, opposite. This is the Greek αντι, and Latin ante, not borrowed from the Greek or Latin, but a native word. Examples, andstandan, to stand against, to resist; andswarian, answarian, to answer; that is, to speak again, against, or in return.

Amb, emb, ymb, usually emb, Saxon, signifying about, around; coinciding with the Latin amb, and Greek αμφι. Example, embfaran, to go around, to walk about; embutan, about; emb, about, and butan, without. See But. Ambeht, embeht, ymbeht, office, duty; whence we have embassador. This in Gothic is andbahtei; and a bailiff, minister, or servant, is andbahts. The Germans have the word contracted in amt, charge, office, Dutch ampt, Danish ambt. The Gothic orthography gives rise to the question, whether amb, emb, and αντι, Saxon and Gothic and, are not radically the same word; and it is very certain that the Gothic and Saxon and is radically the same word as the Latin in, Danish ind. So in Gothic, "and wigans," in the ways, into the highways, Luke xiv. 23; "and haimos," per vicos, through the towns, Luke ix. 6.

This preposition, amb, is in Dutch om; in German um; in Swedish and Danish om.

Be, in Saxon, as a preposition and prefix, is always written be, or big, answering to the English by, a preposition, and be in beset. In Gothic, it is written bi, by, and be, being contractions of big. The primary and principal signification is near, close; as, "Stand or sit by me." So in the word bystander. It is a prefix of extensive use in the Saxon, German, Dutch, Danish, and Swedish. Its use in denoting instrumentality, may be from the sense of nearness; but more probably it is from passing, like per, through; or it denotes proceeding from, like of; as, "Salvation is of the Lord."

For, in Saxon, as in English, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use. In Saxon, for signifies a-going, from faran, to go, to fare. It is radically the same word as fore, in the sense of in front, before. Its primary sense is advancing; hence moving toward; hence the sense of in favor of, and that of opposition, or negation. See the preceding remarks.

This word in German is für, but, with this orthography, the word is little used in composition. Yet the German has fürbitte, intercession, or praying for; fürwort, intercession, recommendation, and a pronoun, [for-word;] and für-wahr, forsooth.

In the sense of fore, the German has vor, a word of extensive use as a prefix. Thus in Saxon foreseon, to foresee, is in German vorsehen. The identity of these words will not be questioned. But in German, as in Dutch, the preposition ver, which is the English far, and Saxon fyr, is used in composition, in words in which the Saxon and English have for. Thus forgifan, to forgive, is in German vergeben, and in Dutch vergeeven — Saxon, forgitan, to forget; German vergessen; Dutch vergeeten. Hence we see that the Saxon for, fore, fyr, the English for, fore, far, and the German für, vor, and ver, are from the same radix.

In Dutch, for and fore are represented by voor, and ver represents for and far.

The Danish also unites for and fore, as does the Swedish.

The French has this word in pour, and the Spanish and Portuguese in por. The latter signifies not only for, but through, as in Portuguese, "Eu passarei por França," I will pass through France. Here we see the sense of moving. In Spanish and Portuguese, this word is written also para, as if from the Greek. It is evidently the same word, probably received through a different channel from that of por. Now, through is the exact sense of the Latin per; and per is the Italian preposition answering to for and por. But, what is more to the purpose, the Spanish, Italian, and Portuguese word, equivalent to the English forgive, is in Spanish perdonar, in Italian perdonare, and in Portuguese perdoar; and the French is pardonner. Here, then, we have strong if not conclusive evidence, that for, pour, por, per, par, and para, in different languages, are all from one stock, the word being varied in dialect, or by the different families; just as we have far, as well as the Saxon fyr, and the English forth, further, from the same primitive word. We have the same word in pursue and purchase, from the French pour.

The Greek has περαν, and παρα, probably from the same root, as well as προ ρευομαι, προ ρος.

Ga, in Gothic, which is ge in Saxon, is a prefix of very extensive use. In Saxon, it is prefixed to a large portion of all the verbs in the language. According to Lye, it has sometimes the sense of the Latin cum; but in most words I can not discern any effect of this prefix on the signification of the simple verb. It is retained in the Danish and in some German and Dutch words, especially in the participles of verbs, and in nouns formed from them. But it is remarkable that, although the Saxon is our mother tongue, we have not remaining in the language a single instance of this prefix, with the original orthography. The only remains of it are in the contraction a, as in awake, adrift, ashamed, &c., from gewæcan, awæcan; gedrifan, adrifan; gesceamian, ascamian. The letter y prefixed to verbs and participles used by Chaucer, as yberied, yblent, ybore, ydight, and a few others, is the remnant of the ge. The words yclad and ycleped are the last English words used in which this letter appears.

It is possible that the first syllable of govern, from Latin guberno, Greek κυβερναω, may be the same prefix; or it may be the Welsh prefix go, which occurs in goberu, to work, which the Romans wrote operor. But I know not whether the first syllable of govern is a prefix or not.

There is another word which retains this prefix corrupted, or its equivalent; this is common, which we have received from the Latin communis. This word in the Teutonic dialects is, Saxon gemæne; German gemein; Dutch gemeen; Danish gemeen; Swedish gemen. Now, if this is the Latin communis, — and of the identity of the last component part of the word there can, I think, be no doubt, — then the first part of the word is the Teutonic ge altered to com; or, what is more probable, com is the equivalent of ge, or ge may be a contracted and corrupted form of cum, com. In either case, we arrive at the conclusion that the Teutonic ge and the Latin cum are equivalent in signification.

In is used in the Saxon and Gothic, as in modern English. It is in German ein, Dutch and Swedish in, Danish ind, Greek εν, Latin in, French en. This is radically the same word as on and un, the German an, Dutch aan, and Welsh an. In its original sense, it implies moving, advancing toward; and hence its use as a particle of negation or contrariety. "Eunt in urbem," They are going to the city. "Hæc audio in te dici," I hear these things said against you. In modern military usage, on is used in the same sense of advancing; "The army is marching on Liege."

Mid, in Saxon, signifies with. It is the Gothic mith, German mit, Dutch mede or met, and the Greek μετα; but not retained in English. It seems to have the same origin as mid, middle, amidst. In the Gothic it is used as a prefix.

Mis, a prefix, is the verb miss, to deviate. It is used in Saxon, German, Dutch, Swedish, and Danish, in nearly the same sense as in English. Its radical sense is to depart, or wander.

Of is a preposition and prefix of extensive use in the Saxon, as in English. It denotes, primarily, issuing or proceeding from; hence separation, departure, and distance: in the latter sense, it is written off. It is the Latin ab, written by the early Romans af; the Greek απο, the German ab, the Dutch af, Danish and Swedish af. The Saxons often prefixed this word in cases where we use it after the verb as a modifier; as, of-drifan, to drive off; as it is still used by the Germans, Dutch, Swedes, and Danes. We retain it, as a prefix, in offset and offspring, Saxon of-spring. As it denotes proceeding from, it is the proper sign of the genitive case; the case expressing production.

Ofer, English over, Gothic ufar, German über, Dutch over, Danish over, Swedish ofver, is a preposition and prefix, in all the Teutonic and Gothic languages which I have examined; and in the same or similar senses. This seems to be the Greek υπερ, from which the Latins formed super by converting the aspirate of the Greek vowel into s. This is probably the Heb. Ch. Syr. Ar. עבר, to pass, a passing, beyond.

On is a Saxon preposition and prefix, of very extensive use. It is obviously a different orthography of in, and it is used for in in the Saxon; as, "on onginn," in the beginning. It has also the sense we now give to on and upon, with other modifications of signification.

In composition, on signifies into, or toward; as, on-blawan, to blow in; onclifian, to adhere, to cleave to; and it is also a particle of negation, like un; as, onbindan, to unbind. This on is only a different spelling of un, in Dutch on, German un, used as a word of negation. The Gothic has un and und, in the like sense, as the Danish has un; the Dutch ont. In this sense, un answers precisely to the Greek αντι, and as this is sometimes written und in Gothic, as in is written ind in Danish, there can be little doubt that in, on, un, αντι, are all from one stock. The original word may have been han, hin, or hon; such loss of the first letter is very common; and inn, from the Ch. and Heb. חנה, presents us with an example. See In and Inn, in the Dictionary.

The German has an, and the Dutch aan, in the sense of in and on.

Oth is a Saxon preposition and prefix, sometimes written ath and ed, and answering nearly to the Latin ad and re; as in oth-witan, contracted, to twit, to throw in the teeth. It has also the sense of from, or away, or against, as in othswerian, to abjure. This preposition is obsolete, but we have the remains of it in twit, and perhaps in a few other words.

Sam, samod, a prefix. See the Danish and Swedish, infra.

To is a preposition and prefix, of extensive use in our mother tongue. It occurs as a prefix in such words as to-brœcan, to break; to-beran, to bring or bear, [ad-ferre.] We retain it in together, Saxon togædere; and in toward, Saxon toward, towardes; and in tomorrow, today, tonight. The Dutch write it toe, and the Germans zu, and both nations use it extensively as a prefix. In Gothic it is written du, as in du-ginnan, to gin, that is, to begin.

It would be gratifying to learn whether the Ethiopic ፐ, which is prefixed to many verbs, is not the remains of the same preposition.

Un is a Saxon prefix, of extensive use as a privative or particle of negation. See On and In.

Under is a Saxon preposition and prefix, of considerable use in the present English sense. The Germans write it unter, and the Dutch onder, and use it in like manner. The Danes and Swedes write it under, and use it in the same sense.

Up, uppe, is a Saxon preposition and prefix, of considerable use in the present English sense. The Gothic has uf, in the sense of the Latin sub. The Germans write it auf, and the Dutch op, the Danes op, and the Swedes up, and all use it as a prefix.

Us, in Gothic, is a preposition and prefix. This is the German aus, and equivalent to the Latin ex. It is the Saxon ut, the English out, Dutch uit, Swedish ut, and Danish ud, dialectically varied. To this answers the Welsh ys, used in composition; but ys seems rather to be a change of the Latin ex, for the Latin expello is written in Welsh yspeliaw, and extendo is estyn.

Wither, in Saxon, from the root of with, denotes against, or opposition. It is a prefix in Saxon, written in German wider, in Dutch weder; Danish and Swedish veder. It is obsolete, but retained in the old law term withernam, a counter-taking or distress.

In the German language, there are some prepositions and prefixes not found in the Saxon; as,

Ent, denoting from, out, away.

Er, without, out or to. Danish er.

Nach, properly nigh, as in nachbar, neighbor; but its most common signification in composition is after; as in nachgehen, to go after. This sense is easily deducible from its primary sense, which is close, near, from urging, pressing, or following. In Dutch, this word is contracted to na, as in nabuur, neighbor; nagaan, to follow. The Russ has na also, a prefix of extensive use, and probably the same word. This fact suggests the question, whether the ancestors of these great families of men had not their residence in the same or an adjoining territory. It deserves also to be considered whether this na is not the Shemitic נ, occurring as a prefix to verbs.

Weg is a prefix used in the German and Dutch. It is the Saxon, German, and Dutch weg, way; in the sense of away, or passing from, from the verb, in Saxon wægan, wegan, to carry, to weigh, English to wag, the sense of which is to move or pass; as German wegfallen, to fall off or away.

Zer, in German, denotes separation.

In the Gothic dialects, Danish and Swedish, fra is used as a prefix. This is the Scottish fra, English from, of which it may be a contraction.

Fram in Swedish, and frem in Danish, is also a prefix. The primary sense is to go, or proceed, and hence it denotes moving to or toward, forth, &c., as in Danish fremfører, to bring forth; fremkalder, to call for. But in Danish, fremmed is strange, foreign, and it is probable that the English from is from the same root, with a different application. It may be from the same stock as the Gothic frum, origin, beginning, Latin primus, signifying to shoot forth, to extend, to pass along.

Gien, igien, in Danish, and igen, in Swedish, is the English gain in again, against. This is a prefix in both these Gothic languages. It has the sense of the Latin re, as in igienkommer, to come back, to return; of against, as in igienkalder, to countermand, or recall; of again, as gienbinder, to bind again. This may be the Latin con.

Mod, in Danish, and mot, emot, in Swedish, is a preposition, signifying to, toward, against, contrary, for, by, upon, out, &c.; as "mod staden," toward the city; modstrider, to resist; modgift, an antidote; modbör, a contrary wind; modvind, the same. This is the English meet, in the Gothic orthography, motyan, to meet, whence to moot.

O, in Swedish, is a negative or privative prefix, as in otidig, immature, in English, not tidy. It is probably a contracted word.

Paa in Danish, på in Swedish, is a preposition and prefix, signifying on, in, upon. Whether this is allied to be, by, and the Russ. po, I shall not undertake to determine with confidence; but it probably is the same, or from the same source.

Samman, signifying together, and from the root of assemble, is a prefix of considerable use in both languages. It answers to the Saxon sam, samod, equivalent to the Latin con or cum. It seems to be allied to same and the Latin similis.

Til, both in Danish and Swedish, is a prefix, and in Danish, of very extensive use. It is equivalent to the English to or toward, and signifies also at, in, on, by, and about, and in composition often has the sense of back or re, as in tilbage, backward, that is, to back; but generally it retains the sense of to or onward; as in tilbyder, to offer, that is, to speak or order to; tildriver, to drive on; tilgiver, to allow, to pardon, that is, to give to, and hence to give back, to remit. This is the English till, which we use in the same sense as the Danes; but in English it always refers to time, whereas in Danish and Swedish it refers to place. Thus we can not say, "We are going till town;" but we say, "Wait till I come, till my arrival;" literally, "Wait to I come, to my arrival;" that is, to the time of arrival. The difference is not in the sense of the preposition, but in its application.

The Scotch retain the Danish and Swedish use of this word; no slight evidence of their origin.

U in Danish, the Swedish O, is a prefix, equivalent to in, and is used as a privative or negative; as in uaar, an unseasonable year; uartig, uncivil.

RUSSIAN.

Vo, or ve, signifies in, at, by, and may possibly be from the same root as the English be, by. But see Po.

Za is a prefix signifying for, on account of, by reason of, after; as in zaviduyu, to envy, from vid, visage; viju, to see, Latin video; zadirayu, from deru, to tear; zamirayu, to be astonished or stupefied, from the root of Latin miror, and Russian mir, peace; miryu, to pacify, to reconcile; mirnie, pacific; zamirenie, peace, pacification; zamiriayu, to make peace; Arm. miret, to hold, to stop; the radical sense of wonder, astonishment, and of peace.

Ko, a preposition, signifying to, toward, for.

Na, a preposition and prefix, signifying on, upon, at, for, to, seems to be the German nach, Dutch na; as in nagrada, recompense; na, and the root of Latin gratia; nasidayu, to sit down, &c.

Nad, a preposition, signifying above or upon.

O, a preposition, signifying of or from, and for.

Ob, a preposition and prefix, signifying to, on, against, about; as, obnemayu, to surround, to embrace; ob and Saxon neman, to take.

Ot is a preposition, signifying from, and it may be the English out.

Po is a preposition and prefix of extensive use, signifying in, by, after, from, &c.; as, podayu, to give to; polagayu, to lay, to expend, employ, lay out; to tax or assess; to establish or fix; to believe or suppose; po and lay. This corresponds with English by, and the Latin has it in possideo, and a few other words. [Saxon besittan.] Pomen, remembrance, po and mens, mind.

Rad, a preposition, signifying for, or for the love of.

So, a preposition and prefix of extensive use, signifying with, of, from; and as a mark of comparison, it answers nearly to the English so or as.

Y, with the sound of u, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use. It signifies near, by, at, with, as uberayu, to put in order, to adjust, to cut, to reap, to mow, to dress, French parer, Latin paro; ugoda, satisfaction; ugodnei, good, useful, English good; udol, a dale, from dol.

WELSH.

The prefixes in the Welsh language are numerous. The following are the principal.

Am, about, encompassing; Saxon amb, Greek αμφι.

An. See Saxon In.

Cy, cyd, cyv, cym, implying union, and answering to cum, con, and co in Latin. Indeed cym, written also cyv, seems to be the Latin cum, and cy may be a contraction of it, like co in Latin. Ca seems also to be a prefix, as in caboli, to polish, Latin polio.

Cyn, cynt, former, first, as if allied to begin.

Di, negative and privative.

Dis, negative and precise.

Dy, iterative.

E and ec, adversative.

Ed and eit, denoting repetition, like re, Saxon ed, oth.

Es, separating, like Latin ex. See Ys.

Go, extenuating, inchoative, approaching, going, denotes diminution or a less degree, like the Latin sub; as in gobrid, somewhat dear. This seems to be from the root of English go.

Han, expressive of origination

Lled, partly, half.

Oll, all.

Rhag, before.

Rhy, over, excessive.

Tra, over, beyond; Latin trans.

Try, through.

Ym, mutual, reflective.

Ys, denoting from, out of, separation, proceeding from, answering to the Latin ex; as, yspeliaw, to expel. So es, Welsh, estyn, to extend.

Most of these prepositions, when used as prefixes, are so distinct as to be known to be prefixes.

But in some instances, the original preposition is so obscured by a loss or change of letters, as not to be obvious, nor indeed discoverable, without resorting to an ancient orthography. Thus, without the aid of the Saxon orthography, we should probably not be able to detect the component parts of the English twit. But in Saxon it is written edwitan and othwitan; the preposition or prefix oth, with witan, to disallow, reproach, or cast in the teeth.

It has been above suggested to be possible, that in the Shemitic languages, the נ in triliteral roots may be the same prefix as the Russian na, the Dutch na, and the German nach. Let the reader attend to the following words.

Hebrew נבט, to look, to behold, to regard. The primary sense of look is, to reach, extend, or throw.

Ch., to look; also to bud or sprout.

Ar. نبط nabata, to spring, or issue as water; to flow out; to devise or strike out; to draw out.

If the first letter is a prefix, the Hebrew word would accord with Latin video; the Chaldee, with video and with bud, Spanish botar, French bouton, bouter, to put, and English to pout, and French bout, end, from shooting, extending.

Ar. نبت nabatha, to bud; to germinate. See Ch. supra.

Heb. נבל naval, to fall; to sink down; to wither; to fall off, as leaves and flowers; to act foolishly; to disgrace. Derivative, foolish; a fool; נפל nafal, Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam., to fall.

Ch. נבל nabal, to make foul; to defile; that is, to throw or put on.

Ar. نبل nabala, to shoot, as an arrow; to drive, as camels; to excel; also to die; that is, probably, to fall.

Can there be any question, that fall, foul, and fool are this very word, without the first consonant? The Arabic, without the first consonant, agrees with Gr. βαλλω, and the sense of falling, then, is to throw one's self down.

Heb. נטר natar, to keep, guard, preserve, retain, observe.

Ch. to observe; to keep; to lay up.

Syr. and Sam. id.

Eth. ናጠረ natar, to shine.

Ar. نطر natara, to keep; to see; to look; to attend.

Remove the first letter, and this coincides with the Greek τηρεω.

No person will doubt whether נמל namal, to circumcise, is formed on מול mul.

Ch. נסר nasar, to cut; to saw. Syr. id. Lat. serra, serro.

Ar. نفد nafida, to fade, to vanish, to perish, to be empty, to fail.

Heb. נפח nafach, to blow, to breathe. Ch. Syr. Eth. Ar. id. from פוח, puach, to blow.

If the Shemitic נ in these and similar words is a prefix or the remains of a preposition, it coincides very closely with the Russ. and Dutch na, and the latter we know to be a contraction of the German nach. Now, the German nach is the English nigh; for no person can doubt the identity of the German nachbar and the English neighbor.

In the course of my investigations, I very early began to suspect that b, f, p, c, g, and k, before l and r, are either casual letters, introduced by peculiar modes of pronunciation, or the remains of prepositions; most probably the latter. I had advanced far in my Dictionary, with increasing evidence of the truth of this conjecture, before I had received Owen's Dictionary of the Welsh language. An examination of this work has confirmed my suspicions, or rather changed them into certainty.

If we attend to the manner of articulating the letters, and the ease with which bl, br, fl, fr, pl, pr, cl, cr, gl, gr, are pronounced, without an intervening vowel, even without a sheva, we shall not be surprised that a preposition or prefix, like be, pe, pa, po, or ge, should, in a rapid pronunciation, lose its vowel, and the consonant coalesce closely with the first letter of the principal word. Thus blank, prank, might naturally be formed from belank, perank. That these words are thus formed, I do not know; but there is nothing in the composition of the words to render it improbable. Certain it is, that a vast number of words are formed with these prefixes, on other words, or the first consonant is a mere adventitious addition; for they are used with or without the first consonant. Take the following examples: —

Hiberno-Celtic, or Irish, brac or brach, the arm, is written also raigh, Welsh braiç, whence βραχιων, brachium. Braigh, the neck, Sax. hraca, Eng. rack, Gr. ῥαχις. Fraoch, heath, ling, brake, L. erica.

Welsh llawr, Basque lurra, Eng. floor

Lat. floccus, Eng. flock or lock.

Sax. hraccan, Eng. to reach, in vomiting.*

Sax. hracod, Eng. ragged.

Ger. rock, Eng. frock.

Dutch geluk, Ger. gluck, Eng. luck.

Greek, Eolic dialect, βροδον, for ῥοδον, a rose.

Latin clunis, Eng. loin, G. lende, W. clun, from llun.

Eng. cream, Ger. rahm, Dutch room.

Sax. hlaf, Polish chlieb, G. leib, Eng. loaf.

Sax. hladan, Eng. to lade or load, Russ. kladu, to lay.

Greek κλινω, Lat. clino, Sax. hlinian, hleonan, Russ. klonyu, Eng. to lean.

Greek λαγηνος, Lat. lagena, Eng. flagon.

Sax. hrysan, Eng. to rush.

French frapper, Eng. to rap.

Sax. gerædian, to make ready; in Chaucer, greith, to make ready. Sax. hræd, quick; hradian, to hasten; hrædnes, Eng readiness.

Spanish frisar, to curl or frizzle; rizar, the same.

Sax. gerefa, Eng. reeve, G. graf, D graaf.

Lat. glycyrrhiza, from the Greek; Eng. liquorice.

But in no language have we such decisive evidence of the formation of words by prefixes, as in the Welsh.

Take the following instances, from a much greater number that might be produced, from Owen's Welsh Dictionary.

Blanc, a colt, from llanc.

Blith, milk, from lith.

Bliant, fine linen, from lliant.

Plad, a flat piece or plate, from llad.

Pled, a principle of extension, from lled.

Pledren, a bladder, from pledyr, that distends, from lled.

Pleth, a braid, from lleth, Eng. plait

Plicciaw, to pluck, from llig.

Plwng, a plunge, from llwng, our vulgar lunge.

Glyd, gluten, glue, from llyd.

Clav, sick, from llav.

Clwpa, a club, a knob, from llwb.

Clwt, a piece, a clout, from llwd, llwt.

Clamp, a mass, a lump.

Clawd, a thin board, from llawd.

Cledyr, a board or shingle, whence cledrwy, lattice, from lled.

Bran, Eng. bran, from rhan; rhanu, to rend.

Brid, a breaking out, from rhid.

Broç, noise, tumult, a brock, from rhoç.

Broç, froth, foam, anger, broçi, to chafe or fret, from brwc, a boiling or ferment, from rhwc, something rough, a grunt, Gr. βρυχω.

Bryd, what moves, impulse, mind, thought, from rhyd.

Brys, quickness, brysiaw, to hasten, to shoot along, from rhys, Eng. to rush, and crysiaw, to hasten, from rhys, to rush. [Here is the same word rhys, with different prefixes, forming brysiaw and crysiaw. Hence W. brysg, Eng. brisk.]

Graz, [pronounced grath,] a step, a degree, from rhaz, Lat. gradus, gradior.

Greg, a cackling, from rheg.

Grem, a crashing, gnash, a murmur, gremiaw, to crash or gnash, from rhem. Hence Lat. fremo, Gr. βρεμω.†

We have some instances of similar words in our own language; such are flag and lag; flap and lap; clump and lump.

There is another class of words which are probably formed with a prefix of a different kind. I refer to words in which s precedes

* H before l and r in Saxon corresponds to the Greek κ, and Latin c, before the same letters.

† I do not follow Owen to the last step of his analysis, as I am of opinion that, in making monosyllabic words to be compound, he often errs. For example, he supposes broç, a tumult, to be from rhoç, a broken or rough utterance; a grunt or groan; and this, to be a compound of rhy, excess, what is over or beyond, and oç, a forcible utterance, a groan. I believe rhoç to be a primitive uncompounded word, coinciding with the English rough.

Owen supposes plad, a flat thing, a plate, to be from llad, with py. Llad he explains, what is given, a gift, good things, and py, what is inward or involved. I have no doubt that the first letter is a prefix in plad, but, beyond all question, llad is from the same root as lled, breadth, coinciding with Lat. latus; both from a common root signifying to extend. But I do not believe llad or lled to be compound words.

Dug, a duke, Owen supposes to be formed on ug, over; which can not be true, unless the Latin dux, duco, are compounds. Dur, steel, he derives from ur, extreme, over; but doubtless it is from the root of the Latin durus.

So par, signifying what is contiguous, a state of readiness or preparation, a pair, fellow, or match, Owen makes a compound of py, and ar; py, as above explained, and ar, a word of various significations, on, upon, surface, &c. But there can be no doubt that par is from the root of the Latin paro, to prepare, being the Latin par, equal; the root of a numerous family of words not only in the Japhetic languages of Europe, but in the Shemitic languages of Asia. It certainly is not a Welsh compound, nor is there the least evidence to induce a belief that it is not an uncompounded word. Had the learned author of the Welsh Dictionary extended his researches to a variety of other languages, and compared the monosyllabic roots in them with each other, I think he would have formed a very different opinion as to their origin. I am very well convinced that many of the words which he supposes to be primitive or radical, are contractions, such as rhy, lle, lly, the last consonant being lost.

another consonant, as scalp, skull, slip, slide, sluggish, smoke, smooth, speed, spire, spin, stage, steep, stem, swell, spout. We find that tego, to cover, in Latin, is in Greek στεγω; the Latin fallo is in Greek σφαλλω. We find μαραγδος is written also σμαραγδος; and it may be inquired whether the English spin is not from the same root as πηνη, web or woof, πηνιον, a spindle, πηνιζω, to spin. Sprout in English is in Spanish brota.

We find the Welsh ysbrig, the English sprig, is a compound of ys, a prefix denoting issuing or proceeding from, like the Lat. ex, and brig, top, summit.

Ysgar, a separate part, a share; ysgar, ysgaru, to divide; ysgariaw, to separate, is composed of ys and car, according to Owen; but the real root appears distinctly in the Gr. κειρω. This is the English shear, shire.

Ysgegiaw, to shake, by laying hold of the throat, to shake roughly, is a compound of ys and cegiaw, to choke, from ceg, the mouth, an entrance, a choking. This may be the English shake; Sax. sceacan.

Ysgin, a robe made of skin; ys and cin, a spread or covering.

Ysgodi, to shade; ysgawd, a shade; ys and cawd.

Ysgrab, what is drawn up or puckered, a scrip; ys and crab, what shrinks. See Eng. crab, crabbed.

Ysgravu, to scrape; ys and crav, claws, from rhav.

Ysgreç, a scream, a shriek, ysgreçiaw, to shriek, from creç, a shriek, creçian, to shriek, from creg, cryg, hoarse, rough, from rhyg, rye, that is, rough; the grain so named from its roughness. This is the English rough, Lat. raucus. Here we have the whole process of formation, from the root of rough. We retain the Welsh creçian, to shriek, in our common word to creak, and with a formative prefix, we have shriek, and our vulgar screak. The Latin ruga, a wrinkle, Eng. rug, shrug, are probably from the same source.

Ysgrivenu, to write, Lat. scribo, from ysgriv, a writing, from criv, a mark cut, a row of notches; criviaw, to cut, to grave; from rhiv, something that divides. Hence scrivener.

Ysgub, a sheaf or besom, ysgubaw, to sweep, Lat. scopæ, from cub, a collection, a heap, a cube.

Ysgud, something that whirls; ysgudaw, to whisk or scud; from cud, celerity, flight; ysguth, ysguthaw, the same.

Ysgwth, a push; ysgwthiaw, to push or thrust; from gwth, gwthiaw, the same; probably allied to Eng. shoot. The Welsh has ysgythu, to jet or spout, from the same root.

Yslac, slack, loose; yslaciaw, to slacken; from llac, loose, slack, llaciaw, to slacken, from llag, slack, sluggish; allied to Eng. lag and slow.

Yslapiaw, to slap, to flap, from yslab, what is lengthened or distended, from llab, a flag, a strip, a stroke. Llabi, a tall, lank person, a stripling, a looby, a lubber, is from the same root; llabiaw, to slap.

Ysled, a sled, from lled, says Owen, which denotes breadth; but it is probably from the root of slide, a word probably from the same root as lled, that is, to extend, to stretch along.

Ysmot, a patch, a spot; ysmotiaw, to spot, to dapple, from mod, Eng. mote.

Ysmwciaw, ysmygu, to dim with smoke, from mwg, smoke. So smooth, from Welsh mwyth.

Yspail, spoil, from pail, farina, says Owen. I should say from the root of palea, straw, refuse, that is, from the root of peel, to strip. Yspeiliota, to be pilfering.

Yspeliaw, to expel, from pel, a ball, says Owen; but this is the Latin expello, from pello. Ball may be from the same root.

Yspig, a spike, a spine; yspigaw, to spike; from pig, a sharp point, a pike. Hence Eng. spigot.

Yspin, a spine, from pin, pen.

Ysgynu, to ascend, Lat. ascendo, from cyn, first, chief, foremost. The radical sense is to shoot up.

Yslwç, a slough, from llwc, a collection of water, a lake.

Yspar, a spear, from pâr, a cause or principle of producing, the germ or seed of a thing, a spear. This consists of the same elements as ber, a spit, and Eng. bar; and in Italian bar is sbarra. The primary sense is to shoot, thrust, drive.

Yspinc, a finch, from pinc, gay, fine, brisk; a sprig, a finch.

Ysplan, clear, bright; ysplana, to explain; from plan, that is parted off, a ray, a shoot, a planting, a plane; whence plant, a child; Eng. a plant; planu, to shoot, as a plant. Hence splendor, W. ysplander.

Ysporthi, to support, from porth, a bearing, a port, passage, &c. Lat. porta, porto.

Ystac, a stack, a heap; ystaca, a standard; from tag, a state of being stuffed or clogged.

Ystad, a state; ystadu, to stay; from tad, that spreads, a continuity. The primary sense is to set.

Ystain, that is spread; a stain; tin, Lat. stannum; ystaeniaw, to spread over, to stain; ystaenu, to tin, or cover with tin; from taen, a spread, a layer. Qu. is tin from spreading?

Ystawl, a stool, from tawl, a cast or throw. The sense is to set, to throw down. Tawl is the root of deal.

Ystor, a store, that forms a bulk, from tor, a swell, a prominence.

Ystorm, a storm, from torm, that is stretched, but the sense is a rushing.

Ystrym, a stream, from trym, compact, trim, that is, stretched, straight, from extending.

Ystwmp, a stump, from twmp, a round mass, a tump.

Yswatiaw, to squat, from yswad, a throw, or falling down, from gwad, a denial; gwadu, to deny or disown. If this deduction is correct, the sense of denial is a throwing or thrusting back, a repelling. It is so in other words.

Yswitiaw, to chirp, twitter, from yswid, that makes a quick turn. Qu. twitter.

In some of the foregoing words, it appears evident that the Welsh prefix ys is an alteration of the Latin ex, and the words in which this is the case were probably borrowed from the Latin, while the Roman armies had possession of England. But there is a vast number of words, with this prefix, which are not of Latin origin; and whether ys is a native prefix in the Welsh, may be a question. One thing is certain, that s before another consonant, and coalescing with it, is, in a great number of words, a prefix.

The modern Italian affords abundant proof of the extensive use of s, as the remains or representative of ex; as, sballare, to unpack, unbale; sbarbato, beardless; sbattere, to abate; sbrancare, to pluck off branches; scaricare, to discharge; scommodare, to incommode; sconcordia, discord; scornare, to break the horns; scrostare, to pull off the crust; and a great number of others.

Now, if the same manner of forming words with this prefix has actually prevailed among the northern nations of Europe, we may rationally suppose that many English words, and perhaps all of this class, are thus formed. Thus scatter may be formed from a root in Cd; shape, from Cb, Cf, or Cp; skill, from the root of Lat. calleo; slip, from the root of Lat. labor; smart, from the root of Lat. amarus, bitter, Heb. מר; smite, from the root of Latin mitto; span, from the root of pan, to stretch; spar, from the root of bar; speak, from the root of Lat. voco; speed, from a root in Pd, perhaps Lat. peto; steal, from the root of Lat. tollo; steep, from the root of deep; stretch, from the root of reach; sweep, from the root of wipe; swan, from wan, white; swell, from the root of to well, Sax. wellan, to boil, &c. That many English and other Teutonic and Gothic words are thus formed, appears to be certain.

These facts being admitted, let us examine a little further. In Russ. svadiba is a wedding. Is not this formed on the root of wed, with s for a prefix? Svara is a quarrel. Is not this formed on the root of vary, variance, or of spar? Sverlo is a borer; qu. bore and veru; svertivayu, to roll; qu. Lat. verto; skora, furs, peltry; qu. Fr. cuir; skot, a beast; qu. cattle; skupayu, to purchase in gross; qu. cheap, Dan. kioben, and its root; slabei, weak; qu. Lat. labor, lapsus; slagayu, to fold; qu. lay, and plico; slivayu, to pour out liquors; qu. Lat. libo; slupayu, to peel off bark or skin; qu. Lat. liber; snimayu, to take away; qu. Sax. neman, to take; snova, new; qu. Lat. novus; snig, sneig, snow, Fr. neige. The Lat. nivis is from this root, with g opened to v. Russ. spletayu, to plait, &c.

The Russ. prefix so occurs in a great number of words; sobirayu, to collect or assemble, precisely the Heb. and Ch. צבר.

It now becomes an interesting question, to determine how far any analogy exists between the languages of the Japhetic and Shemitic families in regard to prefixes. For example, in the Shemitic languages, ב is a prefix of extensive use, corresponding almost exactly with the English and Dutch by, the Saxon be, and German bei. This preposition and prefix has several senses in the Saxon which are now obsolete; but its present prevailing sense occurs in all the Shemitic languages. ברוח קדים עזה, by a strong east wind. Ex. xiv. 21. Compare the following definitions of this preposition; the Sax. from Lye, and the Shemitic from Castle.

Sax. de, e, ex, in, secus, ad, juxta, secundum, pro, per, super, propter, circa.

Heb. Ch. Syr. in, e, ex, cum, propter, usque ad, adeo ut, ad, super, per, contra, ante

Eth. in, per, pro, propter, cum, secundum, apud.
Ar. in, cum, propter, per, ad, erga.

In Numbers xiv. 34, it signifies according to, or after; במספר הרמים, according to the number of days. This signification is now perhaps obsolete in English, but was common in the Saxon; as, "be his mægnum," according to his strength; pro viribus suis. So "be tham mæstan," by the most, is now expressed by, at the most.

Now, it is remarkable that this word in Hebrew, Arabic, and Persic, is the preposition used in oaths, precisely as it is in English. Gen. xxii. 16, בי, By myself have I sworn. Arabic, billah, or by Allah; Persic, بخدا bechoda, or begoda, by God, the very words now used in English. The evidence, then, is decisive, that the Shemitic prefix ב is the Teutonic be, by, bei, contracted, and this Teutonic word is certainly a contraction of big, which is used in the Saxon, especially in compound words, as in bigspell, [by-spell,] a fable; bigstandan, to stand by. This prefix, then, was in universal use by the original stock of mankind, before the dispersion; and this word alone is demonstrative proof of the common origin of the Shemitic and Teutonic languages. Now, it is equally certain that this is the prefix b, and probably p, before l and r, in block, braigh, and a multitude of words in all the modern languages; and, probably, the same letter is a prefix in many Shemitic words.

We know that be in the Saxon bedælan, and Dutch bedeelen, is a prefix, as the simple verb is found in all the Teutonic and Gothic languages. The Hebrew and Chaldee בדל corresponds exactly, in elements and in signification, with the Saxon and Dutch. Whether the first letter is a prefix in the latter languages, let the reader judge. See the word Deal, which, when traced, terminates in the Welsh tawl, a cast off, a throw; separation; tawlu, to cast or throw off, to separate.

In Chaldee, בדר badar, signifies to scatter, to disperse. The word has the same signification in the Syriac and Samaritan.

In Ethiopic, the word, with ለ prefixed, signifies to wish, love, desire; and with ተ prefixed, to strive, to endeavor; and without a prefix, strife, course, race. Both these significations are from stretching, straining.

In Arabic, بدر badara, signifies generally to hasten, to run to; but بذر bathara, signifies to disperse, to sow or scatter seed.

This verb is written in Hebrew בזר, with precisely the same signification. The Arabic, also, has the verb with this orthography, signifying to sow, and also to beat or strike with a stick.

Now, in Syriac, ܕܰܪ dar, signifies to strive or struggle. Here we have the simple verb, without the prefix, with the sense of the Ethiopic with a prefix. Supra.

We find also the Arabic ذر tharra, the simple verb, signifies to sprinkle.

We find in Chaldee דרא, דרה, and דרי, the simple verb, signifies to disperse; in Syriac, the same. In Arabic ذرا tharaa, signifies to sow, like the foregoing verb, and hence to procreate. Both this and the former verb signify also to whiten, as the hair of the head; as we say, to sprinkle with gray hairs. The Arabic ذرا daraa, signifies to drive, to impel, to repel, to contend, to strive; to shine, to sparkle. And here we have the literal signification of this whole class of verbs; to drive, urge, throw, send; hence to scatter, to strive, to shoot as rays of light, procreate, &c.

The Hebrew corresponding verb is זרה or זרע, to scatter, to sow; and the word with the like orthography occurs in Ch. Syr. and Ar. This is the Latin sero. And who can doubt that ב is a prefix in the verb בדר above mentioned?

In Welsh, goberu signifies to work, to operate; gober, work, operation; formed by the prefix go and per; go denoting progress toward, approach; and per rendered by Owen, that pervades, a fruit, a pear; but the real sense is to strain, to bring forth; to drive, thrust, urge, &c.

This word, in the Armoric dialect, is written either gober or ober; in Latin operor, whence Eng. operate. The same word is in the Ethiopic, ገበረ gaber, to make, to do; አገበረ agabar, to cause to be made; ተገበረ tagabar, to work, operate, negotiate; ገባሪ gabar, a maker.

This is the Heb. and Ch. גבר, to be strong, to prevail, to establish; and as a noun, a man; Ar. جبر jabara, to make strong, to heal, as a broken bone; to strengthen.

That this Shemitic word and the Welsh and Ethiopic are all radically one, there can not be a question; and the Welsh proves, indisputably, that go is a prefix. This, then, is a word formed on בר or ברא. The Heb. אבר, strong, that is, strained, and אבר, a wing, that is, a shoot, are from the same root; and in Arabic ابر abara, signifies to prick, to sting, and its derivatives, the extremity of a thing, a point, a needle, corresponding with the Welsh bar, a summit, a tuft, a branch, a bar, and the Welsh ber, a pike, a lance, a spit, a spear, Lat. veru; in Welsh, also, pâr, a spear, and per, a spit, are all doubtless of the same origin.

In Syriac, ܨܒܰܪ tsabar, signifies to make, to work or operate. Is this the same root with a different prefix?

The same word in Arabic, صبر tsabara, signifies to be patient, to bear, to sustain.

We observe, that in the Teutonic and Gothic languages, the same word is used with different prefixes. Thus, in our mother tongue, begin is written gynnan, the simple radical word, and aginnan, beginnan, and ongynnan; and in the Gothic, duginnan, which, in English, would be togin.

Should it appear, upon investigation, that verbs in the Assyrian languages have the same prefixes which occur in the European languages, the fact will evidence more affinity between the languages of these two stocks than has yet been known to exist.

Let us now attend to the natural causes which may be supposed to have obscured or destroyed the identity or resemblance of languages which had a common origin.

The affinity of words, in two or more different languages, is known by identity of letters and identity of signification; or by letters of the same organ, and a signification obviously deducible from the same sense. Letters of the same organ, as, for example, b, f, p, and v, are so easily converted, the one into the other, and the change is so frequent, that this circumstance seldom occasions much obscurity. The changes of signification occasion more difficulty, not so much by necessity, as because this branch of philology is less understood.

1. CHANGE OF CONSONANTS WHICH REPRESENT THE ARTICULATIONS OF THE ORGANS OF SPEECH.

Consonants are the stamina of words. They are convertible and frequently converted into their cognates. The English word bear represents the Latin fero and pario, and fero is the Greek φερω. The Latin ventus is wind in English; and habeo is have. The Latin dens, in Dutch, Danish, and Swedish, is tand; and dance in English is in German tanz.

These changes are too familiar to require a multiplication of examples. But there are others less common and obvious, which are yet equally certain. Thus in the Gaelic or Hiberno-Celtic, m and mb are convertible with v; and in Welsh, m and v are changed, even in different cases of the same word. Thus, in Irish, the name of the hand is written either lamh or lav, and in Welsh maen, a stone, is written also vaen. The Greek β is always pronounced as the English v, as βουλομαι, Lat. volo, English will, German wollen; and the sound of b the Greeks express by μβ.

In the Chaldee and Hebrew, one remarkable distinction is the use of a dental letter in the former, where the latter has a sibilant. As כות cuth in Chaldee is כוש cush in Hebrew; דהב, gold, in Chaldaic is זהב in Hebrew. The like change appears in the modern languages; for water, which in most of the northern languages is written with a dental, is in German written wasser and the Latin dens, W. dant, Dutch tand, Swedish and Danish tand, is in German zahn. The like change is frequent in the Greek and Latin. Φραττω, in one dialect, is φρασσω, in another; and the Latins often changed t of the indicative present, or infinitive, into s in the preterit and participle; as, mitto, mittere, misi, missus.

L and r, though not considered as letters of the same organ, are really such, and changed the one into the other. Thus the Spaniards write blandir for brandish, and escolta for escort. The Portuguese write brando for bland, and branquear, to whiten, for blanch. The Greek has φραγελλιον for the Latin flagellum. In Europe, however, this change seems to be limited chiefly to two or three nations on the coast of the Mediterranean. L is sometimes commutable with d.

We have a few instances of the change of g or gh into f. Thus rough is pronounced ruf, and trough, trauf.

The Russians often change the d of a noun into the sound of j, or the compound g, in the verb formed from that noun; as, lad, accord, harmony; laju, to accord or agree; bred, damage, loss; breju, to injure.

The Italians and French have also changed a dental into a palatal letter, in many words; as, Italian raggio, a ray, from Lat. radius; and ragione, reason, from ratio; Fr. manger, to eat, from Lat. mando, or manduco.

In the south of Europe, the Greek χ has been changed, in some instances, into the Italian or Spanish z, and then by the French into s. It seems that the Spanish z has, at some former period, been pronounced as a guttural. Thus the Gr. βραχιων, Lat. brachium, the arm, is in Spanish brazo, and the Spaniards have the word from the Latin, or from the same source as the Latin and Greek, the Celtic braiç. This word brazo the French changed into bras, and from that we have brace and embrace. A similar change occurs in Durazzo, from Dyrrachium, and in the Spanish luz, light.

The Teutonic nations often used h to express the power of the Greek κ, and the Latin c; as, heart for καρδια, horn for cornu. Hence we find that the Saxon hlinian, hleonian, or hlynian, to lean, is the Greek κλινω, Latin clino. The letter h is now dropped, and we write the word lean.

In like manner, the Saxon hlid, which we now write lid, is from the same root as the Latin claudo, cludo, the Greek κλειδοω, which is contracted into κλειω. And in this word we may notice another fact, that the word signifies not only to shut, but to praise or celebrate; proving that this word and the Latin plaudo are the same, with different prefixes, as laudo; and that the primary sense is, to strain. This in Saxon appears in hlud, loud, hlydan, to cry out.

In Latin, f and h have been converted; as, hordeum for fordeum; and the Spaniards now write h for f; as, hacer for the Latin facere; hilo for filum; herir for ferire, &c.

The letters r and s are commutable. Thus iron in German is eisen; in D. yzer.

The letters n and s seem also to be commutable; as in Latin pono, posui.

The letters l and r are convertible; for the English colonel is in Spanish and Portuguese coronel, and in Armoric coronal.

The cause of these differences is in the position of the organs in the articulations; the position being nearly but not exactly the same.

2. CHANGE OF VOWELS.

The change of vowels is so common, as to occasion no difficulty in determining the sameness of words; indeed, little or no regard is to be had to them, in ascertaining the origin and affinity of languages. In this opinion I accord with almost all writers on this subject; but I have to combat the opinion of that elegant scholar, Sir William Jones, who protests against the licentiousness of etymologists, not only in transposing letters, but in totally disregarding the vowels, and who seems to admit the common origin of words only when written with the same letters, and used in a sense precisely the same.*

I am not at all surprised at the common prejudice existing against etymology. As the subject has been treated, it is justly liable to all the objections urged against it. But it is obvious that Sir W. Jones had given very little attention to the subject, and that some of its most common and obvious principles had escaped his observation. His opinion, with regard to both articulations and vowels, is unequivocally erroneous, as will appear from the following list of words, taken from modern languages, and respecting the identity of which, that gentleman himself, if living, could not have the slightest doubt.

English.	Saxon.	Dutch.	German.	Swedish.	Latin.
draw, drag,	dragan,	trekken,	tragen,	draga,	traho.
give,	gifan,	geeven,	geben,	gifva.
foot, feet,	fot, fet,	voet,	fuss,	fot,	pes, Gr. πους.
hook,	hoc,	haak,	haken,	hake.
day,	dag, dæg,	daag,	tag,	dag.
have,	habban,	hebben,	haben,	hafva,	habeo.
	[Fr. avoir; ai, as, a, avons, avez, ont.]
leap,	hleapan,	loopen,	laufen,	löpa.
burn,	byrnan,	branden,	brennen,	brinna.
will,	willan,	willen,	wollen,	willja, volo, velle.
stone,	stan,	steen,	stein,	sten.
broad,	bred,	breed,	breit,	bred.
earth,	eorth,	aarde,	erde,	jord, Dan. iord.
who,	hwa,	wie,		ho, Dan. hvo.
seek,	secan,	zoeken,	suchen,	sökia,	sequor.
bean,	bean,	boon,	bohne,	böna, Dan. bönne.

Here are scarcely two words written with the same letters in two languages; and yet no man ever called in question their identity, on account of the difference of orthography. The diversity is equally great in almost all other words of the same original. So in the same words we often find the vowel changed, as in the Lat. facio, feci; ago, egi; sto, steti; vello, vulsi. Nothing is more certain than that the Welsh gwyz and the English wood are the same word, although there is one letter only common to them both. It is pronounced gooyth, that is, g and wyth; as, guard for ward. This prefixing of g to words which in English begin with w, is very common in Spanish and French. The word war in French is guerre; Sp. guerra.

3. CHANGE OR LOSS OF RADICAL LETTERS.

There are some words which, in certain languages, have suffered a change of a radical letter; while in others it is wholly lost. For example, word, in Danish and Swedish, is ord: wort, a plant, is urt; the Saxon gear, or ger, English year, in Danish is aar, in Swedish is ar, in Dutch jaar, and in German jahr.

In the word yoke, and its affinities, we have a clear and decisive example of changes in orthography. Yoke, the Latin jugum, is from the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic זוג zug, to join, to couple; a word not found in the Hebrew. The Greeks retained the original letters in ζυγος, ζυγοω; the Latins changed the first letter to j in jugum, and inserted a casual n in jungo. From the Latin the Italians formed giogo, a yoke, and giugnere, to join; the Spaniards, yugo, a yoke, and juntar, to join; the French, joug, a yoke, and joindre, to join. In Saxon, yoke is geoc or ioc; in Dutch, juk; G. joch; Sw. ok.

One of the most general changes that words have undergone, is the entire loss of the palatal letter g, when it is radical and final in verbs, or the opening of that articulation to a vowel or diphthong. We have examples in the English bow, from Saxon bugan, to bend; buy, from bycgan; brow, from breg; lay, from lægan, or lecgan; say, from sægan; fair, from fæger; flail, from the German flegel, Lat. flagellum; French nier, from Lat. nego, negare

The same or similar changes have taken place in all the modern languages of which I have any knowledge.

The loss and changes of radical letters in many Greek verbs deserve particular notice. We find, in the Lexicons, πραγμα, πραγος, πραχτικος, are referred to πρασσω, πραττω, as the theme or root; ταγμα, to τασσω; ῥητωρ, to ῥεω; and φραγμα, to φρασσω. This reference, so far as it operates as a direction to the student where to find the verb to which the word belongs, and its explanation, is useful and necessary. But if the student supposes that these words are formed from the theme, so called, or the first person of the indicative mode, present tense, he is deceived. I am confident no example can be found, in any language, of the palatals γ and κ, formed from the dentals and sibilants τ and σ; nor is ῥητωρ, or any similar word, formed by the addition of the dental to a verb ending in a vowel. The truth is, the last radical in ῥεω is lost, in the indicative mode; and in πρασσω, πραττω, it is changed. The radical lost in ῥεω is δ or θ; the original word was ῥεδω or ῥεθω, and the derivatives ῥητωρ, ῥητορικη, were formed before the radical letter was dropped in the verb. No sooner is the verb restored to its primitive form, than we recognize its connection with the Irish raidham, to speak; Saxon ræd, speech; rædan, to read; German reden, rede; Dutch raad, &c.

* Asiatic Researches, vol. 3, p. 489.

The original root of πραασσω was πραγω, πραχω, or πρακω, and from this were formed πραγμα, πρακτικος, before the last radical was changed. No sooner is the original orthography restored, than we see this to be the Teutonic verb, German brauchen, Dutch gebruiken, Danish bruger, Sw. bruka, Sax. brucan, to use, to practice, and hence the English broker.

The same remarks are applicable to ταγμα and ταασσω; φραγμα and φραασσω; αλλαγη and αλλασσω; χαρακτηρ and χαραασσω, and many other words of like formation. In all these cases, the last radical letter is to be sought in the derivatives of the verb, and in one of the past tenses, particularly in an aorist. This fact affords no feeble evidence that in Greek, as in the Shemitic languages, the preterit tense or an aorist was the radix of the verb. Κραζω, in Greek, is to cry like a crow or rook; but the last radical is changed from γ, as, in the second aorist, it forms κραγειν. Now, in Danish, crow is krage, in Ger. krähe, in D. kraai, in Sw. kråka; a fact that demonstrates the last radical letter to be a palatal, which in English is opened to o, in crow.

But it is not in the Greek language only that we are to seek for the primitive radical letters, not in what is now called the root of the verb, but in the derivatives. The fact is the same in the Latin and in the English. The Latin fluctus and fluxi can not be deduced from fluo; but the orthography of these words proves demonstrably that the original root was flugo, or fluco. So, in English, sight can not be deduced from see, for no example can be found of the letter g introduced to form the participles of verbs. Sight, in Saxon gesicht, D. zigt, G. sicht, Dan. sigt, Sw. sickt, is a participle; but the verb in the infinitive, in Saxon is seon, geseon, Ger. sehen, D. zien, Dan. seer, Sw. se; in which no palatal letter is found, from which g or ch can be deduced. The truth, then, is, that the original verb was segan, or in Dutch zegen; the g being lost, as it is in the French nier, from the Lat. nego.

In the change of letters in the Greek verbs before mentioned, the process seems to have been from γ or κ to ξ, and then to σ and τ; πραγω, πραξω, πρασσω, πραττω. This is certainly a process which is natural and common. The Latin brachium thus became in Spanish brazo, and then in French bras; and thus in the Italian, Alexandria has become Alessandria.

When the last radical of a Greek verb is a dental, it may not be certain whether the original letter was d, or th, or t. We find the Greek verb σπαω, to draw, forms its derivatives with σ, σπασμα, σπασις; and this is probably the Armoric spaza, from which we have spay. So φραζω, φρασις, and φραδη, are evidently of the same family. It is not improbable that the original letter might have a compound sound, or it might correspond nearly to the Arabic ظ or ض, or the English dh or th, or ds, so as easily to pass into d or into s.

It is equally clear that many Greek words have lost an initial consonant. The letter most generally lost is probably the Oriental ה, but obviously the palatals γ and κ have, in many instances, been dropped. There seems to be no question that the Greek ὁλος is the English whole, and perhaps all. This in Welsh is oll or holl, in Saxon al or geall; and this is undoubtedly the Shemitic כל. So the Greek ολλυμι is the Welsh colli, to lose; and ειλεω may be the English coil, Fr. cueillir.

In like manner the Greek has, in many words, lost a labial initial, answering to the English b, f, or v. The Greek ειδω is undoubtedly the Latin video; εργον is from the same root as work; ιδιος is from the root of vid, in the Latin divido, and individuus, that is, separate, and from the Arabic بدّ badda, to separate.

In many instances, the Latin retained or restored the lost letter; thus hamaxa for ἁμαξα, harpago for αρπαγη; harmonia for ἁρμονια; video for ειδω.

If the marks of breathing, called spiritus asper and spiritus lenis, now prefixed to Greek words, were intended to represent the letters lost, or to stand in the place of them, they answer this purpose very imperfectly. The spiritus asper may stand for a palatal or guttural letter, but it does not designate which letter, the ה, or the כ; much less does this or the other spiritus justly represent the labials, b, f, v, or w. Whenever the Latins wrote h in the place of the Greek spiritus, we may conclude that the original letter was ה, or a cognate letter; and we may conclude also that the v in video, and in divido, viduus, individuus, stands for the original labial lost in ειδω and ιδιος. But there are many words, I apprehend, in which the lost letter is unknown, and in which the loss can not be recovered by any marks prefixed to the words. We may well suppose that hymnus exhibits the correct written form of ὑμνος; but what is there in the Greek ὑφη to lead us to consider this word as the English woof, and ὑφαω to be the same as weave? Both the Greek words have the spiritus asper.

What proportion of Greek words have been contracted by the loss of an initial or final consonant, can not, I apprehend, be determined with any precision; at least, not in the present state of philological knowledge. It is probable the number of contracted words amounts to one fourth of all the verbs, and it may be more.

Similar contractions have taken place in all other languages; a circumstance that embarrasses the philologist and lexicographer at every step of his researches, and which has led to innumerable mistakes in etymology. We know that the Swedish år, and Danish aar, a year, have lost the articulation g, and that the English y in year is the representative of g, as j is in the Dutch jaar, and German jahr: for the g is found in our mother tongue; and in a multitude of words, one language will supply the means of determining the real origin or true orthography, which can not be ascertained by another. But doubtless many changes have taken place, of which the evidence is uncertain; the chain which might conduct us to the original orthography being broken, and no means now remain of repairing the loss.

In no language has the rejection or change of consonants served so effectually to obscure the original words as in the French. So extensive have been the changes of orthography in that language, that, had not the early lexicographers indicated the loss of letters by a mark, it would be impossible now to discover the original orthography, or to trace the connection of words with other languages, in a large portion of them. And it is with regret we observe the influence of the French practice of suppressing consonants extending itself to other countries. It is owing to the most servile obsequiousness of nations, that Basil or Basilea, the elegant name of a town in Switzerland, has been corrupted to Basle, and pronounced most barbarously Bale. The Germans are pursuing a like course in suppressing the palatal letters; a most unfortunate circumstance for the strength of the language.

The Italians also have a disposition to reject letters when they interfere with their habits of pronunciation; and hence we see, in their language, piano, written for plano; fiore for flore; fiocco for flocco; a change that has removed a radical consonant, and thus obscured, or rather destroyed, the affinity between the Italian and the Latin words.

Another difference of writing and pronouncing has been produced by the change of a sibilant letter into an aspirate; or, e converso, by the change of an aspirate into a sibilant. No person doubts whether the Latin super is the Greek υπερ; or ὁμαλος is similis; or ἁλς is sal, salt. The latter in Welsh is halen, hal. So helyg, a willow, in Welsh, is in Latin salix. The Greek ἑπτα is the Latin septem, English seven. This in Persic is هفت heft or haft, which approaches the Greek ἑπτα. It has been commonly supposed that, in this case, the aspirate in Greek has been converted into an s. There are, however, strong reasons for believing that the change has been the reverse, and that s has been dropped, and its place supplied by an aspirate. The word seven is, beyond a question, the Shemitic שבע, שבת, whence שבת, Eng. sabbath; and the Gaelic sean, old, whence Latin senex, in Welsh hen, seems clearly to be the Ar. سنّ sanna, to be old. It is then clear that in these words s is radical. It is probable, however, that the aspirate, in some cases, has been changed into s.

It deserves to be noticed that the radix of a word is sometimes obscured, in Greek and Latin, by the loss or change of a radical letter in the nominative case. We find in Latin nepos, in the nominative, is nepotis in the genitive; honos, honoris, &c. In these changes, I suppose the letter restored in the oblique cases to be the true radical letter. Thus adamant has been deduced by our etymologists from the Greek α negative and δαμαω, to subdue, on the supposition that the stone was named from its hardness. This is a good example of a great part of all etymological deductions; they are mere conjectures. It did not occur to the inquirer that adamas, in the nominative, becomes in the genitive adamantis; that n is radical, and that this word can not be regularly deduced from the Greek verb. Any person, by looking into a Welsh dictionary, may see the original word.

In some words, it is not easy to determine whether n before d is casual or radical. In such words as the Latin fundo, to pour, and tundo, to beat, there is reason to think the n is casual, for the preterit is formed without it, fudi, tutudi. But in other words n before d seems to be radical, and the d casual; as in fundo, fundare, to found. For this word coincides with the Irish bun, foundation, and with the Shemitic בנה banah, to build. So the English find is in Swedish finna, and in is in Danish ind.

Another fact, of considerable consequence, is the casual sound of n given to g, which produced the effect of doubling the γ in Greek, and of occasioning the insertion of n before g in the Latin, as also in the Teutonic and Gothic languages. Thus we see the γ is doubled in the Greek αγγελλω, and we know, in this case, how the change originated; for the original word is in the Gaelic and Irish, agalla. So γ is prefixed to another palatal or guttural letter in αγχω, ογχος, εγγιζω.

A similar nasal sound of g probably introduced the n before g in lingo, to lick; linquo, to leave.

We may be confident, in all cases, that n is not radical, when it is dropped in the supine and participle, as in lictum, lictus, from linquo. When n is retained in the supine and participle, there may be more reason for doubt; but in this case, the question may often be determined by the corresponding word in another language, or by some other word evidently of the same family. Thus we can have little doubt that lingo and the English lick are the same word, or that the Lat. lingua and ligula are of one family.

This casual insertion of n in words of this class must be carefully noticed by the etymologist, or he will overlook the affinity of words which are evidently the same. We have many words in English which are written with n before a g or a k, when the ancient words in the Gothic and Teutonic languages, and some of them in the modern Danish and Swedish, are written without n. Thus sink, in Gothic, is sigcwan; to think, is thagkyan. It is not improbable that the Gothic word was pronounced with the sound of n or ng, as in English. So also in sigguan, to sing; laggs, long. In a few instances we find the Swedes and Danes have the word written in both ways, as tanka, tænker, and tycka, tykker, to think. But, in general, the Germans, Danes, Swedes, and Dutch, write words of this sort with ng.

To show how important it is to know the true original orthography, I will mention one instance. In our mother tongue, the word to dye, or color, is written deagan; the elements or radical letters are dg. To determine whether this and the Latin tingo are the same words, we must first know whether n in tingo is radical or casual. This we can not know with certainty, by the form of the word itself, for the n is carried through all the tenses and forms of the verb. But by looking into the Greek, we find the word written with γ, τεγγω; and this clearly proves the alliance of the word with deagan. — See Dye, in the Dictionary.

We have many English words, in which a d has been inserted before g, as in badge, budge, lodge, pledge, wedge. In all words, I believe, of this class, the d is casual, and the g following is the radical letter, as pledge, from the French pleige; wedge from the Saxon wecg. The practice of inserting d in words of this sort seems to have originated in the necessity of some mode of preserving the English sound of g, which might otherwise be sounded as the French g before e. And it is for this reason we still retain, and ought to retain, d in judge, abridge. In like manner, the Teutonic c has been changed into the sound of ch, as Sax. wacian, wœcian, to wake, to watch; Sax. thac, thatch.

There are some nations which, in many words, pronounce and write g before u or w; as in the French guerre, for war; guede, for woad; guetter, for wait; in Welsh, gwal, for wall; gwain, for wain; gwared, for guard, which in English is ward, Sp. guarda. In some instances, the u or w is dropped in modern writing, as in the French garenne, a warren; garde, for guard. This difference of orthography makes it difficult, in some cases, to ascertain the true radical letters.

CHANGE OF SIGNIFICATION.

Another cause of obscurity in the affinity of languages, and one that seems to have been mostly overlooked, is, the change of the primary sense of the radical verb. In most cases, this change consists in a slight deflection, or difference of application, which has obtained among different families of the same stock. In some cases, the literal sense is lost or obscured, and the figurative only is retained. The first object, in such cases, is to find the primary or literal sense, from which the various particular applications may be easily deduced. Thus we find, in Latin, libeo, libet, or lubeo, lubet, is rendered, to please, to like; lubens, willing, glad, cheerful, pleased; libenter, lubenter, willingly, gladly, readily. What is the primary sense, the visible or physical action, from which the idea of willing is taken? I find, either by knowing the radical sense of willing, ready, in other cases, or by the predominant sense of the elements Lb, as in Lat. labor, to slide, liber, free, &c., that the primary sense is to move, incline or advance toward an object; and hence the sense of willing, ready, prompt. Now, this Latin word is the English love, German lieben, liebe. "Lubet me ire," I love to go; I am inclined to go; I go with cheerfulness; but the affinity between love and lubeo has been obscured by a slight difference of application, among the Romans and the Teutonic nations.

Perhaps no person has suspected that the English words heat, hate, and hest in behest, are all radically the same word. But this is the fact. Sax. hatian, to heat, or be hot, and to hate; hætan, to heat and to call; hatan, to call, to order, to command; ge-hætan or ge-hatan, to grow warm, to promise, to vow; Gothic gahaitan, to call, to promise; Dutch heeten, to heat, to name, to call, bid or command; German heitzen, to heat; heissen, to call; hitzen, to heat, to hoist; Swedish hetsa, to inflame, to provoke; Danish heder, to heat, to be called. Behest we have from the German or Swedish dialect. Heat coincides with the Latin æstus, for hæstus, which is written with s, like the German. Hate coincides with the Latin odi, osus, so written for hodi, hosus; and as the Teutonic h often represents the Latin c, as in horn, cornu, the Danish orthography, heder, coincides with the Latin cito, to call. Now, what is the radical sense? Most obviously to stir, agitate, rouse, raise, implying a driving or impulse; and hence in Latin æstuo, to be hot, and to rage or storm; hence to excite, and hence the sense of the Latin cito, quickly, from stirring, rousing to action. In this case, hatred, as well as heat, is violent excitement. We find also in the Saxon and Gothic the sense of vowing, that is, of driving out the voice, uttering, declaring, a sense allied to calling and commanding; and to this is allied the sense of the Latin recito, to recite.

In English, befall signifies to fall on, to happen to; in German, the same word, befallen, has the like signification. But in Saxon, gefeallan signifies to fall, to rush on; while in German, gefallen signifies to please, that is, to suit, to come to one's mind, to be agreeable. The Danish gefalder has the same signification as the German.

We find by the Saxon, that the English reck, to care, and reckon, and the Latin rego, to rule, are all the same word, varied in orthography and application. To find the primary sense of reck, to care, we are then to examine the various derivative senses. And we need go no further than to the Latin rectus and English right, the sense of which is straight, for this sense is derived from straining, stretching. Care, then, is a straining of the mind, a stretching toward an object, coinciding with the primary sense of attention. The primary sense of reckon is to strain out sounds, to speak, tell, relate; a sense now disused.

The Saxon carc, care, cærcian, to care, to cark, is connected in origin with the Latin carcer, a prison; both from the sense of straining, whence holding or restraint.

To prove how the primary general sense of a word may ramify into different senses, by special appropriation of the word among separate families of men proceeding from the same stock, let us observe the different senses in which leap is used by the English, and by the nations on the continent. In English, to leap is simply to spring; as, to leap a yard; to leap over a fence. But on the continent it signifies to run. Now, it will be seen that this word, as used by the Germans, can not always be translated by itself, that is, by the same word, into English. Take, for illustration, the following passage from Luther's Version of the Scriptures: 1 Sam. xvii. 17. — "Nimm für deine brüder diese epha sangen, und diese zehen brod, und lauf ins heer zu deinen brüdern;" "Take now for thy brethren an epha of this parched corn, and these ten loaves, and leap to the camp of thy brethren." Leap, instead of run, is good German, but bad English.* There are two other words in this passage, of which a like remark may be made. The German brod, loaves, is our bread, which admits of no plural; and sangen is our singed, which we can not apply to parched corn.

* "He walks, he leaps, he runs." — Cowper.

So, in some of the Teutonic languages, to warp kittens or puppies, to warp eggs, is correct language, though to our ears very odd; but this is only a particular application of the primary sense, to throw. We say, to lay eggs; but to lay is to throw down.

By this comparison of the different uses and applications of a word, we are able, in most cases, to detect its original signification. And it is by this means, I apprehend, that we may arrive at a satisfactory explanation of the manner in which the same word came to have different and even opposite significations.

It is well known, for example, that the Hebrew word ברך barak, is rendered, in our version of the Scriptures, both to bless and to curse. The propriety of the latter rendering is controverted by Parkhurst, who labors to prove, that in Kings and in Job, where it is rendered to curse, it ought to be rendered to bless; and he cites, as authorities, the ancient versions. It is true, that in 1 Kings xxi. 10, 13, and in Job i. 11, and ii. 5, the Seventy have rendered the word by ευλογεω, to bless; and other ancient versions agree with the Septuagint. But let the word be rendered by bless in the following passages: "Put forth thy hand now, and touch his bone, and his flesh, and he will bless thee to thy face." "Bless God and die." How very absurd does such a translation appear! It shows the immense importance of understanding the true theory of language, and the primary sense of radical words. Let us, then, endeavor to discover, if possible, the source of the difficulty in the case here mentioned. To be enabled to arrive at the primary sense, let us examine the word in the several languages, first of the Shemitic, and then of the Japhetic stock.

Heb. ברך, to bless; to salute, or wish a blessing to.
2. To curse; to blaspheme.
3. To couch or bend the knee, to kneel.
Deriv. A blessing, and the knee.

Chaldee, ברך, to bless; to salute at meeting, and to bid farewell at parting.
2. To bend the knee.
3. To dig; to plow; to set slips of a vine or plant for propagation. — Talm. and Rabbin.
Deriv. The knee; a blessing; a cursing; a cion; the young of fowls.

Syriac, ܒܪܟ, to fall on the knees; to fall or bow down. Judg. v. 27
2. To issue or proceed from. Matth. xv. 19.
3. To bless.

Samaritan, 𐤁𐤓𐤊, to bless

Ethiopic, በረከ, to bless. Deriv. the knee.

Arabic, بَرَكَ baraka, to bend the knee; to fall on the breast, as a camel.
2. To be firm, or fixed.
3. To rain violently; to pour forth rain, as the clouds. Gr. βρεχω.
4. To detract from; to traduce; to reproach or pursue with reproaches; to revile.
5. To bless; to pray for a blessing on; to prosper; to be blessed.
6. To hasten; to rush, as on an enemy; to assail.
Deriv. The breast; the basin of a fountain; a fishpond, or receptacle of water, as in Heb. and Ch.; also, increase; abundance; constancy; splendor; a flash of light.

In the latter sense, usually from برق baraka, Heb. and Ch. ברק barak.

The Arabic word supplies us with the certain means of determining the radical sense; for among other significations, it has the sense of pouring forth rain; and this is precisely the Greek βρεχω. The primary sense, then, is to send, throw, or drive, in a transitive sense; or in an intransitive sense, to rush, to break forth.

To bless and to curse have the same radical sense, which is, to send or pour out words, to drive or to strain out the voice, precisely as in the Latin appello, from pello, whence peal, as of thunder or of a bell. The two senses spring from the appropriation of loud words to express particular acts. This depends on usage, like all other particular applications of one general signification. The sense in Scripture is to utter words either in a good or bad sense; to bless, to salute; or to rail, to scold, to reproach; and this very word is probably the root of reproach, as it certainly is of the Latin precor, used, like the Shemitic word, in both senses, praying and cursing, or deprecating.* It is also the same word as the English pray, It. pregare, L. precor, the same as preach, D. preeken, W. pregethu. To the same family belong the Gr. βραχω, βρυχω, βρυχαομαι, to bray, to roar, to low, Lat. rugio. Here we see that bray is the same word, applied to the voice of the ass and to breaking in a mortar, and both are radically the same word as break.

The sense of kneeling, if radical, is to throw, and if from the noun, the sense of the noun is a throwing, a bending.

The Chaldee sense of digging, if radical, is from thrusting in an instrument, or breaking the ground; but perhaps it is a sense derived from the name of a shoot or cion, and in reality, to set a shoot, to plant.

The Syriac use of this word in Matth. xv. 19, is intransitive, to issue, to shoot, or break forth. So in Arabic, to rush on, to assault. The sense of firmness in Arabic is from setting, throwing down, as in kneeling; and hence the sense of breast, the fixed, firm part.

That this word has the sense both of blessing and of cursing, or reproaching, we have demonstrative evidence in the Welsh language. Rhêg, in Welsh, is ברך, without the prefix. It signifies a sending out; utterance; a gift or present; a consigning; a ban, a curse or imprecation. Rhegu, to give; to consign; to curse. From rhêg is formed preg, a greeting, or salutation, [the very Hebrew and Chaldee word,] pregeth, a sermon, and pregethu, to preach. Here we have not only the origin of preach, but another important fact, that preg, and of course ברך, is a compound word, composed of a prefix, p or b, and rhêg. But this is not all; the Welsh greg, a cackling, gregar, to cackle, is formed with the prefix g on this same rhêg. [Dan. krage, a crow.]

In Welsh, bregu signifies to break; brêg, a breach, a rupture. This Owen deduces from bar, but no doubt erroneously. It is from rhegu; and there is some reason to think that break is from ברך, rather than from פרק; but probably both are from one radix, with different prefixes.

We observe one prominent sense of the Arabic بَرَكَ baraka, is to rain violently; to pour forth water, as clouds. This is precisely the Greek βρεχω; a word found in all the Teutonic and Gothic languages, but written either with or without its prefix.
Saxon, rægn or regn, rain; regnan, to rain.
Dutch, regen, rain; regenen, beregenen, to rain upon.
German, regen, rain; regnen, to rain; beregnen, to rain on.
Swedish, regna, to rain.
Danish, regn, rain; regner, to rain.
Saxon, racu, rain; Cimbric, rækia, id.

Here we find that the English rain is from the same root as the Welsh rhêg, rhegu, and the Shemitic ברך.

Pursuing the inquiry further, we find that the Saxon recan, or reccan, [W. rhegu,] signifies to speak, to tell, to relate, to reckon, the primary sense of which last is to speak or tell; also to rule, which shows this to be the Latin rego; also to care, which is the English reck. That this is the same word as rain, we know from the Danish, in which language regner signifies both to rain and to reckon, to tell, to count or compute. In the German, the words are written a little differently; rechnen, to reckon, and regnen, to rain. So in Dutch, reekenen and regenen; but this is a fact by no means uncommon.

Here we find that the English reckon and reck, and the Latin rego, are the same word. The primary sense is to strain, to reach, to stretch. Care, is a stretching of the mind, like attention, from the Latin tendo, and restraint is the radical sense of governing. Hence rectus, right, that is, straight, stretched.

Hence we find that rain and the Latin regnum, reign, are radically the same word.

Now, in Saxon, racan, or ræcan, is the English reach, to stretch or extend, from the same root, and probably reek, Saxon recan, reocan, to fume or smoke; for this is to send off.

I might have mentioned before, that the Chaldee ברכה, a cion or branch, is precisely the Celtic word for arm; Irish, braic, or raigh; Welsh braiç; whence the Greek βραχιων, the Latin brachium, whence the Spanish brazo, whence the French bras, whence the English brace. The arm is a shoot, a branch, and branch is from this root or one of the family, n being casual; branch for brach.

* "Improbus urget iratis precibus." — Horace.

On this word let it be further observed, or on פרק or ברק, if radically different, are formed, with the prefix s, the German sprechen, to speak, sprache, speech; Dutch spreeken, spraak; Swedish språka, språk; Danish sprog, speech; and Swedish spricka, to break; Danish sprekker. The same word with n casual is seen in spring, the breaking or opening of the winter; and here we see the origin of the marine phrase, to spring a mast, Danish springer, to burst, crack, or spring. This in Swedish is written without n, spricka, to break, burst, split; but a noun of this family has n, springa, a crack, and spring, a spring, a running.

Now let us attend to other Shemitic words consisting of cognate elements.

Chaldee, פרך prak, to rub or scrape; to rub out or tread out, as grain from the ear or sheaf; Latin frico, frio.

2. To collect and bind, as sheaves; perhaps English, to rake.

3. To break or break down.

4. To question; to doubt. In Saxon and Gothic, frægnan, fragan, signifies to ask.

Deriv. Froward; perverse. Prov. ii. 12. So in English refractory.

This verb is not in the Hebrew; but there are two derivatives, one signifying the inner vail of the temple; so called probably from its use in breaking, that is, interrupting access, or separation, like diaphragm in English. The other derivative is rendered rigor, or cruelty; that which strains, oppresses, breaks down, or rakes, harasses.

With this verb coincides the Irish bracaim, to break, to harrow, that is, to rake.

Syr. ܦܪܟ, to rub; so rendered, Luke vi. 1. Lat. frico. A derivative signifies to comminute.

Deriv. Distortion; winding; twisting. Let this be noted.

Ar. فرك faraka, to rub, Lat. frico.

2. To hate, as a husband or wife; to be languid, or relaxed.

Deriv. Laxity; frangibility; friability.

Heb. פרק, to break, burst, or rend; to break off; to separate.

Deriv. A breaking or parting of a road.

Ch. פרק, to break.

2. To redeem; that is, to free, separate, or deliver.

3. To explain, as a doubtful question.

Deriv. One who ransoms or delivers; a rupture; the neck or its juncture; a joint of the fingers, &c.; the ankle; the joint of a reed; a chapter or section of a book; explanation; exposition. פרוק, a rupture, coinciding with the English broke.

Syr. ܦܪܩ, to redeem.

2. To depart; to remove; to separate.

Deriv. A recess, or withdrawing; separation; liberation; redemption; safety; vertebra.

Sam. The same as the Syriac verb.

Ar. فرق faraka, to separate; to divide; to withdraw; to disperse; [qu. Lat. spargo;] to lay open; to disclose; to cast out; to immerse.

Deriv. Separation; distinction, distance; interval; dispersion; aurora, as we say, the break of day; also, a garment reaching to the middle of the thigh, qu. frock; also breech.

I have placed these two words together, because I am convinced they are both of one family, or formed on the same radical word. The latter coincides exactly with the Latin frango, fregi, fractum; for n in frango is undoubtedly casual. Now, in Welsh, bregu, to break, would seem to be directly connected with ברך, yet doubtless bregu is the English break, the German brechen, the Dutch breeken, &c. In truth, the three words ברך, פרך, and פרק, are probably all from one primitive root, formed with different prefixes, or rather with the same prefix, differently written; the different words bearing appropriate senses, among different tribes of men.

We observe in the Chaldee word the sense of questioning. Perhaps this may be the Gothic fragan, to ask; and if so, it coincides with the Latin rogo, the latter without the prefix. In the sense of break, we find, in the Greek, ῥηγνυω, without a prefix.

Most of the significations of these verbs are too obvious to need illustration. But we find in the Syriac the sense of distortion, a sense which at first appears to be remote from that of breaking or bursting asunder. But this is probably the primary sense, to strain, to stretch; a sense we retain in the phrase, to break upon the wheel; and by dropping the prefix, we have the precise word in the verb, to rack.

Now, if this is the genuine sense, we find it gives the English wreck and wrack, the Danish vrag, Sw. vrak, a wreck. In Saxon, wrœcan, wrecan, is the English wreak; that is, to drive, or throw on; wrace, is an exile, a wretch. In Dan. vrager signifies to reject; Sw. vråka, to throw away; all implying a driving force; and that wreck is connected with break, is probable for another reason, that the Latin fractus, frango, forms a constituent part of naufragium, the English shipwreck, which in Danish is simply vrag.

Now, if straining, distortion, is one of the senses of this root, the English wring, wrong, Danish vrang, Sw. vrång, may be deduced from it, for undoubtedly n is not radical in these words. The Dutch has wringen; but the German drops the first letter, and has ringen, both to twist or wind, and to ring or sound; the latter sense from straining or throwing, as in other cases. Without n, wring would be wrig, and wrong, wrog; wrang, wrag, Danish vrag.

In Greek, ῥηγος is a blanket or coverlet, and connected with ῥηγνυμι; that is, a spread; from stretching, or throwing over.

We find also among the Chaldee derivatives the sense of a neck, and a joint. Now, we find this word in Irish, braigh, the neck; in Greek, without the prefix, ῥαχις, the spine of the back; Saxon, hracca; English, the rack, and, from the Greek, the ricketts, from distortion.

Coinciding with the Greek ῥηγνυω, to break, we find in Welsh rhwygaw, to rend; and coinciding with ῥαχια, a rock, a crag, Welsh craig; and connected with these, the Saxon hracod, English ragged, that is, broken; evidently the participle of a verb of this family.

Hence we find the senses of distortion and breaking connected in this root, in a great variety of instances.

The Shemitic ברק, to lighten, to shine or flash, is one of this family. The sense is, to shoot or dart, to throw, as in all like cases. And under this root the Arabic has the sense, to adorn, as a female; to make bright or shining; which gives the English prank and prink, D. pragt, G. pracht. Prance is of the same family, from leaping, starting, darting up.

In Greek, βραχυς, short, stands in the Lexicons as a primary word or root. But this is from the root of break, which is lost in Greek, unless in ῥηγνυμι, without the prefix. From βραχυς, or the root of this word, the French language has abreger, to abridge; and what is less obvious, but equally certain, is, that from the same root the Latin has brevis, by sinking the palatal letter, as we do in bow, from bugan, and in lay, from lecgan; so that abridge and abbreviate, brief, are from one root.

It should have been before mentioned that the Latin refragor signifies to resist, to strive against, to deny, whence refractory; a sense that demonstrates the primary sense to be, to strain, urge, press; and refraction, in optics, is a breaking of the direct course of rays of light by turning them; a sense coinciding with that of distortion.

We see, then, that one predominant sense of break, is, to strain, to distort. Let us now examine some of the biliteral roots in rg and rk, which, if b is a prefix, must be the primary elements of all the words above mentioned.

Ch. רגג rag, regag, to desire, to long for. This is the Greek ορεγω, and English to reach; for desire is expressed by reaching forward, stretching the mind toward the object. So in Latin appeto and expeto, from peto, to move toward. This coincides nearly with the Latin rogo, to ask, and the Goth. fragnan, Sax. frægnan.

Syr. ܪܓ, to desire; and with olaph prefixed, ܐܪܓ, to desire, or long; also to wet, or moisten; also ܪܘ, to moisten — Latin rigo, irrigo, to irrigate.

Deriv. Tender, soft, fresh, from moisture or greenness. Qu. Lat. recens, a derivative.

Here desire and irrigation are both from one root; desire is a reaching forward, and irrigation is a spreading of water.

This root, in Hebrew ארג, signifies to weave, or connect, as in texture and net-work; but the primary sense is to stretch or strain.

In Arabic, the same verb أرج signifies to emit an agreeable smell; to breathe fragrance; radically, to throw or send out; to eject; a mere modification of the same sense. This is the Latin fragro, whence fragrant, with a prefix; but according exactly with the English reek.

ארך in Ch. Heb. Syr. and Sam., signifies to prolong, to extend. In Ar. as in Heb. in Hiph. to delay, or retard; that is, to draw out in time.

רגע in Heb. has been differently interpreted; indeed, it has been rendered by words of directly contrary signification. The more modern interpreters, says Castell, render it, to split, divide, separate, or break; the ancient interpreters rendered it, to stiffen, to make rigid or rough, to wrinkle or corrugate. Castell and Parkhurst, however, agree in rendering it, in some passages, to quiet, still, allay. Jer. xlvii. 6, l. 34. In Job vii. 5, our translators have rendered it broken, "My skin is broken," [rough, or rigid.] In Job xxvi. 12, it is rendered by divide, "He divideth the sea by his power." In Vanderhoogh't's Bible it is in this place rendered by commovet, he agitates the sea. The Seventy render it by κατεπαυσε, he stilled; and this is the sense which Parkhurst gives it.

In Isaiah li. 15, and Jer. xxxi. 35, it is rendered in our version by divide. "But I am the Lord thy God, that divided the sea, whose waves roared."

In Vanderhoogh't's Bible it is rendered in Isaiah li. 15, "I am Jehovah thy God, qui commovens mare, ut perstrepant fluctus ejus." In Jer. xxxi. 35, "commovens mare, ut tumultuentur fluctus"—agitating or moving the sea, that the waves roar, or may roar. The passage in Isaiah is rendered by the Seventy, ὁτι ὁ Θεος σου, ὁ ταρασσων την θαλασσαν, και ηχων τα κυματα αυτης, "agitating the sea, and causing its waves to roar and resound." In the French translation, the passage in Isaiah is, "qui fend la mer, et ses flots bruient:" [I] who divide the sea, and the waves roar. In Jeremiah the passage is, "qui agite la mer, et les flots en bruient:" who agitates the sea, and therefore the waves roar. In Italian, the passage in Isaiah is rendered, "che muovo il mare, e le sue onde romoreggiano." In Jeremiah, "che commuove il mare, onde le sue onde romoreggiano:" who moveth the sea, wherefore its waves roar, or become tumultuous.

These different renderings show the importance of understanding the literal or primary sense of words; for whatever may be the real sense in the passages above mentioned, it can not be to divide. If we are to give to vau in the following word its usual sense of and, it is difficult to make sense of the word רגע, by translating it, he stilleth: He stilleth the sea, and its waves are tumultuous, or He stilleth the sea that the waves may roar or be agitated! This will not answer. The more rational version would be, He roughens the sea, and its waters roar; or he drives, impels it into agitation. In Ethiopic, the same word signifies to coagulate, to freeze, to become rigid; and this is undoubtedly the Latin rigeo, and with a prefix frigeo, and this signification is perhaps allied to the Lat. rugo, to wrinkle; for, as a general rule, the radical sense of wrinkle is to draw, as in contract, contraho, and this seems to be the sense of rigeo. Both these words are allied to rough, which is from breaking or wrinkling. This sense would perhaps well suit the context in these two passages, as it would also that in Job vii. 5: My skin is rough.

Now, in Arabic, the general signification of רגע is to return, to repeat, to withdraw, which may be from drawing back; a different application of the original sense, to strain, stretch, or extend.

The root רוק in Chaldee signifies to spit, and this is probably the Latin ructo, somewhat varied in application. The same verb in Arabic راق rauka, signifies to drive off, to reject; to shoot or grow long, as teeth; to strain, purify or make clear, as wine; precisely the English to rack; also, to spread, and to pour out. Hebrew רק, to empty, to draw out, to attenuate or make thin; and as a noun, spittle; Syriac, to spit, to draw out, to attenuate; Samaritan, to pour out, to draw out, to extend; Ethiopic, to be fine, slender, or thin; Arabic, to be soft, tender, thin. The verb רך has a like signification, and is perhaps from the same original root; רקע, Hebrew, to spread, stretch, extend. But, says Castell, all the ancient interpreters rendered the word, to ordain, establish, make firm; to strike, to beat, as plates of metal. But the sense is to stretch, to spread, and the beating is only the means of extending. Hence רקיע, the firmament, which agrees well with Lat. regio, an extent; in Hebrew, properly, an expanse. And to reconcile the ancient and modern interpretations of this word, let it be remembered that strength and firmness are usually or always from stretching, tension.

Now let us hear Ainsworth on the word regio. "Regio a rego quod priusquam provinciæ fierent, regiones sub regibus erant atque ab his regebantur." How much more natural is it to deduce regio from the primary sense of rego, which is to stretch, to strain, to extend! Regio is an extent, a word of indefinite signification.

In Chaldee and Arabic this verb signifies to mend, to repair, to make whole; from extending, spreading over, or making strong. See the root בל, infra.

We observe that רגג and רקע agree, in original signification, with the English reach, on the root of which, or some of its derivatives, was formed stretch. That ברך, פרך, and פרק were formed on any of the foregoing biliteral roots, we may not be able to affirm; but it is certain from the Welsh, that the first consonant of the triliteral root is a prefix, and it is certain from the Shemitic languages, that the primary sense is the same in the biliteral and triliteral roots, or that all the applications or particular significations may readily be deduced from one general signification.

To illustrate this subject more fully, let us attend to the various applications of some other Shemitic words of extensive use.

ברא.

Heb. ברא bara, to create. This, by most lexicographers, is given as the first signification, in all the Shemitic languages. Parkhurst says, to create; to produce into being. Gen. i. 1.

2. To form by accretion or concretion of matter. Gen. i. 21.
3. In Hiph. to make fat; to fatten or batten. 1 Sam. ii. 29.
4. To do or perform something wonderful. Num. xvi. 30.
5. In Niph. to be renewed. In Kal. to renew, in a spiritual sense. Ps. li. 12.

Castell says,

1. To create from nothing, or to produce something new or excellent from another thing. Gen. i. Is. xlii. 5.
2. In Niph. to be renewed or re-created. Is. xlviii. 7. Ps. cii. 19.
3. To cut off; to take away; to bear away, or remove, also, to select; to prepare. Josh. xvii. 15, 18. Ezek. xxiii. 47.

Gesenius says,

1. Strictly, to hew, to hew out. [Ar. to cut, to cut out, to plane.]

2. To form; to make; to produce. Ar. برأ. The order of significations is, as in the Ar. خلق galaka, to be smooth, to make smooth. 2. To plane. 3. To form, make. Gen. i. 1, 21, 27.

1. Niph. passive of Kal. No. 2. Gen. ii. 4.
2. To be born. Ezek. xxi. 30. Ps. cii. 18.

Pi. ברא, the verb differently pointed; to hew, to cut down. Josh. xvii. 15, 18.

2. To cut down with the sword; to kill. Ezek. xxiii. 47.
3. To make fat. 1 Sam. ii. 29.

Thus far the Hebrew.

Chal. ברא, to create. Gen. i. 1.
2 To cut off. Is. xl. 20.
3. To make fat; to grow sound or strong. Talm.
Deriv. Fat; whole; sound; strong. Castell.

Syr. ܒܪܐ, to create. Gen. i. 1. Mark xiii. 19.
2. To remove to a distance; and Deriv. distance, distant. Castell.

Sam. ברא, to create. Gen. i. 22. Deut. iv. 32. Castell.

Ar. برأ, to create. Job xxxviii. 7. [qu. 4 and 6.]

2. To be free, or guiltless, not obnoxious to punishment. Num. v. 28, 31; and xxxii. 22. Rom. vii. 6.
3. To free; to absolve from a crime; to liberate; to dismiss; to justify. Ex. xx. 7. Num. xiv. 18.
4. To escape; to forsake.
5. To recover from disease; to be healed; to restore to health. Lev. xiii. 18. Josh. v. 8. Matth. iv. 23.

6. To cleanse; to free from impurities.
7. To abstain from.

Deriv. Creator; free; unobnoxious; clean; empty.

Ar. بَرَأَ, to create.

2. To cut off; to hew or pare.
3. To separate; to distinguish.
4. To make thin.
5. To oppose; to strive; to resist.
6. To provoke; to boast, or make a parade.
7. To distribute; to disperse. Castell.

According to Gesenius, the primary sense of the verb is to hew, to cut out, and thus to make smooth, and thus to create; and he deduces these senses in the same order as he does those of the Arabic verb, which gives the word like. But there is no ground for this opinion; and doubtless the verb originated before the use of edge tools.

The predominant senses of this word are, to separate, to free, to remove; as we see by the Arabic and Syriac.

Now, hewing is indeed separating, and we have the English word pare from this root; but we must seek for a signification which is more general than that of paring, or we shall not be able to account for the sense of making fat, sound, entire, and strong, nor for that of being born.

The truth undoubtedly is, this word is of the same family with the English bear, the Latin pario, and the radical sense is to throw, to thrust, to send, to drive, to extend; hence to throw out, to produce, as applied to the birth of children or of the world. To throw or drive is the primary sense of separation and division, that is, to drive off. The English word deal, when traced to its root, presents the same fact. See Deal. To create is to produce or bring forth, the same sense as that of birth, applied to a different object. The sense of hewing and paring is from driving off, separation. In Syriac, we observe the general application, in removal, or departure to a distance. The sense of fattening is derivative, and allied to that of healing or making whole, sound, strong, in the Arabic; that is, preparing, bringing to a good state, or from tension, the usual primary sense of strength and power.

To obtain a more full and satisfactory view of this subject, let us attend to the same word in the modern languages of Europe.

LATIN.

Paro, to prepare, make ready, procure, design, &c. The radical sense of paro is probably the same as in the Shemitic languages; to produce, to bring forward. So also ready implies an advancing, and so does promptness. But the various ways of preparing a thing for use naturally give to the word, in process of time, a variety of particular significations; each of which results in bringing the thing to the state desired. The compounds of paro are apparo, to prepare, to furnish, accouter or set out; comparo, to prepare or procure, to make equal, to compare, to join, to dress or make ready; præparo, to prepare; reparo, to repair, to create anew, to regain, to compensate; separo, to separate. Let the Latin uses of this word be compared with the same Hebrew word in Joshua xvii. 15, where it is rendered cut down. "Ascend to the wood country and cut down for thyself;" Septuagint, εκκαθαρον σεαυτω, clear for thyself. This is one mode of preparation for use. In Ezek. xxi. 19, it is rendered choose; Septuagint, διαταξεις, appoint.

ITALIAN.

Parare, to prepare; to garnish; to adorn; to propose an occasion; to parry, or ward off, as a blow; to defend; to cover from or shelter; to repair; to teach a horse to stop, and in horsemanship, to stop; parata, a warding off, a garnishing; parato, prepared, ready, prompt, warded off or parried, shielded, defended.

Apparare, to learn; apparato, learned, prepared; apparato, preparation, garnishment.

Parecchio, a preparation; also equal, even [L. par;] parecchiare, to prepare; pareggiare, to make equal, to compare; apparecchiare, to prepare, to ornament or garnish, to set in order; appareggiare, to put in competition, to match, to equal.

Comparare, to compare.

Disparare, to forget; disparare, sparare, to unfurnish, disgarnish, to make unready, to disbowel, to separate, disjoin, unpair; to discharge, as artillery.

Imparare, to learn.

Riparare, to repair, to restore to the first state; to repair, or resort to, or have access to; to parry, or ward off; riparo, reparation, a fort, a bank, fence, mound, remedy, shelter.

SPANISH.

Parar, to prepare; to stop, detain, prevent; to end; to treat or use ill; to stake at cards; to point out the game, as pointers.

Parada, a halt or stopping, end, pause; a fold for cattle; a relay, as of horses; a dam or bank; a stake or bet; a parade, or a place where troops are assembled to exercise; parado, remiss, careless, unemployed.

Par, a pair; a peer; afterbirth; the handle of a bell.

Aparar, to stretch out the hands or skirts of a garment for receiving any thing; to dig and heap earth round plants; to close the upper and hind quarter of a shoe to the sole; to couple male and female animals; to dub, as a ship.

Aparador, a sideboard, a dresser in a kitchen, a workshop, a wardrobe; aparato, preparation, pomp, show.

Aparear, to match; to suit one thing to another, [pair.]

Aparejo, preparation, harness, sizing of a piece of linen or board on which something is to be painted; tackle, rigging employed on board of a ship. [Apparel, parrel.]

Comparar, to compare.

Desparejar, to make unequal.

Disparar, to discharge, as fire-arms.

Amparar, to shelter; to protect. [Aragon, to sequester, as goods.]

Emparedar, to confine or shut up.

Reparar, to repair; to observe carefully, to consider; to mend or correct; to suspend or detain; to guard, defend, protect; to regain strength, or recover from sickness; to right the helm.

Separar, to separate.

PORTUGUESE.

Parar, v. i. to stop, to cease to go forward; to confine upon, to meet at the end, to touch, to be bounded; to tend, to drive at something, to aim at, to come to; to imply, involve, or comprise: "Naõ posso parar com fome," I can not bear hunger. "Ninguem pode aqui parar," Nobody can live or stay here. [Eng. bear.]

Parar, v. t. to stop, to hinder from proceeding; to parry or ward off; to turn or change with regard to inclination or morals; to lay or stake, as a wager. Parada, a stopping, or place of stopping; a bet or wager.

Amparar, to protect, shelter, defend, abet.

Comparar, to compare; comprar, to buy, to procure.

Aparar, to pare, as an apple; to mend or make a pen; to parry a blow.

Aparelhar, to prepare, to fit, to cut out or rough hew; aparelho, tackle in a ship for hoisting things, Eng. a parrel.

Disparar, to shoot, to discharge, as fire-arms.

Reparar, to repair; to parry in fencing; to advert; to observe; to make amends; to retrieve; to recover; to recruit; to shelter; reparo, in fortification, defense.

FRENCH.

Parer, to deck, adorn, trim, set off, embellish; to parry or ward off. "Parer des cuirs," to dress leather; "Parer le pied d'un cheval," to pare a horse's hoof.

Parer, v. i. to stop; paresse, idleness.

Pari, a lay, bet, or wager; parier, to bet or lay a wager.

Appareil, preparation, furniture, train, retinue, [Eng. apparel.]

Apparaux, tackle, sails and rigging, [Eng. parrel.]

Pair, a peer, an equal; paire, a pair; apparier, to pair, to match

S'emparer, to seize, to invade.

Reparer, to repair.

Separer, to separate.

ARMORIC.

Para, to dress, to trim, to stop, to parry, to prepare.

RUSSIAN.

Uberayu, to put in order, to adjust, to mow or reap, to cut, to dress, as the hair. This word has the common prefix u

PERSIC.

ب ـر ـد

پریدن poridan, to cut off.

WELSH.

Par, something contiguous, or that is in continuity; a state of readiness or preparedness; a pair or couple; a fellow, match.
Pâr, a cause; the essence, germ, or seed of a thing; a spear.
Para, to continue, to endure, to persevere
Parad, a causing; parai, that causes to be.
Parawd, prepared, ready; parodi, to prepare.

That all the foregoing words in the present European languages [and several others might have been added] are formed from one stock or radix, coinciding with the Latin paro, is a fact that admits of no question. The only doubt respecting the correctness of the whole preceding statement, is, whether the Latin paro is radically the same as the Oriental ברא; and with regard to this point, I should suppose the evidence to be convincing. Indeed, there is good reason to believe that the Oriental verbs ברא, ברר, חבר, and עבר, are all formed from one primitive radix. Certain it is, that the English bear comprehends both the Latin fero and pario, and the latter corresponds nearly with פרה and Eth. ፈለየ fari, to bear.

But admitting only what is certain, that all the foregoing European words are from one radix, we are then to seek for a primary meaning from which may be deduced the following significations; Lat. to prepare; Ital. to adorn, to parry, to stop, to defend, to repair, to learn; Span. to prepare, to stop, to lay or stake as a wager, a pair or couple; Port. to stop, to confine upon or be contiguous, to drive or aim at, to parry, to pare; Fr. to deck, to parry, to stop, to pare; Arm. to dress, to prepare, to parry; Russ. to adjust, to dress, to mow or reap; Welsh, preparedness, contiguity, a pair, a cause, to continue or endure; and several other significations.

The various significations result from throwing, sending, driving. To separate or remove is to drive or force apart; hence to parry, and hence to defend. Separation implies extension, a drawing out in length or time; hence the Portuguese senses of confining upon, reaching to the limit. This gives the sense of par, equal, that is, of the same extent; and hence coming to, and suiting, as in Latin convenio.

Here let it be observed that, admitting the word par, equal, to belong to this family, as in the Welsh, we have strong reason to believe that the Shemitic חבר, to join, or fit together, to associate, whence as a noun, an associate, is formed from the same root, or ברא; for in the Saxon we find not only fera, but gefera, a companion, fellow, or peer; gefera answering precisely to the Oriental word.

The sense of betting is from throwing down, as we say, to lay a wager. The sense of stopping is from setting, fixing, or from parrying. The sense of adorning is from putting on, which is from sending, or from extension, enlargement, as we say, to set off, and hence it is allied to the sense of show, display, parade. Preparation is from producing, bringing forward, or adjusting, making right; and often implies advancing, like ready, prompt; and the latter word, prompt, from promo, to bring forth, affords a good illustration of the words derived from paro.

The senses of cutting off, paring, and the like, require no explanation.

The Italian disparare, and the Spanisn and Portuguese disparar, to discharge fire-arms, present the original sense of the root, to send or drive. This sense gives that of the Welsh pâr, a spear, as well as a cause, or that which impels. A spear is a shoot, from the sense of thrusting; and our word spear is probably formed from the root of bar, and Welsh ber, a spit, a pike, a lance, a spear, Lat. veru. Now, in Chaldee, a bar is עבראּ, from עבר, to pass; a verb which is probably of the same family with ברא. It is further to be observed that, in Italian, bar is written both barra and sbarra.

It is observed above that ברא is the English bear and the Latin pario; but pario would seem to be the Hebrew פרה parah, to be fruitful, to bear fruit, applied to plants and animals. But this word seems to denote producing in general, rather than the production of children. However this may be, it is certain that bear in English, as well as in Saxon, expresses the sense of both pario and fero in Latin. The Latin fero, and the Greek φερω, signify both to carry and to produce, as young or fruit. Pario does not. So in the Gothic, bairan is to carry, gabairan is to carry and to produce young. In German, führen is to carry, and gebären, to bring forth, to bear a child. In Dutch, beuren is to lift; voeren, to carry; and baaren, to bring forth, as children; to bear, to beget, to cause. Danish, bærer, to carry, to support, and to yield or produce. Sw. bära, to carry; barn, a son. Irish beirim, to bear or bring forth, and to tell or relate, like the Latin fero, whence Fr. parler, to speak.

It appears, then, that the English bear, and the Saxon from which we have received it, and the Gothic and the Danish corresponding words unite, in the same orthography, the senses of two words of different orthography in other languages. I have found other examples of a similar kind. There is, therefore, solid ground to believe that all these words are from one primitive root; the different modes of writing the word, and the several appropriations, having originated in different families of the great races of men, before languages were reduced to writing; and when they came to be written, each word was written according to its usual pronunciation, and defined according to its use in each family. And by the intermixture of tribes, two or three derivatives of the same stock might have become a part of the same national language. Unquestionably the Greek φερω, and φορεω, are branches of the same stock.

We have, in the modern languages, decisive evidence that different verbs may have, and in fact have, a common radix. Thus, in English, list and lust are different modes of writing the same word; both are united in the other Teutonic dialects. So, in Latin, libet and lubet; and similar instances I have found in almost every language which I have examined.

The Latin pareo, to appear, to come to light, if not a compound word, may be of this family. Paries, a wall, if primarily a partition wall, is of the same stock. Per belongs to this family, as its signification is passing. The Sax. faran, to fare, Gr. πορευομαι, seems to be from one branch of this stock, probably עבר. See the word Pass, in the Dictionary, in the derivative senses of which there are some resemblances to those of ברא.

This verb, says Lowth, means to cover, to cover sin, and so to expiate; and it is never used in the sense of breaking or dissolving a covenant, though that notion occurs so often in the Scriptures; nor can it be forced into this sense, but by a great deal of far-fetched reasoning. See Isaiah xxviii. 18. Lowth on Isaiah, Prelim. Diss.

כפר, says Castell, "texuit, operuit, Anglice, to cover; per metathesin, κρυπτω, κρυφη, peculiariter bitumine, sive glutinosa aliqua materia obduxit; picavit." Gen. vi. 14.

Parkhurst gives to this verb the sense of covering or overspreading, as primary, and deduces from it the Greek κρυπτω, and English cover and coffer. He, however, admits, that, in Isaiah xxviii. 18, it signifies to annul, as a covenant. He also considers the sense of atonement or expiation to be radically that of covering.

Gesenius agrees with the English lexicographers, in assigning to this verb the primary sense of covering or overlaying, as in Gen. vi. 14. He admits that this word has the sense, in Isaiah xxviii. 18, of blotting out, obliterating. But he gives to it the sense of forgiving, in some passages, in which our version has that of purging away. Ps. lxv. 3, and lxxix. 9. In these passages, Castell renders the word, to be merciful or propitious.

In all these authors there is, I conceive, a radical mistake, in supposing the primary sense to be to cover, and in the opinion that this Hebrew word is the English verb to cover. A still greater mistake is in the supposition of Castell and Parkhurst, that this, by a metathesis, gives the Greek κρυπτω.

The English word cover comes to us through the French couvrir, from the Italian coprire, a contraction of the Latin co-operio, whence co-opertus, Italian coperto, covered, Eng. *covert. The Latin aperio is to open, and operio is to cover, both from pario or one of the roots in Br, which has just been explained. The root in these words is per or par, and the sense is varied by prefixes; perhaps ad-pario or ab-pario and ob-pario. Now, cover can have no connection with כפר, unless this latter word is a compound, with כ for a prefix. This may be the fact, but the connection, even in that case, is very remote.

* In this deduction of cover from the Latin, I am supported by Lunier, the ablest French etymologist whose works I have seen.

Let us see if we can gain any light upon the subject of the primary sense of כפר from the cognate languages.

Chaldee, כפר, to deny, to reject. Prov. xxx. 9.

2. To wipe; "She eateth and wipeth her mouth." Prov. xxx. 20.

3. To wash or cleanse. Matth. xxvii. 24. Castell.

Syriac, ܟܦܪ kefar, to deny. Gen. xviii. 15. Luke xii. 9.

2. To wipe, to wipe away, to annul, to abolish. Prov. xxx. 20. Is. xxviii. 18. Castell.

Arabic, كفر kafara, to deny; to disbelieve; to be an infidel; to be impious; to blaspheme. Acts iii. 13, 14. 2 Pet. ii. 1, 5. Jude 15.

2. To cover; to conceal.

3. To expiate; to make expiation for one, and free him from crime. Castell.

Now, the senses of the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic, to deny, to reject, to annul, to wipe, wash, or to cleanse by these acts, can not be deduced from covering.

In Hebrew, the word has the sense of covering, as the ark, with bitumen or pitch, in Gen. vi. 14; that is, to smear, or pay over, as our seamen now express it. But it should be considered that the sense of covering is rarely or never primary; it is usually from the sense of putting on, which is from the sense of throwing or pressing, or it is from overspreading, which is a spreading, stretching, or throwing over; hence the derivative senses of covering and hiding. These latter senses are sometimes derived from others; but these are the most general. And in this passage of Genesis, the literal sense is probably to put on, or to rub or spread over, a sense which coincides with that of the Chaldee and Syriac, Prov. xxx. 20, though differently applied; or what is more probable, the verb, in Gen. vi. 14, is from the noun, which is the name of the substance used; as we should say, to pitch with pitch.

The real original sense of this Shemitic verb is to remove, to separate, by thrusting away or driving off. Hence its application, in the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic, to denial, the rejection of God or truth. To deny or reject is to thrust away. Hence from the Arabic caffer, an infidel, one who denies and rejects the Mohammedan religion; hence Caffraria, the southern part of Africa, the country of infidels; so called by the followers of Mohammed, just as the Christians gave the name of pagans to the inhabitants of villages [pagus] who rejected the Christian religion.

This signification explains the Hebrew uses of this word. Its literal sense is applied to the cleansing or purification of sacred things, as the altar. Lev. xvi. 18. In a spiritual sense, to the purification of the soul, a type of the purification by the blood of Christ; hence it is rendered atonement, or expiation. Hence, probably, the sense of appeasing, Gen. xxxii. 21, Prov. xvi. 14, though this may be from removing or smoothing.

The sense of forgiveness is from thrusting away or giving back, precisely as in the modern languages; Lat. remitto, to send back or away; forgive, to give back or away; pardon, in French, Spanish, and Italian, has a like sense, which is more clearly exhibited by the Dutch vergeeven, German vergeben; ver being the English far, to give far, to give away; hence to reject, and remember no more. The sense of give, and of the French donner, is nearly the same as that of כפר. To give is to send, to cause to pass; and so of donner.

Now, it is a question of some moment, whether the opinion that כפר is the same as the English cover, has not inclined lexicographers and commentators to render it by this word, in several passages, where the true sense is to forgive, or to purify by cleansing from sin.

However this may be, the interpretation given above will fully disprove Lowth's assertion, that this word is never used in the sense of breaking or annulling a covenant. So confident is the learned bishop on this point, that he ventures to call in question the reading, Isaiah xxviii. 18, and to suppose the true word to be תפר, from פור, to break. With respect to the reading, I shall offer no opinion; but if the present reading is correct, I am confident that no word in the Hebrew language is better fitted to express the sense. Your covenant with death shall be wiped away, abolished, or, as in the version, annulled. And so is the rendering in the Syriac.

If כפר is a compound word, and the first letter a prefix, it may be from the same root as the Arabic غفر gafara, whose signification is to cover. But the primary sense is, to throw or put on. It signifies, also, to forgive; but to forgive is to send back or away, remitto, and not to cover. And I apprehend that for want of knowing the primary sense of such verbs, the word cover has been often substituted for forgive, in the translating of this verb.

כל kal or kol.

No. 1. Heb. כול, כל, to hold, to contain; Sw. hålla. כלכל, to hold, to sustain, to maintain, to comprehend.

Ch. כול, to measure; that is, to ascertain the contents, or to stretch, and comprehend the whole.

Pah. To feed, to nourish. See אכל.

Deriv. A measure; also custom, rite, manner; probably from holding or continued practice.

Syr. In Aph. to measure. Deriv. A measure.

Eth. ሀለለ, to follow; to go behind; Gr. ακολουθεω; that is, to hold to, or to press after.

Deriv. The hinder part; the poop of a ship; behind. French cul.

No. 2. Heb. כלל, to finish; to complete; to make perfect. Gr. καλος.

כל, all; the whole; Gr. ὁλος, Eng. all, by the loss of the first letter; but in Welsh holl, or oll; and in Saxon al, æl, and geall.

Ch. כלל, to crown; to adorn.

Pih. To perfect; to complete; to comprehend; to embrace.

Deriv. Comprehending; universality; a general rule, &c.

Syr. ܟܠ, to crown. Deriv. A crown; all; every one.

Sam. 22ש, as the Chaldee.

Eth. ከለለ, the same; also, to cover.

Ar. كل kalla, to be weary or dull; to be languid; to tire; also, to crown; to shine. Deriv. All; dullness; heaviness.

No. 3. Heb. כלא, to hold; to restrain; to shut or confine; to check; Gr. κωλυω; Sw. hålla.

Deriv. A place of confinement; Lat. caula.

Ch. כלא, כלה, כלי, to hold; to restrain; also, to trust; to confide in, or rely on; to hope. (See No. 6.) Also, to finish; to perfect; also, to consume; to cause to fail.

In Aph. To call; to cry out; to thunder; Gr. καλεω; Lat. calo; W. galw; Eng. to call; Lat. gallus, from crowing.

Syr. ܟܠ, to hold; to restrain; to forbid; to deny.

Deriv. all; a cork, bar, or bolt.

Sam. א2ש, to hold, or restrain.

Eth. ከለለ, to hold, restrain, or prohibit.

Deriv. Lat. alius; a fellow, or companion.

Ar. كل kala, to keep; to preserve; to turn the face toward a thing and look repeatedly. So in English, to behold. Also, to come to the end, as of life; also, to feed, to devour food; also, to abound in pasture; also, to hinder, or detain; also, to look attentively; also, to sprout; also, to take upon a pledge, or upon trust; supra, Chaldee. (See No. 6.)

No. 4. Heb. כלה, to finish; to consume; to bring to naught; to waste; to fail. (See No. 8.)

No. 5. Ch. אכל, to eat; to consume; also, to take; to hold; to contain. In Aph. to feed; to give food; also, to call; to thunder; to roar, or bellow; also, to publish; to accuse; to defame.

Heb. to eat; to consume.

Sam. 2אש, to eat.

Syr. ܐܟܠ, to publish; to divulge, as a crime; to accuse.

Eth. ኸለ, to suffice; as we say, it is well, Lat. valeo; also, to be or exist; that is, to be held, or to be fixed or permanent, to continue.

Ar. to eat; to devour; to corrode; Lat. helluo.

No. 6. Ar. وكل wakala, to trust; to commit to another in confidence. (See No. 3.)

Eth. ΦΠΛ wakal, with a prefix; to trust, as above.

No. 7. Heb. יכל, to be able; to prevail; Lat. calleo; W. gallu; Eng. could.

No. 8. Ch. עכל, to digest; to consume. (No. 5.)

Ar. كل, to collect; to tie; to bind; to unite; also, to divide, impel, or compel. This is the primary sense of the word, or rather of this root; to press; to strain; to urge, or impel; also, to extend. These verbs are different modifications of one radix; and hence the English hold, call, hollow, heal, hale; the Latin calo, caulis, calleo, callus; Greek κολλα, καλος, or καλλος; and a multitude of words in all the modern languages of Europe.

The sense of holding, restraining, forbidding, hindering, and keeping, are too obvious to need any explanation. They are from straining. To this sense is nearly allied the sense of measuring, or ascertaining what is held or contained. That which is contained is all, the whole that is comprehended, from the sense of extension.

The signification of finishing or perfecting seems in a good sense, to be from that of soundness; a sense which is from stretching or strength. Or it may be from coming to the end, like finish and achieve, or from shutting, closing. And the sense of consuming, wasting, failing, may be from bringing to an end. In Latin, to consume is to take all; and possibly this may be the sense of this verb. But the Arabic sense of failure would seem rather to be from holding, stopping, or coming to an end.

The sense of eating may be from consuming, or taking apart; but from some of the derivatives of No. 5, I am inclined to think the primary sense is to feed, to crowd, to stuff; the primary sense of the root applied to this particular act; for under the Chaldee root we find words which signify the nut of a species of oak, the Gr. αχυλος, and a collection or crowd of people, [Gr. οχλος,] both of which are from collecting or pressing together.

The sense of seeing and looking is from reaching or casting and striking, or from holding or fixing the eyes on.

The sense of trusting seems also to be that of holding to or resting on. The English hold in behold is from this root.

The sense of calling, roaring, and thunder, is from impelling the voice or sound; a pressing, driving, or straining, applied to sound; like the Latin appello, from pello. Hence the sense of publishing, accusing, and defaming.

The sense of sprouting, in the Arabic, is a shooting or pushing out, as in other cases; Lat. caulis.

The sense of ability, power, strength, in No. 7, is from straining, stretching, or holding, as in other words of the like sense. Hence Lat. calleo, to be skilled, and to be hard, callus.

On this root כל is probably formed סכל, a word differently pointed in the Hebrew and Chaldee. This word signifies, in Hebrew, to pervert, to err, to be foolish or infatuated, to act foolishly.

In Chaldee, to understand, know, or consider; to look or behold; to cause to understand; Rabbinic, to be ignorant; whence its derivatives, knowledge, wisdom, ignorance. These different significations may result from the different effects of the prefix on the original verb.

In Syr. ܣܟܠ (the same word) signifies to be foolish, or mad; to cause to know, or to give understanding; to observe; to search or know thoroughly; to ask or seek to understand; to discern or distinguish; also to err, to sin, to be foolish or perverse.

In Sam. the same word signifies to look, and to be accustomed. See Castell, col. 2523.

That שכל is formed on the same root with a different prefix, is obvious and certain, from the correspondence of significations. This word in Hebrew signifies to understand, or know; to cause to understand; to be wise, or to act wisely; corresponding with the Ch. סכל above; and being a mere dialectical orthography of the word. It signifies, also, to deprive, strip, bereave; and to waste, scatter, and destroy; also, to cast, as fruit or offspring; also, to prosper.

Ch. to understand, and Ch. שכלל, to complete, to finish; also, to found, to lay the foundation. This is כלל with ש prefixed.

Syr. to found, to finish, to adorn.

Ar. شكل shakala, to bind under the belly; to gird; to bind the feet; to fetter; to shackle; to form, or fashion; to be dubious, obscure, and intricate; to agree, suit, or answer to; to be like; to have a beautiful form; to know, perceive, or comprehend; to hesitate; to be ignorant. Derivative, a shackle. See Castell, col. 3750.

To this root Castell refers the English skill; and it is certain the words correspond both in elements and in sense. Now, in the Gothic and Teutonic languages, the verbs corresponding to these Shemitic verbs, signify, in Saxon, scylan, to separate, to distinguish; Icelandic and Swedish, skilia, to divide, separate, sever; whence shield, that which separates, and hence defends; D. scheelen, to differ; schillen, to peel, or pare; whence scale and shell. To this root our lexicographers refer skill. The prefix in this word would seem to have the force of a negative, like L. ex. Now, is it possible to suppose that these words can be formed from a common root?

The sense of sin and folly is probably from wandering, deviating, as in delirium; and this is only a modification of the primary sense of כל, to stretch or extend; that is, departure, separation. Or the ש has, in these senses, the force of a negative.

The sense of knowing, understanding, is usually or always from taking, holding, or extending to; as we say, I take your meaning. In this application, these words would seem to be directly from the Eth. and Ch. כהל, to be able; the Latin calleo, to be hard, and to know or be well skilled. That this word כהל is from the same root as כלל, כלא, כלח, we know by the Samaritan ⵣⵜⵍ, which signifies all, and which is a mere dialectical spelling of the Heb. and Ch. כל.

The sense of depriving and wasting, in the Hebrew, is from separation, the sense of the Gothic and Teutonic words; but it is to be noticed that this sense seems to imply throwing, as one mode of parting, and this is also the direct act of founding, laying the foundation.

When we turn our attention to the Arabic, new affinities are disclosed. The first definition is, to bind, to gird, to shackle, and hence the English word. The radical sense of bind is to strain, the sense of hold. And here we arrive at the origin and primary sense of shall, should; Saxon scealan, to be obliged; that is, to be bound or constrained. Hence we see why the words scale, shell, and shall, are all written alike in Saxon, sceal; for scale and shell are from peeling, or covering, binding.

From this verb the Saxon has scyld, a crime, or guilt, Lat. scelus, and scyld, a shield. The German has the same word in schuld, guilt, culpability, debt; Dutch, schuld; Danish skulde, should, and scyld, a debt, a fault, a crime; Sw. skuld, the same. This word scyld, skuld, and schuld, is the English should, the preterit of the verb shall; and it is the word used in the Saxon, German, Dutch, Danish, Swedish, Norwegian, Icelandic, and Swiss Lord's Prayer, to express what is rendered in English debts; forgive us our debts. Here we see the primary sense of the word is to be held, or bound; hence, liable. The English word guilt may be from the same root, without a prefix; but whether it is or not, we observe the word expresses more than the English word debt, trespass, or offense; it comprehends the sense of fault, or sin, with that of being held or liable to answer or to punishment. Debt, in the modern use of the word, implies the latter, but not the former; trespass and offense imply the sin, but not the liability to answer. We have no English word that includes both senses except guilt, and this seems to be hardly adequate to express the full sense of scyld.

To account for the various significations of the same word, in different languages, and often in the same language, it is necessary to find the primary action expressed by the root; and in compound words it is necessary to observe or ascertain the different effects produced on the original word by the prefixes. Thus the verb inculpo, in Low Latin, signifies to excuse; but some modern writers use inculpate in a directly different sense; that is, to blame.

In like manner impartible has two different significations; that may be imparted; and in law, not partible, or divisible. Such is the fact also with impassionate. I am persuaded a vast number of instances of similar diversities in the application of prefixes, may be found in the Shemitic languages; and this will account for differences which otherwise seem utterly irreconcilable.

We find in our mother tongue, that the same word signifies to heal and to conceal, Lat. celo; Saxon hæl, health; hælan, helan, to heal, to conceal; ge-hælan, and ge-helan, to heal, and to conceal; Old English hele. Hence we see that the English heal and the Latin celo are the same word differently applied, but from a common signification, which is, to make strong or fast, or to hold, from the sense of pressing. Or perhaps the Latin celo may have this sense of holding, restraining; and heal may rather be from making perfect. No. 2, supra.

We may now also see the radical sense of holy; Saxon hal and ge-hal, whole, sound, safe; halig, holy; halgian, to hallow. If this word contains the sense of separation, or driving off, like Latin sacer, as it may, it is from shutting, confining, or restraining intercourse. But I am inclined to believe the primary sense of holy is sound, entire, coinciding with the radical sense of heal.

CLOD, LAUDO, CLAUDO

In Welsh, clod is praise, from llod, a forcible utterance. This is the English loud, and Lat. laudo, which, with a prefix, becomes plaudo. In Welsh, llodi signifies to reach out, to crave, from the radical sense of llod, to thrust out or extend; but according to Owen, llodi is from llawd, which signifies a shooting out, or a going onward, productiveness, a lad; and as an adjective, tending forward, craving, lewd; llodig, craving, brimming; llodineb, lewdness. Now, beyond all question, these words are the Chaldee, Syriac, Hebrew, and Samaritan ילד, to beget; to bring forth; to cause to be born; and as a noun, a child of either sex, a lad. The Arabians and Ethiopians use vau or waw, where the Hebrews use yod. The Arabic corresponding word is ولد walada, the Ethiopic ወለደ walada, to beget, to bring forth.

But this is not all. In Greek, the verb κλειω, a contraction of κλειδοω, signifies to praise, to celebrate. Here we have precisely the Welsh llod above, corresponding with the Latin laudo and plaudo. But the same Greek word κλειω, κλειδοω, signifies to shut or make fast. This is the Latin cludo, claudo. The Saxons used h for the Greek κ and the Latin c; and with these words accords the Saxon hlid, a cover; English, a lid; that which shuts or makes fast. That these words are all from one root, is a fact apparent beyond any reasonable doubt; nor is there the least difficulty in ascertaining the affinity, for the radical sense, to reach forward, to thrust, to strain, solves the whole mystery. To thrust, gives the sense of begetting and producing; to strain or throw out the voice, gives the sense of praise; and to thrust or press together, gives the sense of closing and making fast. In this manner, words, which at first view appear to have no connection, will, when pursued through different languages, assimilate and unite, not only without forced analogies, but in defiance of all preconceived opinions; and the reluctant mind is at last compelled to admit their identity.

There is another set of words whose derivation from the same root is very certain, though perhaps less obvious. These are the Danish slutter, to shut, close, conclude, finish, determine; slutter, a key-keeper, a jailer; Swedish sluta, claudere, observare, to shut, or shut up, or end; slott, a castle; D. sleutel, a key; slot, a lock, a castle, a conclusion; sluiten, to shut, lock, close, stop, conclude; G. schloss, a lock; schliessen, to close, conclude, finish, fetter, shackle; schleuse, a sluice; D. sluis, id. Eng. sluice, that is, which shuts or fastens; Low Latin, exclusa. See Spelman's Glossary. These words are unequivocally formed from the root of claudo, clausi, by the prefix s, just as the Welsh yslac, slack, loose, is formed on llac, and yspeiliaw on yspail, spoil, and this on the root of peel. We observe all the Teutonic dialects use the dental t, as the final radical, except the German. The Latins use both the dental and a sibilant, claudo, clausi, clausus.

If the Danish lyd, sound, Sw. lyda, to sound, is the same word as English loud, these words belong to this family.

CRADLE.

Another example. The English word cradle, Saxon cradel, is in Welsh cryd, a rocking, a shaking, a cradle. In Welsh, the verbs crydu, crydiaw, crydian, signify to shake, to tremble. These correspond to the Irish creatham, to shake; Greek κραδαω, to shake, to swing. The Welsh verbs are by Owen deduced from rhyd, which signifies a moving. Now רעד, in Hebrew, Chaldee, and Ethiopic, signifies to shake or tremble. The same word in Arabic, رعد, signifies to thunder; to impress terror; to tremble; to shake. This coincides with the Latin rudo, to roar, to bray; and we know from the voice of the ass, that roughness or shaking is an ingredient in the sense of this word. We know it also from rudis, one of the affinities of rudo. There is also in Arabic, رود, which is rendered to run hither and thither; to move one way and the other; to tremble; to shake In Hebrew חרד signifies to tremble or shake, and to palpitate; in Syriac and Eth. to rub or scrape. This connects the word directly with cradle, through the Hebrew; and through the Syriac, with the Latin rado. Here again we find the sense of roughness or grating. Then turning to the Welsh, we find grydiaw, which signifies to utter a rough sound; to shout, whoop, or scream; grydwst, a murmur, from gryd, a shout, or whoop, and this from rhyd, the word above mentioned; so that crydu, to shake, whence cradle, is from the same root as grydiaw, to shout, and this is the Italian gridare; Sp. and Port. gritar; Saxon grædan; Swedish gråta; Danish græder; Dutch kryten; German greiten. This word in French is contracted, by the omission of the last radical, into crier for crider; whence, probably, we have cry, W. cri. Hence we find that the sense of cry is to utter a rough sound; and this is connected with the braying of the ass, with shaking, trembling, and with roaring, murmuring, and thunder. The connection, in this example, is so marked as to preclude all hesitation as to the identity of the words.

The Shemitic roots גרד, חרט, חרת, and קרד, all, in some of the languages of that stock, coincide in sense and elements with the English grate, French gratter; and if the first letter is a prefix, they would seem to unite with the Latin rado. But this is a point I would not undertake to determine.

One fact more. The Welsh cri, above mentioned, signifies a cry; and as an adjective, rough, raw. Now, this coincides with the Latin crudus, in sense; and crudus with the Welsh cryd, above mentioned.

The Dan. brygger, Eng. to brew, are probably connected with break, with freckle, and with rough. So, under this root, the Welsh grediaw, signifies to heat, scorch, parch; whence greidyll, a griddle, from graid, that shoots in rays; heat, ardency, from gra, that shoots, or rises, as the nap or frieze of cloth. The latter is probably a contracted word, of the same family, but not the root, as Owen supposes. But the radical sense implies a shaking, agitation, and roughness.

MEET, METE, MEASURE.

Saxon. — Mætan, to put, to place; Fr. mettre, It. mettere, Sp. and Port. meter, Lat. mitto.

Mætan, metan, to find, to meet, or meet with; to paint; to dream; to measure, to mete, Lat. metior, metor, Gr. μετρεω, μετρον, Lat. mensus, with a casual n, that is, mesus, Fr. mesure.

Ametan, gemetan, to meet, to find, to measure.

Gemeting, gemetung, a meeting.

Gemet, gemete, fit, suitable, Eng. meet; also, painted or portrayed.

Gemetegan, gemetian, to moderate; gemetlic, moderate, modest.

Mete, measure, mode, Lat. modius, modus.

Meter, measure in verse, meter [not metre.]

Metere, an inventor, a painter.

Mæte, middling, [mediocris,] modest, moderate.

Mot, gemot, a meeting, a council.

Witena-gemot, a council of wise men.

Motian, to meet, especially for debate. Eng. to moot.

Gothic. — Motyan, gamotyan, to meet, to find.

Mota, a place for the receipt of toll or customs.

Dutch. — Ontmoeten, to meet, to encounter.

Meeten, and toemeeten, to measure.

Meeter, a measurer.

Gemoeten, to meet; gemoet, a meeting.

German. — Mass, measure, meter; masse, moderation.

Messen, vermessen, to measure; messer, a measurer.

Gemäss, measure; also, conformable, suitable; Eng. meet, suitable; German gemässigt, temperate, moderate.

Swedish. — Möta, to meet, to fall on, to come to, to happen. [This is the sense of finding.]

Möte, a meeting.

Mot, and emot, toward, against; as in motstå, to stand against, to resist.

Mäta, to measure; mätt, measure, meter, mode.

Mättelig, moderate, middling, frugal, temperate.

Mätta, to be sufficient, to satisfy, to cloy.

Danish. — Möder, to meet, to convene; möde or mode, a meeting; mod, contrary, opposite, against, to, toward, for, on, by, aside, abreast, as in modsetter, to set against, to oppose; mods ger, to say against, to contradict; modvind, a contrary wind.

Moed, moden, ripe, mellow, mature. [Qu. Lat. mitis.]

Mode, manner, fashion. [Probably from the Latin.]

Maade, measure, form, style of writing, way, mode, manner, fashion. [This is the native Danish word corresponding to the Lat. modus.]

Maadelig, moderate, temperate.

Mæt, enough, sufficient; mætter, to satisfy, or sate, to glut.

From the same root are the G. mit, D. met, mede, Sw. and Dan. med, Gr. μετα, signifying with.

By the first signification of the Saxon mætan, or metan, we find that this word, which is the English meet, is also the French mettre, and Lat. mitto, the sense of which is to throw or send, to put, to lay. Meet is only a modification of the same sense, to come to, to fall, to reach, hence to find; as we say, to fall on.

The sense of painting or portraying is peculiar to the Saxon. I am not confident that this sense is from finding; but we observe that metere is rendered an inventor and a painter. The sense of paint, then, may be, to find out, to devise or contrive.

The sense of dreaming is also peculiar to the Saxon. The sense may be to devise or imagine, or it may be to rove, as in some other words of like signification. If so, this sense will accord with the Syriac ܡܛ, infra.

The other significations present no difficulty. To meet is to come to, to reach in proceeding or in extending; hence to find. The primary sense of measure is to extend, to stretch to the full length or size of a thing.

Meet, fit, suitable, like par, peer, pair, is from extending or reaching to. So suit is from the Latin sequor, through the French, to follow, to press or reach toward. See par, under ברא, supra.

The English meet and mete appear to be from the Saxon dialect, but moot from the Gothic.

Let it be remarked that the Saxon meet and mete are united in the same orthography; and in the Dutch the orthography is not very different; ontmoeten, gemoeten, to meet, and meeten, to measure. Not so in the other languages.

In German, mass is measure, and messen, to measure; but the sense of meet does not occur. Yet that nass is the same word as meet, fit, varied only in dialect, appears from this, that gemäss, with a prefix, is suitable, answering to the English meet.

The Swedish and Danish words follow the Gothic orthography; Swedish möta, to meet, to fall on, to come to, to happen. These significations give the sense of finding, and are closely allied to the senses of the Arabic verb مدّ madda, infra.

ـمـ

The Danish verb is möder, to meet; but in both the Swedish and Danish, the sense of measure is expressed by a different orthography. Sw. mäta, to measure; mått, measure; Dan. maade, measure, mode. In these two languages we find also the sense of sufficiency, and to satisfy. See infra, the Ar. مدّ and Heb. and Ch. מצא.

But in these Gothic dialects, there is one application of meeting, which deserves more particular notice. In Swedish, mot and emot is a preposition of the same signification as the English against. It is rendered toward, against. So in Danish, mod is contrary, opposite, against, to, toward, by, aside, abreast. This preposition is the simple verb, without any addition of letters, prefix or suffix. We hence learn that the sense of such prepositions is a meeting or coming to, which gives the sense of to or toward; but when one meets another in front, it gives the sense of opposition, or contrary direction. This coming to or meeting may be for a friendly purpose, and hence in one's favor, like for in English. Thus in Danish, "Guds godhed mod os," God's goodness or mercy toward us. In other cases, mod signifies against, and implies counteraction or opposition; as modgift, an antidote; modgang, adversity. So for, in English, signifies toward, or in favor of; and also opposition and negation, as in forbid.

In the Danish we find moed, moden, ripe, mature. We shall see this sense in the Chaldee מטא. The sense is, to reach, extend, or come to.

The Latin modus is from this root, and, by its orthography, it seems to have been received from the Gothic race. The sense is measure, limit, from extending, or comprehending. This, then, becomes the radix of many words which express limitation or restraint, as moderate, modest, modify; a sense directly contrary to that of the radical verb.

This leads us a step further. In Saxon, Gothic, and other northern languages, mod, moed, signifies mind, courage, spirit, anger, whence English moody. The primary sense is an advancing or rushing forward, which expresses mind, or intention; that is, a setting or stretching forward, and also spirit, animation, heat, and, lastly, anger. So the Latin animus gives rise to animosity; and the Greek μενος, mind, signifies also strength, force, vehemence, and anger. Mania is from the same radical sense.

Let us now connect this root, or these roots, with the Shemitic languages.

In Hebrew and Chaldee מדד signifies to measure; מד, a measure. This coincides with the Latin metior, and Gr. μετρεω, as well as with the Saxon, Dutch, Danish, and Swedish, which all write the word with a dental, but the German is mass.

In Syriac, ܡܕ mad, signifies to escape, to get free; that is, to depart, a modification of the sense of extending in the Arabic. A derivative in Syriac signifies a duty, toll, or tribute; and we have seen in the Gothic, that mota is a toll-house. It may be from measuring, that is, a portion, or perhaps income.

ـمـ

This word in Arabic, مدّ madda, signifies,

1. To stretch or extend, to draw out, to make or be long, to delay or give time, to forbear, to bring forth. To extend is the radical sense of measure.

2. To separate, or throw off or out; to secern, secrete, or discharge. Hence to become matter or sanies, to produce pus, to maturate. Here we have the origin of the word matter, in the sense of pus. It is an excretion, from throwing out, separating, freeing, discharging. Here we have the sense of the Latin mitto, emitto.

3. To assist, to supply. This sense is probably from coming to, that is, to approach or visit. "I was sick, and ye visited me. I was in prison, and ye came to me." Matth. xxv.

This application coincides with the English meet, but particularly with the Swedish and Danish sense of the word.

4. To make thin, to attenuate; probably from stretching.

Among the Arabic nouns formed under this root, we find a measure, or modius, showing that this verb is the same as the Chaldee and Hebrew; we find also matter, or pus, and lenity. Qu. Lat. mitis.

In Chaldee, מטא or מטה signifies to come to, to happen, to reach, [to meet,] to be ripe or mature, to cause to come, to bring or produce. The first sense gives that of finding, and the latter gives that of maturing, and we observe that matter, or pus, is from the Arabic مدّ madda, and the sense of mature, from the Chaldee מטא meta. Yet in the use of maturate, from the Latin maturo, we connect the words; for to maturate is to ripen, and to generate matter.

ـمـ

In Syriac, this verb signifies the same as the Chaldee, to come to; and also to be strong, to prevail; that is, to strain or stretch, the radical sense of power.

In Hebrew, מצא has the sense of the foregoing verb in the Chaldee; to find, to come to, to happen.

In Chaldee, this verb signifies to find, and to be strong, to prevail; hence, both in Hebrew and Chaldee, to be sufficient. Here we see the Danish and Swedish mætter, and mätta, to be sufficient. This is also meet, dialectically varied.

In Syriac, also, this verb signifies to be strong or powerful; also in Pah. to bring or press out, to defecate, which sense unites this word with the Heb. מצה, to press, to squeeze. In Ethiopic, this verb signifies to come, to happen, to cause to come, to bring in, to bring forth. Now, it is evident that מצא, and the Chaldee מטא, are dialectical forms of the same word; the former coinciding with the German mass in orthography, but with the other languages in signification.

In Chaldee, מצע signifies the middle, and, as a verb, to set in the middle, to pass the middle; in Syriac, to be divided in the middle. Qu. Is not this a branch of the family of meet?

In Chaldee, אמד amad, to measure, is evidently from מד, with a prefix or formative א. This word, in Syriac, signifies, like the simple verb, to escape, to be liberated. In Pael, to liberate.

In Arabic, this verb أمد amida, signifies to be terminated, to end; whence the noun, an end, limit, termination, Latin meta; which, Ainsworth informs us, signifies, in a metaphorical sense, a limit. The fact is the reverse; this is its primary and literal sense, and that of a pillar and goal are particular appropriations of that sense.

In Hebrew, גמד signifies a cubit, a measure of length.

The same in the Rabbinic, from מד, with a prefix.

In Chaldee, this verb signifies to be contracted, to shrink.

Is not this sense from מד, measure, modus; a limit, or a drawing?

That the Shemitic words, מדד, מטא, מצא and אמד, are words of the same stock with meet, mete, Lat metior, there can be no doubt; but it is not easy to understand why the different significations of meeting and measuring should be united in one word, in the Saxon language, when they are expressed by very different words in the Shemitic, and in most of the Teutonic languages. We know, indeed, that in German a sibilant letter is often used, in words which are written with a dental in all the other kindred languages. But in this case, the German mass, measure, must coincide with מד, as must the Swedish mäta, and Dan. maade, and the Saxon metan, Dutch gemoeten, Goth. motyan, Sw. möta, Dan. möder, with the Chaldee מטא, but not with the word מצא.

It may not be impossible nor improbable that all these words are from one stock or radix, and that the different orthographies and applications are dialectical changes of that root, introduced among different families or races of men, before languages were reduced to writing.

In the Latin mensus, from metior, the n is probably casual, the original being mesus, as in the French mesure. I have reason to think there are many instances of this insertion of n before d and s.

From this exhibition of words and their significations, we may fairly infer the common origin of the following words. Lat. mitto, French mettre, English meet, to come to, meet, fit, and mete, to measure, Lat. metior, metor, Gr. μετρον, μετρεω, Lat. mensura, Fr. mesure, Eng. measure, Lat. modus, mode, Sax. and Goth. mod, mind, anger; whence moody, Eng. moot, Lat. maturus, mature, and Eng. matter.

In Welsh, madu signifies to cause to proceed; to send; [Lat. mitto;] to suffer to go off; to render productive; to become beneficial; and mâd signifies what proceeds or goes forward, hence what is good; and mad, the adjective, signifies proceeding, advancing, progressive, good or beneficial. This word, then, affords a clear proof of the radical sense of good. We have like evidence in the English better, best, and in prosperity, which is from the Greek προσφερω, to advance.

In Welsh also we find madrez, matter, pus; madru, to dissolve, to putrefy, to become pus. That these words are from the same root as the Arabic مد supra, I think to be very obvious; and here we observe that the Welsh have one important sense derived from the root, that of good, which occurs in none of the other languages. But the primary sense is the same as that of the other significations, to go forward, to advance; hence to promote interest or happiness. Here we have undeniable evidence that the sense of good, Welsh mad, and the sense of matter, pus, proceed from the same radix.

LEGO.

The Greek λεγω is rendered, to speak or say; to tell, count, or number; to gather, collect, or choose; to discourse; and to lie down. This last definition shows that this word is the English lie and lay; and from this application, doubtless, the Latins had their lectus, a bed; that is, a spread, a lay.

The Latin lego, the same verb, is rendered to gather; to choose; to read; to steal, or collect by stealing; and the phrase legere oram signifies to coast, to sail along a coast; legere vela, is to furl the sails; legere halitum, to take breath; legere littus, to sail close to the shore; legere milites, to enlist or muster soldiers; legere pugno, to strike, perhaps to lay on with the fist.

It would seem, at first view, that such various significations can not proceed from one radix. But the fact that they do is indubitable. The primary sense of the root must be to throw, strain, or extend, which in this, as in almost all cases, gives the sense of speaking. The sense of collecting, choosing, gathering, is from throwing, or drawing out, or separating by some such act; or from throwing together. The sense of lying down is probably from throwing one's self down. The sense of reading, in Latin, is the same as that of speaking, in the Greek, unless it may be from collecting, that is, separating the letters, and uniting them in syllables and words; for in the primitive mode of writing, diacritical points were not used. But probably the sense of reading is the same as in speaking.

The phrases legere oram, legere littus, in Latin, may coincide with that of our seamen, to stretch or lay along the shore or coast, or to hug the land; especially if this word lay, in Sanscrit, signifies to cling, as I have seen it stated in some author, but for which I can not vouch. If this sense is attached to the word, it proves it closely allied to the L. ligo, to bind.

That the sense of throwing, or driving, is contained in this word, is certain from its derivatives. Thus, in Greek, απολεγω signifies to select, to collect; and also to reject, to repudiate, and to forbid; which imply throwing, thrusting away.

Now, if throwing, sending, or driving, is the primary sense, then the Latin lego, to read, and lego, legare, to send, are radically the same word; the inflections of the verb being varied, arbitrarily, to designate the distinct applications, just as in pello, appello, appellere, to drive, and appello, appellare, to call.

And here it may be worth a moment's consideration, whether several words with prefixes, such as slag, flog, and the Latin plico, W. plygu, are not formed on the root of lay, that is, lag or lak. The sense of slay, Sax. slagan, slœan, is properly to strike, to beat; hence, in Saxon, "Hig slogon heora wedd," they slew their league, or contract; that is, they struck a bargain. It signifies also to throw, as to slag one into prison; also, to fall; to set or lay. The sense of killing is derivative from that of striking, a striking down.

Flog, Lat. fligo, signifies, primarily, to rush, drive, strike, Eng. to lick; and, if formed on the root of lay, is precisely the popular phrase, to lay on.

If plico is formed with a prefix on lay or its root, it must have been originally pelico, that is, belico, belay. Then, to fold would be to lay on or close; to lay one part to another. Now, this word is the Welsh plygu, to fold, which Owen makes to be a compound of py and lly. The latter word must be a contraction of llyg.

We know that the word reply is from the French repliquer, the Latin replico. Now, to reply is not to fold back, but to send back, to throw back, as words, or an answer; and this gives the precise sense of lay, to throw, to send, which must be the sense of the radical word.

It is no inconsiderable evidence of the truth of my conjecture, that we constantly use the phrase to lay on, or lay to, as synonymous with ply, a word belonging to this family. To pledge, another of this family, is to lay down, to deposit; and the primary sense of play, Saxon plegan, Dan. leger, Sw. leka, is to strike or drive.

In Welsh, lluçiaw signifies to throw, fling, cast, or dart; to pelt; to drift; from lluç, a darting, a flash, glance, or sudden throw; hence lluçed, lightning. Llug signifies, also, that breaks, or begins to open; a gleam, a breaking out in blotches; the plague. Llwg signifies, also, that is apt to break out, that is bright, a tumor, eruption. These words coincide with English light, Lat. luceo; the primary sense of which is to throw, shoot, or dart; and these words all contain the elements of flog and fling.

In Welsh, llyçu signifies to fall flat, to lie extended, or to squat. This is evidently allied to lay and lie.

These senses agree also with that of luck, to fall, or come suddenly; that is, to rush or drive along.

In Russ. vlagayu is to lay, or put in; equivalent to the German einlegen.

The Latin fluo is contracted from flugo; and the radical sense of flow is the same as that of light. So the river Aar, in Europe, is doubtless from the same source as the Oriental אור, to shine, whence air. And נהר, which, in Hebrew, signifies to flow as water, as well as to shine, chiefly signifies, in Chaldee and Syriac, to shine.

To show the great importance, or rather the absolute necessity, of ascertaining the primary sense of words, in order to obtain clear ideas of the sense of ancient authors, more particularly of difficult passages in dead languages, let the reader attend to the following remarks.

In commenting on certain parts of Isaiah xxviii. Lowth observes, in his Preliminary Dissertation, the difficulty of determining the meaning of חזוה, in verse 15th. In our version, as in others, it is rendered agreement; but, says Lowth, "the word means no such thing in any part of the Bible, except in the 18th verse following; nor can the lexicographers give any satisfactory account of the word in this sense." Yet he agrees with Vitringa, that in these passages it must have this signification. The difficulty, it seems, has arisen from not understanding the primary sense of seeing, for the verb generally signifies to see; and as a noun the word signifies sight, vision; and so it is rendered in the Latin version annexed to Vanderhoogh't's Bible. The Seventy render it by συνθηκη, a covenant or league; and they are followed by the moderns. "Nous avons intelligence avec le sépulchre:" French. "Noi habbiam fatta lega col sepulcro:" Italian of Diodati.

Parkhurst understands the word to signify, to fasten, to settle, and he cites 2 Sam. xx. 9, תחז, "Joab took Amasa by the beard." Here the sense is obvious; and from this and other passages, we may infer with certainty, that the radical sense is to reach to, or to seize, hold, or fix. If the sense is to reach to, then it accords with covenant, conveniens, coming to; if the sense is to fix, or fasten, then it agrees with league, Lat. ligo, and with pact, pactum, from pango, to make fast; all from the sense of extension, stretching, straining. Hence the meaning of חזוה, the breast; that is, the firm, fixed, strong part. And if the English gaze is the same word, which is not improbable, this determines the appropriate sense of seeing, in this word, to be to fix, or to look or reach with the eye fixed.

But we have other and decisive evidence of the primary signification of this word in the obvious, undisputed meaning of אחז, the same word with a prefix, which signifies to catch, or lay hold on; to seize; hence behind, following, as if attached to; and hence drawing out in time, to delay.

Now, it is not improbable that the Arabic حاز hauza, may be a word of the same stock; and this signifies, among other senses, to collect, contract, or draw together, to accumulate, to have intercourse or commerce with another. The latter sense would give nearly the signification of the Hebrew word.

Lexicographers are often embarrassed to account for the different signification of words that are evidently derived from the same root. Thus, in Hebrew, שור is rendered to sing; to look, behold, or observe; and to rule; and its derivatives, a ruler, a wall, the navel-string, a chain or necklace, &c. How can a word signify to rule, and to sing, and to look? Nothing can be more easy or natural. The sense is, in both cases, to stretch or strain, to reach. To sing is to strain the voice; to rule is to restrain men; and to see is to reach, or to hold in view.

In Latin, sero signifies to sow, to plant, to beget, to spread; consero, to sow, and to close or join; desero, to leave off, to desert; assero, to plant by or near, and to assert, affirm, and pronounce; dissero, to discourse; insero, to insert, to implant; resero, to unlock, to open, to disclose. Desero, to desert, Ainsworth says, is a compound of de and sero, "ut sit desertum quod non seritur nec colitur." And dissero he supposes must be a metaphorical use of the word. Now, on the principles I have unfolded, nothing is easier than an explanation of these words. The sense of sero is to throw, to thrust; its literal sense is applied to sowing and planting; consero is to thrust or drive together; desero is to throw from; assero is to throw in words, or to throw out, as in appello; dissero is to throw words or arguments, with the sense of spreading, expatiating; insero is to throw or thrust in; resero is to throw or drive from, hence to unlock or open.

It is by resorting to the primary idea of words, that we are able to explain applications, apparently, or in fact, diverse and even contrary. A very common example of this contrariety occurs in words which signify to guard or defend. For instance, the Latin arceo signifies to drive off, and to protect, secure, hold, restrain, or keep from departing or escaping; two senses directly opposite. This is extremely natural; for arceo signifies to thrust off, repel, drive back; and this act defends the person or object attacked. Or if we suppose the sense of straining to be anterior to that of repulsion, which is not improbable, then the act of straining or holding produces both effects; to repel or stop what advances to assault, and protect what is inclosed or assaulted. The words guard and warren present a similar application of the primary idea; and all languages which I have examined furnish a multitude of similar examples.

These examples illustrate the utility of extensive researches in language; as all cognate languages throw light on each other; one language often retaining the radical meaning of a word which the others have lost. Who, for instance, that is acquainted only with the English use of the verb to have, would suspect that this word and happen are radically one, and that the primary sense is to fall or rush, hence to fall on and seize? Yet nothing is more certain. In the Spanish language the senses of both verbs are retained in haber; and the Welsh hapiaw gives us the true original signification.

In like manner the primary sense of venio, in Latin, can not be certainly determined, without resorting to other words, and to kindred languages. In Latin, the word signifies to come or arrive; but in Spanish, venida, from venir, the Latin venio, signifies not only a coming or arrival, but an attack in fencing. Venio coincides in origin with the English find; Saxon findan; German and Dutch finden, to find, to fall or light on, Danish finder; Swedish, finna, to find, to discover, to meet, to strike against, [offendere.] The primary sense of venio, then, is not merely to come or arrive, but to rush or move with a driving force; and this sense is applicable to coming or going.

That the primary sense is to fall or rush, we have evidence in the Latin ventus, and English wind, both from the root of this verb. We have still further evidence in the word venom, which in Welsh is gwenwyn; gwen, white, and gwyn, rage, smart, whence gwynt, wind. Venom is that which frets or excites a raging pain. Hence we may infer that Latin venor, to hunt, to chase, is of the same family; and so is venia, leave, or leave to depart, or a departure, a leaving, coinciding in signification with leave.

The latter word, venia, proves another fact, that the primary sense of venio is, in general, to move in any direction, and that the Latin sense, to come, is a particular appropriation of that sense.

In ascertaining the primary sense of words, it is often useful or necessary to recur to the derivatives. Thus the Latin lædo is rendered to hurt; but, by adverting to allido, elido, and collido, we find that the original signification is to strike, hit, or dash against. Hurt, then, is the secondary sense; the effect of the primary action expressed by the verb.

So the Latin rapio, to seize, does not give the sense of rapidus, rapid; but the sense of the latter proves the primary sense of rapio to be to rush, and in its application, to rush on and seize.

These examples will be sufficient to show how little the affinities of language have been understood. Men have been generally satisfied with a knowledge of the appropriate sense of words, without examining from what visible or physical action, or primary sense, that particular application has been derived. Hence the obscurity that still rests on the theory of language. It has been supposed that each word, particularly each verb, has an original specific sense, or application, distinct from every other verb. We find, however, on a close examination and comparison of the same word in different languages, that the fact is directly the reverse; that a verb expressing some action, in a general sense, gives rise to various appropriate senses, or particular applications. And in the course of my researches, I have been struck with the similarity of manner in which different nations have appropriated derivative and figurative senses. For example, all nations, as far as my researches extend, agree in expressing the sense of justice and right by straightness; and sin, iniquity, wrong, by a deviation from a straight line or course. Equally remarkable is the simplicity of the analogies in language, and the small number of radical significations; so small, indeed, that I am persuaded the primary sense of all the verbs in any language may be expressed by thirty or forty words.

We can not, at this period of the world, determine, in all cases, which words are primitive, and which are derivative; nor whether the verb or the noun is the original word. Mons. Gebelin, in his Monde Primitif, maintains that the noun is the root of all other words. Never was a greater mistake. That some nouns may have been formed before the verbs with which they are connected, is possible; but, as languages are now constructed, it is demonstrably certain, that the verb is the radix or stock from which have sprung most of the nouns, adjectives, and other parts of speech belonging to each family. This is the result of all my researches into the origin of languages. We find, indeed, that many modern verbs are formed on nouns; as, to practice from practice; but the noun is derived from a Greek verb. So we use wrong as a verb, from the adjective wrong; but the latter is primarily a participle of the verb to wring. Indeed, a large part of all nouns were originally particles or adjectives, and the things which they denote were named from their qualities. So pard, pardus, is from ברד barad, hail; and the animal so named from his spots, as if sprinkled with hail, from the sense of separation or scattering. Crape, the Fr. crêpe, is from crêper, to crisp. Sight signifies, primarily, seen; it being the participle of seon, contracted from sigan. Draught is the participle of draw, that which is drawn, or the act of drawing; thought is the participle of think.

As the verb is the principal radix of other words, and as the proper province of this part of speech is to express action, almost all the modifications of the primary sense of the verb may be comprehended in one word, to move.

The principal varieties of motion or action may be expressed by the following verbs.

1. To drive, throw, thrust, send, urge, press.
2. To set, fix, lay. But these are usually from thrusting, or throwing down.
3. To strain, stretch, draw; whence holding, binding, strength, power, and often health.
4. To turn, wind, roll, wander.
5. To flow, to blow, to rush.
6. To open, part, split, separate, remove, scatter. See No. 16.
7. To swell, distend, expand, spread.
8. To stir, shake, agitate, rouse, excite.
9. To shoot, as a plant; to grow; allied to No. 1.
10. To break, or burst; allied sometimes to No. 3.
11. To lift, raise, elevate; allied to No. 9.
12. To flee, withdraw, escape; to fly; often allied to No. 1.
13. To rage; to burn; allied to Nos. 7 and 8.
14. To fall; to fail; whence fading, dying, &c.
15. To approach, come, arrive, extend, reach. This is usually the sense of gaining. No. 34.
16. To go, walk, pass, advance; allied to No. 6.
17. To seize, take, hold; sometimes allied to No. 31.
18. To strike; to beat; allied to No. 1.
19. To swing; to vibrate. No. 29.
20. To lean; to incline; allied to the sense of wandering, or departing.
21. To rub, scratch, scrape; often connected with driving, and with roughness.
22. To swim; to float.
23. To stop, cease, rest; sometimes, at least, from straining, holding, fastening.
24. To creep; to crawl; sometimes connected with scraping.
25. To peel, to strip, whence spoiling.
26. To leap, to spring; allied to Nos. 9 and 1.
27. To bring, bear, carry; in some instances connected with producing, throwing out.
28. To sweep.
29. To hang. No. 19.
30. To shrink, or contract; that is, to draw. See No. 3.
31. To run; to rush forward; allied to No. 1.
32. To put on or together; to unite; allied to Nos. 1 and 3.
33. To knit, to weave.
34. To gain, to win, to get. See No. 15.

These and a few more verbs express the literal sense of all the primary roots. But it must be remarked that all the foregoing significations are not distinct. So far from it, that the whole may be brought under the signification of a very few words. The English words to send, throw, thrust, strain, stretch, draw, drive, urge, press, embrace the primary sense of a great part of all the verbs in every language which I have examined. Indeed, it must be so, for the verb is certainly the root of most words; and the verb expresses motion, which always implies the application of force.

Even the verbs which signify to hold or stop, in most instances at least, if not in all, denote, primarily, to strain or restrain by exertion of force; and to lie is, primarily, to throw down, to lay one's self down. So that intransitive verbs are rarely exceptions to the general remark above made, that all verbs primarily express motion or exertion of force. The substantive verb has more claims to be an exception than any other; for this usually denotes, I think, permanence or continued being; but the primary sense of this verb may perhaps be to set or fix; and verbs having this sense often express extension in time or duration. So τεινω, in Greek, is to stretch, but the same word teneo, in Latin, is to hold; hence continuance.

Let us now attend to the radical sense of some of the most common verbs.

Speaking, calling, crying, praying, utterance of sounds, is usually from the sense of driving or straining. Thus, in Latin, appello and compello, though of a different conjugation from pello, depello, impello, are from the same root; and although the Latin repello does not signify to recall, yet the corresponding word in Italian, rappellare, and the French rappeler, signify to recall, and hence the English repeal. Hence also peal, either of a bell or of thunder. This is the Greek βαλλω, and probably παλλω is from the same root. The sense of striking is found in the Greek verb, and so it is in the Latin loquor, English clock. But in general, speaking, in all its modifications, is the straining, driving, or impulse of sounds. Sometimes the sense coincides more exactly with that of breaking or bursting.

Singing is a driving or straining of the voice; and we apply strain to a passage of music, and to a course of speaking.

I am not confident that I can refer the sensation of hearing to any visible action. Possibly it may sometimes be from striking, hitting, touching. But we observe that hear is connected in origin with ear, as the Latin audio is with the Greek ους, ωτος, the ear; whence it appears probable that the verb to hear is formed from the name of the ear, and the ear is from some verb which signifies to shoot or extend, for it signifies a limb.

The primary sense of seeing is commonly to extend to, to reach; as it were, to reach with the eye. Hence the use of behold, for the radical sense of hold is to strain; and hence its signification in beholden, held, bound, obligated. See the verb See, in the Dictionary.

The sense of look may be somewhat different from that of see. It appears, in some instances, to have for its primary signification, to send, throw, cast; that is, to send or cast the eye or sight.

The primary sense of feeling is to touch, hit, or strike; and probably this is the sense of taste.

Wonder and astonishment are usually expressed by some word that signifies to stop or hold. Hence the Latin miror, to wonder, is the Armoric miret, to stop, hold, hinder; coinciding with the English moor, and Spanish amarrar, to moor, as a ship.

To begin is to come, or fall on; to thrust on. We have a familiar example in the Latin incipio, in and capio; for capio is primarily to fall or rush on and seize. See Begin, in the Dictionary.

Attempt is expressed by straining, stretching, as in Latin tento. See Assay and Essay.

Power, strength, and the corresponding verb, to be able, are usually expressed by straining, stretching, and this is the radical sense of ruling or governing. Of this the Latin rego is an example, which gives rectus, right, that is, stretched, straight.

Care, as has been stated, is usually from straining, that is, a tension of the mind.

Thinking is expressed by setting. To think is to set or fix or hold in the mind. It approaches to the sense of suppose, Latin suppono.

And under this word, let us consider the various applications of the Latin puto. The simple verb puto is rendered to prune, lop, or dress, as vines; that is, according to Ainsworth, putum, i. e. purum reddo, purgo, by which I understand him to mean, that putum is either a change of purum, or used for it; a most improbable supposition, for the radical letters t and r are not commutable. Puto is rendered, also, to make even, clear, adjust, or cast up accounts; also to think or consider; to suppose; to debate. Its compounds are amputo, to cut off, prune, amputate, to remove; computo, to compute, to reckon, to think or deem; disputo, to make clear, to adjust or settle, to dispute or debate, to reason; imputo, to impute, to ascribe or lay to, to place to account; reputo, to consider, to revolve, to reckon up, to impute. The Latin deputo signifies to think, judge or esteem, to account or reckon, and to prune; but the Italian deputare, Spanish diputar, and French deputer, from the Latin word, all signify to send. How can the sense of think, and that of lop or prune, be deduced from a common root or radical sense? We find the solution of this question in the verb to depute. The primary sense is to throw, thrust, or send, or to set or lay, which is from throwing, driving. To prune is to separate, remove, or drive off; to force off; to think is a setting in the mind; to compute is to throw or put together, either in the mind or in numbers; to dispute is to throw against or apart, like debate, to beat from; to impute is to throw or put to or on; and to repute is to think or throw in the mind repeatedly. To amputate is to separate by cutting round. Puto, then, in Latin, is from the same root, probably, as the English put, or the same word differently applied; and also the Dutch pooten, to plant; poot, a paw, a twig or shoot, Gr. φυτον, &c.

In attempting to discover the primary sense of words, we are to carry our reflections back to the primitive state of mankind, and consider how rude men would effect their purposes, before the invention or use of the instruments which the moderns employ. The English verb to cut, signifies, ordinarily, to separate with an edged tool; and we are apt to consider this as the chief and original sense. But if so, how can cut, the stroke of a whip, which is a legitimate sense of the word, be deduced from the act of severing by an edged tool? We have, in this popular use of the word, a clew to guide us to the primary sense, which is, to drive, urge, press; and, applied to the arm, to strike. But we have better evidence. In the popular practice of speaking in New England, it is not uncommon to hear one person call to another when running, and say, Cut on, cut on; that is, hurry, run faster, drive, press on; probably from striking a beast which one rides on. This is the original sense of the word. Hence we see that this verb is the Latin cædo, to strike, to cut down, somewhat differently applied and cado, to fall, is only a modified sense of the same root, and the compounds incido, to cut, and incido, to fall on, are of one family. To cut is, therefore, primarily, to strike, or drive; and to cut off, if applied to the severing of bodies, before edged tools were used, was to force off, or to strike off; hence the sense of separating in the phrase to cut off a retreat or communication.

So the Latin carpo is the English carve, originally to separate by plucking, pulling, seizing and tearing; afterwards, by cutting.

Asking is usually expressed by the sense of pressing, urging. We have a clear proof of this in the Latin peto and its compounds. This verb signifies, primarily, to rush, to drive at, to assault; and this sense, in Dictionaries, ought to stand first in the order of definitions. We have the force of the original in the words impetus and impetuous. So the Latin rogo coincides in elements with reach.

The act of understanding is expressed by reaching or taking, holding, sustaining; the sense of comprehend, and of understand. We have a popular phrase which well expresses this sense, "I take your meaning or your idea." So in German, begreifen, to begripe, to apprehend.

Knowing seems to have the same radical sense as understanding.

Pain, grief, distress, and the like affections, are usually expressed by pressure or straining. Affliction is from striking.

Joy, mirth, and the like affections, are from the sense of rousing, exciting, lively action.

Covering, and the like actions, are from spreading over or cutting off, interruption.

Hiding is from covering or from withdrawing, departure; or concealment may be from withholding, restraining, suppressing, or making fast, as in the Latin celo.

Heat usually implies excitement; but as the effect of heat, as well as of cold, is sometimes to contract, I think both are sometimes from the same radix. Thus cold and the Lat. caleo, to be warm, and callus and calleo, to be hard, have all the same elementary letters, and I suppose them all to be from one root, the sense of which is, to draw, strain, shrink, contract. I am the more inclined to this opinion, for these words coincide with calleo, to be strong or able, to know; a sense that implies straining and holding.

Hope is probably from reaching forward. We express strong desire by longing, reaching toward.

Earnestness, boldness, daring, peril, promptness, readiness, willingness, love, and favor, are expressed by advancing or inclining.

Light is often expressed by opening, or the shooting of rays, radiation; and probably, in many cases, the original word was applied to the dawn of day in the morning. Whiteness is often connected in origin with light. We have an instance of this in the Latin caneo, to shine and to be white.

And that the primary sense of this word is to shoot, to radiate, that is, to throw out or off, we have evidence in the verb cano, to sing, whence canto, the sense of which is retained in our popular use of cant; to cant a stone; to cant over a cask; give the thing a cant; for all these words are from one stock.

The Latin virtus, the English worth, is from the root of vireo, to grow, that is, to stretch forward, to shoot; hence the original sense is strength, a sense we retain in its application to the qualities of plants. Hence the Latin sense of virtus is bravery, coinciding with the sense of boldness, a projecting forward.

Pride is from swelling or elevation, the primary sense of some other words nearly allied to it.

Fear is usually from shrinking or from shaking, trembling; or sometimes, perhaps, from striking, a being struck, as with surprise.

Holiness and sacredness are sometimes expressed by separation, as from common things. The Teutonic word holy, however, seems to be from the sense of soundness, entireness.

Faith and belief seem to imply a resting on, or a leaving. It is certain that the English belief is a compound of the prefix be and leaf, leave, permission. To believe one, then, is to leave with him, to rest or suffer to rest with him, and hence not to dispute, contend, or deny.

Color may be from spreading over or putting on; but in some instances the primary sense is to dip. See Dye and Tinge.

Spots are from the sense of separating, or from sprinkling, dispersion.

The radical sense of making is to press, drive, or force. We use make in its true literal sense, in the phrases, Make your horse draw, Make your servant do what you wish.

Feeding is from the sense of pressing, crowding, stuffing; that is, from driving or thrusting. Eating seems to have a somewhat different sense.

Drinking is from drawing, or from wetting, plunging. Drench and drink are radically one word.

Anger, and the like violent passions, imply excitement, or violent action. Hence their connection with burning or inflammation, the usual sense of which is raging or violent commotion.

Agreement, harmony, are usually from meeting or union, or from extending, reaching to.

Dwelling, abiding, are from the sense of throwing or setting down, or resting, or from stretching; as we see by the Latin continuo, from teneo, Gr. τεινω, to extend.

Guarding and defending are from roots that signify to stop, or to cut off; or, more generally, from the sense of driving off; a repelling or striking back. In some cases, perhaps, from holding.

Opposition is usually expressed by meeting, and hence the prepositions which express opposition. Thus the Danish preposition mod, Swedish mot or emot, against, contrary, is the English word to meet.

Words which express spirit, denote, primarily, breath, air, wind, the radical sense of which is to flow, move, or rush. Hence the connection between spirit and courage, animus, animosus; hence passion, animosity. So in Greek φρενιτις, frenzy, is from φρην, the mind, or rather from its primary sense, a moving or rushing.

So in our mother tongue, mod is mind or spirit; whence mood, in English, and Saxon modig, moody, angry. Hence mind in the sense of purpose, its primary signification, is a setting forward, as intention is from intendo, to stretch, to strain, the sense that ought to stand first in a Dictionary.

Reproach, chiding, rebuke, are from the sense of scolding, or throwing out words with violence.

Sin is generally from the sense of deviating, wandering, as is the practice of lewdness.

Right, justice, equity, are from the sense of stretching, making straight, or from laying, making smooth.

Falsehood is from falling, failing, or from deviation, wandering, drawing aside.

The primary sense of strange and foreign, is distant, and from some verb signifying to depart. Wild and fierce are from a like sense.

Vain, vanity, wane, and kindred words, are from exhausting, drawing out, or from departing, withdrawing, falling away.

Paleness is usually from failure, a departure of color.

Glory is from opening, expanding, display, or making clear.

Binding, making fast or close, is from pressure, or straining.

Writing is from scratching, engraving, the sense of all primitive words which express this act.

A crowd, a mass, a wood, &c., are from collecting or pressing, or some allied signification.

Vapor, steam, smoke, are usually from verbs which signify to exhale or throw off.

Stepping seems to be from opening, expanding, stretching. Thus passus in Latin is from pando, to open, but this agrees in origin with pateo, and with the Greek πατεω. Gradus, in Latin, coincides with the Welsh rhawd, a way, and this, when traced to its root, terminates in the Oriental רד, רדה, Chaldee, to open, stretch or expand; in Syriac, ܪܕܐ reda, to go, to pass. Walking may be sometimes from a like source; but the word walk signifies, primarily, to roll, press, work and full, as a hat, whence walker signifies a fuller.

Softness and weakness are usually named from yielding, bend- ing, withdrawing, as is relaxation. Softness, however, is sometimes connected with smoothness, and perhaps with moisture.

Sweetness seems to have for its primary sense, either softness or smoothness.

Roughness is from sharp points, wrinkling or breaking; and acidity is from sharpness or pungency, and nearly allied to roughness.

Death is expressed by falling or departure; life, by fixedness or continuance, or from animation, excitement.

Selling is, primarily, a passing or transfer. Sellan, in Saxon, signifies to give, as well as to sell.

A coast or border is usually the extreme point, from extending.

Law is from setting, establishing.

The primary sense of son, daughter, offspring, is usually a shoot, or, as we say, issue. Hence, in Hebrew, בן ben, signifies both a son, a cion, a branch, and the young of other animals. A son, says Parkhurst, is from בנה banah, to build; and hence he infers that a son is so called, because he builds up or continues his father's house or family. But if so, how does the word apply to a branch, or an arrow? What do these build up? The mistake of this author, and of others, proceeds from their not understanding the original meaning of the verb, which is not to erect, or elevate, but to throw, to set, to found; and this verb is probably retained in our word found. A son is that which is thrown or shot out; a cion or branch is the same, an offset, one an offset of the human body, the other of a plant, and an arrow is that which is shot or thrown. Hence, probably, the Hebrew אבן eben or even, a stone, W. maen or vaen, that which is set, so named from its compactness or hardness. And in Arabic ابن abana, signifies to think, Lat. opinor, that is, to set in the mind.

Few and small are senses often expressed by the same word. Thus, although few in English expresses merely a small number, yet the same word in French, peu, and in the Italian, poco, signifies little in quantity, as well as few in number.

Cause is from the sense of urging, pressing, impelling. Hence it well expresses that which produces an effect; and hence it is peculiarly expressive of that by which a man seeks to obtain a claim in law. A cause in court is properly a pressing for right, like action from ago; and prosecution from the Latin sequor, which is our word seek. Hence the Latin accuso, to accuse, to throw upon, to press, or load with a charge. The Saxon saca, contention, suit in law, is synonymous with cause, and from the root of seek, sequor. It is the English sake.

The word thing is nearly synonymous with cause and sake. See THING, in the Dictionary.

The primary sense of time, luck, chance, fortune, is to fall, to come, to arrive, to happen. Tide, time, and season, have a like original sense. Tide, in Saxon, is time, not a flow of the sea, the latter being a secondary and modern application of the word. This primary signification of time will unfold to us what I formerly could not understand, and what I could find no person to explain; that is, why the Latin tempora should signify times and the temples. It seems that tempora are the falls of the head. Hence, also, we understand why tempest is naturally deducible from tempus, as the primary sense is to fall, to rush. Hence tempestivus, seasonable, that comes in good time. Season has a like sense.

Hence, also, we are led to understand, what has seemed inexplicable, how the French heureux, lucky, happy, can be regularly deduced from heure, an hour. We find that in Greek and Latin the primary sense of hour is time, and time is a coming, a falling, a happening, like the English luck, and hence the sense of lucky; hence fortunate and happy. The word fortunate is precisely of the same character.

The primary sense of the Shemitic דבר davar, or thavar, corresponds almost precisely with that of cause and thing in English; that is, to strain, urge, drive, fall, or rush. Hence it signifies to speak, and in Ch. and Syr. to lead, to direct, to govern. As a noun, it signifies a word, that which is uttered; a thing, cause, or matter; that is, that which happens or falls, like event from evenio; also a plague, or great calamity; that is, that which falls or comes on man or beast, like plague; a stroke or affliction, from striking. And it may be observed, that if the first letter is a prefix answering to the Gothic du, Saxon and English to, in the Saxon todrifan, to drive, then the root בר coincides exactly with the Welsh peri, to command, which is retained in composition in the Lat. impero. Indeed, if the first syllable of guberno is a prefix, the root of this word may be the same. The object, however, for which this word is here mentioned, is chiefly to show the uniformity which men have observed in expressing their ideas; making use of the same visible physical action to represent the operations of the mind and moral ideas.

Silence, deafness, dumbness, are from stopping, holding, or making fast.

War is from the sense of striving, driving, struggling.

Good is generally from enlarging, or advancing, like prosperous.

Evil is from wandering, departing, or sometimes from softness, weakness, flowing or fluxibility, as is the case with the Latin malum, from the Welsh mall.

The primary sense of the names of natural and material objects can not always be ascertained. The reasons are obvious. Some of these names are detached branches of a family of words which no longer form a part of our language; the verb and all the derivatives, except a single name, being extinct, or found only in some remote country. Others of these names have suffered such changes of orthography, that it is difficult or impossible to ascertain the primary or radical letters, and of course the family to which they belong. Numerous examples of such words occur in English, as in every other language.

But from such facts as have occurred to me in my researches, I may venture to affirm with confidence, that most names of natural objects are taken from some obvious quality or action, or some supposed quality of the thing; or from the particular action or operation by which it is produced. Thus tumors are named from pushing, or swelling; and redness, or red, seems, in some instances at least, to be named from eruptions on the body. The human body is named from shaping, that is, setting, fixing, or extending, and hence, sometimes, the general name of the human race. The arm is a shoot, a push, as is the branch of a tree. A board, a table, a floor, is from spreading, or expanding, extending. Skin and bark are from peeling, stripping, &c.

The names of particular animals and plants can not always be traced to their source; but, as far as I have been able to discover their origin, I find animals to be generally named from some striking characteristic of external appearance; from the voice, from habits of life, or from their office. There is reason for believing that the Greek στρουθος and Latin struthio, or ostrich, is from the same root as the English strut, the strutter; the primary sense of which root is, to stretch, which explains all the senses of the Greek and Latin words of this family. It is certain that the crow is named from its cry, and the leopard from his spots.

Thus plants were named from their qualities; some from their form, others from their color, others from their effects, others from the place of their growth. The English root, Lat. radix, is only a particular application of rod and ray, radius; that is, a shoot. Spurge is, undoubtedly, from the root of the Latin purgo.

There is reason to think that many names of plants were originally adjectives, expressing their qualities; or the name was a compound, used for the same purpose, one part of which has been dropped, and the other remaining as the name of the plant. Thus pine, pinus, is from pin, pinna, penna; for in Welsh pin is a pin and a pen or style for writing, and pinbren is a pine-tree. The tree, then, was named from its leaf.

Fir has a similar origin and signification.

It is probable or rather certain, that some natural objects, as plants and minerals, received their names from their supposed qualities; as, in ages of ignorance and superstition, men might ascribe effects to them, by mistake. The whole history of magic and enchantment leads us to this conclusion.

Minerals are, in many instances, named from their obvious qualities, as gold from its yellowness, and iron from its hardness. The names can, in some cases, be traced to their original, as that of gold and of the Latin ferrum; but many of them are not easily ascertained. Indeed, the greatest part of the specific names of animals, plants, and minerals, appear to be obscure. Some of them appear to have no connection with any family of words in our language, and many of them are derived to us from Asia, and from roots which can be found only, if found at all, in the Asiatic languages.

These observations and explanations will be sufficient to show the importance of developing, as far as possible, the origin of words, and of comparing the different uses of the same word in different languages, in order to understand either the philosophy of speech, or the real force and signification of words in their practical application.

If it should be found to be true, that many of the Shemitic verbs are formed with prefixes, like those of the European languages, this may lead to new illustrations of the original languages of the Scriptures. In order to determine this fact, it will be useful to examine whether the Chaldee and Hebrew ב is not often a prefix answering to be in the Teutonic languages; whether ג and כ are not prefixes answering to the ga and ge of the Gothic and Teutonic; whether ד, ט, and ת, and ז, a dialectical form of ט, do not coincide with the Gothic du, the Saxon to, the Dutch toe, and the German zu; whether נ does not answer to the Russ. and Dutch na, the German nach; and whether ס and ש do not answer to s, sh, and sch in the modern English and German.

If many of the Shemitic triliteral verbs are compound, it follows that the primary radix has not been detected. At any rate, I have no hesitation in affirming, that the primary sense of many of the roots in the Shemitic languages, that sense which is almost indispensable to an understanding of many obscure passages in the Scriptures, has been hitherto overlooked or mistaken. In order fully to comprehend many uses of the words, it will be necessary to compare them with the uses of the words of the same family in the modern languages; and this comparison must be far more extensive than any hitherto made, and conducted on principles which have not been before duly appreciated and applied.

I have introduced the foregoing comparative view of the several significations of the same word in different languages, not merely to illustrate the general principles of language, but with a special reference to an explanation of the etymologies which occur in this work. Should my Synopsis ever be published, the learned inquirer might pursue the subject at his pleasure.

The results of the foregoing remarks and illustrations may be thus recapitulated.

1. The nations which now constitute the distinct families or races of Japheth and Shem, are descendants of the common family which inhabited the plain of Shinar before the dispersion.

2. The families at the dispersion retained a large proportion of the words which were in common use before that event, and the same were conveyed to their posterity. In the course of time, some of these words were dropped by one family or tribe, and some by another, till very few of them are retained in their original form and signification, by all the nations which have sprung from the main stock. A few of them, however, are still found in all or nearly all the languages which I have examined, bearing nearly the same signification and easily recognized as identical.

3. Although few of the primitive words can now be recognized as existing in all the languages, yet as we better understand the changes which have been made in the orthography and signification of the same radical words, the more affinities are discovered; and particularly, when we understand the primary sense, we find this to unite words whose appropriate or customary significations appear to have no connection.

4. A great number of the primitive radical words are found in compounds, formed in different languages, with different affixes and prefixes, which obscure the affinity. Thus veritas in Latin, is wahrheit in German; the first syllable in each is the same word, the last different. In other instances, both difference of orthography, of formation, and of application, concur to obscure the affinity of words. Thus the English word strong is in Danish streng, signifying stern, severe, rigid, strict; and strenghed [stronghood] is severity, rigor, strictness. Now, n in these words is not radical; remove this letter, and we have strog, streg, which coincide with the Latin stringo, strictus; and these words are found to be from the same radix, which signifies to draw, to strain, to stretch.

5. It appears that b, p and f are often prefixes, either the remains of prepositions, or casual additions to words, introduced by peculiar modes of pronunciation, which prefixes now precede consonants, with which they readily coalesce in pronunciation, as l and r, forming triliteral words on biliteral roots; as in block from lloc, or lock; play, Saxon plegan, from leg or lek, Swedish leka, Dan. leger; flow, Lat. fluo, from lug, or luc, which appears in light, lux, luceo, and in lug, a river, retained in Lugdunum.

6. It appears, also, that c or k and g are often prefixes before the same consonants, l and r, as in Lat. clunis, Eng. loin; W. clod, praise, from llod, Latin laus, laudo; German gluck, English luck; Lat. gratia, W. rhad.

7. It appears, also, that s is a prefix in a vast number of words, as in speed, spoil, swell, sweep; and it is very evident that st are prefixed to many words whose original, radical, initial consonant was r, as in straight, strict, strong, stretch, from the root of right, rectus, reach, and in stride, from the root of the Latin gradior, W. rhaz.

If these inferences are just, as I am persuaded they are, it follows that there is a more near resemblance and a much closer affinity between the languages of Europe and of Western Asia, than has hitherto been supposed to exist. It follows, also, that some of the most important principles or rudiments of language have hitherto escaped observation, and that philology is yet in its infancy. Should this prove, on further examination, to be the state of philology, it is reserved for future investigators to examine the original languages of the Scriptures on new principles, which may serve to illustrate some obscure and difficult passages, not hitherto explained to the general satisfaction of critics and commentators.

If any persons should be disposed to doubt or contradict these facts, let them first consider that my conclusions are not hasty opinions, formed on isolated facts; but that they have been forced upon me, in opposition to all my former habits of thinking, by a series of successive proofs and accumulating evidence, during a long course of investigation, in which I have compared most of the radical words, in more than twenty languages, twice, and some of them three times.

No part of my researches has given me more trouble or solicitude than that of arriving at the precise radical signification of moral ideas; such, for example, as hope, love, favor, faith. Nor has it been with much less labor that I have obtained a clear knowledge of some of our physical actions. It is literally true that I have sometimes had a word under consideration for two or three years, before I could satisfy my own mind as to the primary signification. That I have succeeded at last, in every instance, can hardly be supposed — yet, in most cases, I am perfectly satisfied with the results of my researches.

PROGRESS AND CHANGES OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

It has been already observed that the mother tongue of the English is the Anglo-Saxon. The following are specimens of that language as it was spoken or written in England before the Norman conquest. The first is from the Saxon Chronicle. The original is in one column, and the literal translation in the other. The English words in Italics are Saxon words. The number of these will show how large a proportion of the words is retained in the present English.

We observe by these extracts that rather more than half the Saxon words have been lost, and now form no part of our language.*

This language, with some words introduced by the Danes, continued to be used by the English till the Norman conquest. After that event, great numbers of Saxon words went into disuse, not suddenly, but gradually, and French and Latin words were continually added to the language, till it began to assume its present form, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Yet the writings of Gower and Chaucer can not now be fully understood without a glossary.

But it was not in the loss of native Saxon words and the accession of French and Latin words alone, that the change of our language consisted. Most important alterations were made in the sounds of the vowels. It is probable, if not certain, that our first vowel a had usually or always the broad sound, as we now pronounce it in fall, or in some words perhaps the Italian sound, as it is now called, and as we pronounce it in far. The sound of e was probably nearly the same as it is in French and Italian, and in the northern languages on the continent of Europe; which is nearly that of a in favor. The Saxon sound of i was probably the same as it is still on the Continent, the sound of ee or long ę. The sound of u was that of our present oo, French ou, the sound it still has in Italian, and in most countries on the European continent. It is probable that the change of the sound of u happened in consequence of the prevalence of the French pronunciation after the conquest; for the present sound of u may be considered as intermediate, between the full sound of oo, or French ou, and the French sound of u.

These changes, and the various sounds given to the same character, now serve to perplex foreigners, when learning English; and tend, in no small degree, to retard or limit the extension of our language. This is an unfortunate circumstance, not only in obstructing the progress of science, but of Christianity.

The principal changes in the articulations are the use of k for c, as in look for locian; the loss of h before l, as in loaf from hlaf, lot for hlot, lean for hlinian; and the entire loss of the prefix ge or ga, as in deal for ge-dælan, deem for ge-deman; and of to as a prefix, as in to-helpan, to help; to-dailan, to deal. In no instance do we feel more sensibly the change of sounds in the vowels, than in that of i, which in French, Spanish, and Italian, is e long; for in consequence of this, persons who are not acquainted with these foreign languages, mispronounce such words as marino, Messina, Lima, giving to i its English sound, when in fact the words are to be pronounced mareeno, Messeena, Leema.

In grammatical structure the language has suffered considerable alterations. In our mother tongue, nouns were varied to form cases, somewhat as in Latin. This declension of nouns has entirely ceased, except in the possessive or genitive case, in which an apostrophe before s has been substituted for the regular Saxon termination es. Some of our pronouns retain their declensions, somewhat varied. The plural termination in en has been dropped, in a number of words, and the regular plural termination been substituted, as houses for housen.

In most cases, the Saxon termination of the infinitive mode of verbs has been dropped, and for gifan we now write, to give. The variations of the verb, in the several persons, have been materially changed. Thus for the Saxon —

Ic lufige,	We lufiath,
Thu lufast,	Ge lufiath,
He lufath;	Hi lufiath;

we now write —

I love,	We love,
Thou lovest,	Ye love,
He loveth or loves;	They love.

In the Saxon plural, however, we see the origin of the vulgar practice still retained in some parts of England and of this country. We loves, they loves, which are contractions of lufiath.

In the substantive verb, our common people universally, and most persons of better education, unless they have rejected their traditionary language, retain the Gothic dialect, in the past tense.

I was,	We was,
Thou wast,	Ye was,
He was;	They was.

However people may be ridiculed for this language, it is of genuine origin, as old as the Saxon word were. In Gothic the past tense runs thus —

* Mr. Meidinger of Frankfort, in the Introduction to his Etymological and Comparative Dictionary of the Teuto-Gothic Languages, notices this observation of mine, respecting the proportion of Saxon words which have been lost, and then states the opinion of Mr. Turner, that more than four-fifths of the words in modern English are of Saxon origin. This difference in the two statements proceeds from a circumstance overlooked. My statement refers only to the actual proportion of Saxon words retained in the vocabulary, which is probably less than half of the whole number of words in the language. Mr. Turner's statement refers to the proportion of Saxon words actually used in our common language, which is, doubtless, as great as he represents it. The words of Saxon origin are the more necessary words; such as are wanted in all the common concerns of life; and therefore in use they compose the body of the language.

Ik was,	Weis wesum,
Thu wast,	Yus wesuth,
Is was;	Eis wesun.*

In the present tense of the substantive verb, our common people use ān't, as in this phrase: "he ān't present." This is evidently a contraction of the Swedish and Danish är, er, present indicative singular of the substantive verb vara or være to be, which we retain in are and were. In Swedish, han är, and in Danish, han er, he is. Hence he er not or ar not, contracted into he ān't or en't.

These facts serve to show how far the Gothic dialect has been infused into the English language.

It would be tedious, and to most readers uninteresting, to recite all the changes in the forms of words or the structure of sentences which have taken place since the Norman conquest. Since the invention of printing, changes in the language have been less rapid than before; but no art nor effort can completely arrest alterations in a living language. The distinguished writers in the age of Queen Elizabeth improved the language, but could not give it stability. Many words then in common use are now obsolete, or have suffered a change of signification. In the period between Queen Elizabeth and the beginning of the eighteenth century, the language was improved in grammar, orthography, and style. The writers in the reign of Queen Anne and of George I. brought the language nearly to perfection; and if any improvement has since been made, it is in the style or diction, by a better selection of words, and the use of terms in science and philosophy with more precision.

In regard to grammatical construction, the language, for half a century past, has, in my apprehension, been suffering deterioration, at least as far as regards its written form. This change may be attributed chiefly to the influence of the learned Bishop Lowth, whose Grammar made its appearance nearly seventy years ago. I refer particularly to his form of the verb, which was adjusted to the practice of writers in the age of Queen Elizabeth, instead of the practice of authors in the age of William and Mary, Queen Anne, and George I. Hence he gives for the form of the verb in the subjunctive mode, after the words which express a condition, if, though, &c., I love, thou love, he love, observing in a note, that in the subjunctive mode, the event being spoken of under a condition or supposition, or in the form of a wish, and therefore doubtful and contingent, the verb itself in the present, and the auxiliary both of the present and past imperfect times, often carry with them somewhat of a future sense; as, "If he come to-morrow, I may speak to him"—"If he should come, I should speak to him." This is true; but for that very reason, this form of the verb belongs to the future tense, or should be arranged as such in Grammars. If he come, would be in Latin si venerit, in the subjunctive future.

But the learned author has entirely overlooked the important distinction between an event or fact, of uncertain existence in the present time, and which is mentioned under the condition of present existence, and a future contingent event. "If the mail that has arrived contains a letter for me, I shall soon receive it," is a phrase that refers to the present time, and expresses an uncertainty in my mind, respecting the fact. "If the mail contain a letter for me," refers to a future time, that is, "If the mail of to-morrow contain [shall or should contain] a letter for me." The first event, conditional or hypothetical, should be expressed by the indicative mode, and the latter by the subjunctive future. The Saxon form of the verb, if he slay, if he go, is evidently a contingent future, and is so used in the laws.

This distinction, one of the most important in the language, has been so totally overlooked, that no provision has been made for it in British Grammars; nor is the distinction expressed by the form of the verb, as used by a great part of the best writers. On the other hand, they continually use one form of the verb to express both senses. The fact is the same in the common version of the Scriptures. If he go, if he speak, sometimes express a present conditional tense, and sometimes a contingent future. In general this subjunctive form of the verb, in Scripture, expresses future time. "If he thus say, I have no delight in thee," expresses a future contingent event. 2 Sam. xv. 26. "If iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away," expresses a fact, under a condition, in the present time. Job xi. 14.

In many instances the translators have deviated from the original, in using the subjunctive form of the English verb to express what in Greek is expressed in the indicative. Thus Matthew iv. 6. Ει υἱος ει του Θεου, If thou be [art] the son of God.

Ch. v. 29 and 30. Ει δε ὁ οφθαλμος σου ὁ δεξιος σκανδαλιζει σε, If thy right eye offend [offendeth] thee; Ει ἡ δεξια σου χειρ σκανδαλιζει σε, If thy right hand offend [offendeth] thee.

So also in chapter xviii. 8 and 9.

Ch. xii. 26. Ει ὁ Σατανας τον Σαταναν εκβαλλει, If Satan cast [casteth] out Satan.

Ch. xix. 10. Ει οὑτως εστιν ἡ αιτια του ανθρωπου μετα της γυναικος, If the case of the man be [is] so with his wife.

Ch. xxii. 45. Ει οὐν Δαβιδ καλει αυτον Κυριον, If David then call [calleth] him Lord.

2 Cor. iv. 16. Ει ὁ εξω ἡμων ανθρωπος διαφθειρεται, Though our outward man perish [perishes, or is perishing.]

In all these passages, the English verb, in the subjunctive, properly expresses a conditional, contingent, or hypothetical future tense, contrary to the sense of the original, except in the last passage cited, where the apostle evidently speaks of the perishing of the outward man as a fact admitted, which renders the translation still more improper.

Let us now attend to the following passages.

Matthew vii. 9. Η τις εστιν εξ ὑμων ανθρωπος, ὁν εαν αιτηση ὁ υἱος αυτου αρτον, Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask [shall ask] bread, will he give him a stone?

Και εαν ιχθυν αιτηση, If he ask [shall ask] a fish, will he give him a serpent?

Here the original tense is varied to express a future or hypothetical event, yet the verb in English is in the same tense as in the first class of examples; and what renders the version more objectionable is, that the verb in the first clause does not correspond with that in the second clause. There is no possible way of making good English of the translation, but by supposing the verb in the first clause, ask, to be in the future tense. So it would be in Latin, and so it is, "si petierit." If thy son shall ask (or should ask) a fish, will he give (or would he give) him a serpent?

This fault runs through the whole English version of the Scriptures, and a distinction of tenses clearly marked in the original languages, is generally neglected in the translation.

Now, the most unlettered man in this country would express the sense in English with the same marked distinction of tenses which appears in the Greek. If thou art the son of God; if thy right eye offends thee; if the case of the man is such; if David calls him Lord; or, if the sense is understood to be future and contingent, if thy son shall ask bread, or if he should ask bread, would be the uniform language of any of the common people of our country. There would not, probably, be a single exception, unless in the use of the substantive verb, which is often used in the subjunctive form. And the most unlettered man would use the corresponding verbs in the two clauses, if he shall ask, will he give; or, if he should ask, would he give. The use of the verb, in all similar phrases, is perfectly well settled in this country, and perfectly uniform among the higher and lower classes of men; unless when the practice has been varied by the influence of Grammars, in which the conjugation of the verb is according to the antiquated practice of the age of Elizabeth.

1 Tim. v. 4. Ει δε τις χηρα τεκνα η εκγονα εχει, If any widow have [has] children or nephews.

Verse 8. Ει δε τις των ἰδιων και μαλιστα των οικειων ου προνοει, If any provide [provideth] not for his own, and especially for those of his own house.

This subjunctive form of the verb, if he be; if he have; if he go; if he say; if thou write; whether thou see; though he fall, which was generally used by the writers of the sixteenth century, was in a great measure discarded before the time of Addison. Whether this change was in consequence of the prevalence of colloquial usage over grammar rules, or because discerning men perceived the impropriety and inconsistency of the language of books, I pretend not to determine. Certain it is, that Locke, Watts, Addison, Pope, and other authors of the first distinction, who adorned the close of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century, generally used the indicative mode to express condition, uncertainty, and hypothesis in the present and past tenses. Thus Locke writes—"If these two propositions are by

* This is probably the Latin esse. The Latins dropped the first articulation v, which answers to our w.

The present tense, indicative mode, of the Latin verb, with the v restored, would be written thus:—

Ego vesum,	Nos vesumus, [was,]
Tu ves,	Vos vestis, [was,]
Ille vest;	Illi vesunt, [was.]

nature imprinted." "If principles are innate." "If any person hath never examined this notion." "Whether that substance thinks or no." "If the soul doth think in sleep." "If one considers well these men's way of speaking." "If he does not reflect." "Unless that notion produces a constant train of successive ideas." "If your lordship means." Such is the language of Locke.

Now, what is remarkable, the learned Dr. Lowth, the very author who has, by his Grammar, done much to sanction the subjunctive form of the verb, in such cases, often uses the indicative in his own writings. "If he does not carefully attend to this — if this pleasure arises from the shape of the composition — if this is not firmly and well established:" These verbs are in contradiction of his own principles. On Isaiah, Prelim. Diss.

Addison. "If the reader has a mind to see a father of the same stamp." "If exercise throws off all superfluities — if it clears the vessels — if it dissipates a growing distemper." Such is the language of Addison, the most elegant writer of the genuine English idiom in the nation.

"If the thief is poor — if it obliges me to be conversant with scenes of wretchedness." Wilberforce.

"If America is not to be conquered." Lord Chatham.

"If we are to be satisfied with assertions." "If it gives blind confidence to any executive government." "If such an opinion has gone forth." "If our conduct has been marked with vigor and wisdom." Fox.

"If my bodily strength is equal to the task." "A negro, if he works for himself and not for a master, will do double the work." "If there is any aggravation of our guilt." "If their conduct displays no true wisdom." "The honorable gentleman may, if he chooses, have the journals read again." "Whether this is a sufficient tie to unite them." "If this measure comes recommended." "If there exists a country which contains the means of protection." Pitt.

"If the prudence of reserve and decorum dictates silence." "If an assembly is viciously or feebly composed." "If any persons are to make good deficiencies." "If the King of the French has really deserved these murderous attempts." "If this representation of M. Necker was false." "Whether the system, if it deserves the name." "The politician looks for a power that our workmen call a purchase, and if he finds the power." "If he feels as men commonly feel." Burke.

"If climate has such an effect on mankind." "If the effects of climate are casual." Coxe's Russ.

"If he finds his collection too small." "If he thinks his judgment not sufficiently enlightened." "Whether it leads to truth." "If he warns others against his own failings." This is generally the language of Johnson.

In regard to this distinguished author, I would observe that, except the substantive verb, there is in his Rambler but a single instance of the subjunctive form of the verb in conditional sentences. In all other cases the use of the indicative is uniform.

Such also is the language of the most distinguished men in the United States, particularly of those who wrote their native language as they received it from tradition, and before grammars had made any impression on its genuine construction.

"The prince that acquires new territory, if he finds it vacant." "If we are industrious we shall never starve." "If one has more corn than he can consume, and another has less.' Such is the language of Franklin.

"If any persons thus qualified are to be found." "If it is thought proper." "If the Congress does not choose to point out the particular regiment." "If I am rightly informed." "If the army has not removed." "If a proposition has not been made." Such is the language of Washington.

"If any philosopher pretends." "If he has food for the present day." "If a revelation is not impossible." "If the Christian system contains a real communication to mankind." "If the former of these facts opposes our reception of the miraculous history of the gospel." "If the preceding reflections are just." Such is the language of the late President Smith.*

"If any government deems the introduction of foreigners or their merchandise injurious." "Unless he violates the law of nations." "If a person has a settlement in a hostile country." "If he resides in a belligerent country." "If a foreign consul carries on trade as a merchant." Such is the language of the ex-Chancellor Kent.

But neither the authors here mentioned, nor most others, even the most distinguished for erudition, are uniform and consistent with themselves in the use of the tenses. In one sentence we find the indicative used, "If it is to be discovered only by the experiment." "If other indications are to be found." In the next sentence, "If to miscarry in an attempt be a proof of having mistaken the direction of genius." Johnson.

"If the former be refined — if those virtues are accompanied with equal abilities." Gibbon.

"If love reward him, or if vengeance strike." Cowper.

"Or if it does not brand him to the last." Cowper.

"If he is a pagan — if endeavors are used — if the person hath a liberal education — if man be subject to these miseries." Milner.

The following expressions occur in Pope's Preface to Homer's Iliad, in the compass of thirteen lines.

"If he has given a regular catalogue of an army."

"If he has funeral games for Patroclus."

"If Ulysses visit the shades."

"If he be detained from his return."

"If Achilles be absent."

"If he gives his hero a suit of celestial armor."

I recollect one English author only, who has been careful to avoid this inconsistency; this is Gregory, who, in his Economy of Nature, has uniformly used the indicative form of the verb in conditional sentences of this kind.

The like inconsistency occurs in almost all American writings. "If moral disposition lie here." "If preference necessarily involves the knowledge of obligation." "If the proposition is true." "If the proposition be confirmed." "If he refutes any thing."

In a pamphlet now before me, there are no less than fifty of these inconsistencies in the compass of ninety pages; and three of them in one sentence.

How, in this case, is a foreigner to understand the author? and how can such sentences be translated into another language without a deviation from the original?

The propriety of using the indicative form of the verb to express a present or past event conditionally, does not rest solely on usage; it is most correct upon principle. It is well known that most of the words which are used to introduce a condition or hypothesis, and called, most improperly, conjunctions, are verbs, having not the least affinity to the class of words used to connect sentences. If is the Saxon gif, give, having lost its first letter; if for the ancient gif. Though is also a verb now obsolete, except in the imperative mode. Now let us analyze this conditional tense of the verb. "If the man knows his true interest, he will avoid a quarrel." Here is an omission of the word that after if. The true original phrase was, "If that the man knows his true interest, he will avoid a quarrel" — that is, give that [admit the fact which is expressed in the following clause,] the man knows his true interest, then the consequence follows, he will avoid a quarrel. That in this sentence is a relative or demonstrative substitute for the following clause. This will more plainly appear by transposing the clauses. "The man knows his true interest; give that [admit that;] he will then avoid a quarrel." Now, let the subjunctive form be used. "The man know his true interest; give that; he will avoid a quarrel."

Here the impropriety of this form of the verb appears in a strong light. It will appear more clearly by the use of other words of equivalent signification. Grant the man know his true interest, he will avoid a quarrel. Allow the man know his true interest. Suppose the man know his true interest. We never use the subjunctive form after the three last verbs which introduce the condition. Though is sometimes followed by the indicative; sometimes by the subjunctive; but it ought always to be followed by the indicative, for it supposes the fact to be given; and so does admit, when used in hypothetical sentences. Admit that the man knows his interest. We have then decisive proof that the use of the indicative form of the verb after if, when it expresses a conditional event in present time, is most correct; indeed, it is the only correct form. This remark is equally applicable to the past tense conditional.

The language of Addison, Johnson, and other distinguished writers of the last century, in the use of the indicative, is, therefore, more correct than the language of the writers in the age of Elizabeth; and their practice is principally the common usage of our country at this day.

* The substantive verb is often used in the subjunctive form by writers who never use that form in any other verb. The reason doubtless is, that be is primarily the indicative as well as the subjunctive mode of that verb. I be, we be, as used in Scripture. So in German, Ich bin.

I have, therefore, constructed a Grammar on this usage; bringing down the standard of writing a century and a half later than Bishop Lowth. I have done this, first, on the authority of strict analogical principles, as above stated; secondly, on the authority of the best usage of that cluster of distinguished writers who adorned the beginning of the last century; and, thirdly, on the authority of universal colloquial practice, which I consider as the real and only genuine language. I repeat this remark, that general and respectable usage in speaking, is the genuine or legitimate language of a country, to which the written language ought to be conformed. Language is that which is uttered by the tongue, and if men do not write the language as it is spoken by the great body of respectable people, they do not write the real language. Now, in colloquial usage, the subjunctive form of the verb, in conditional sentences, is rarely used, and perhaps never, except when the substantive verb is employed. Our students are taught in school the subjunctive form, if thou have, if he come, &c., and some of them continue, in after life, to write in that manner; but, in the course of more than forty years, I have not known three men who have ventured to use that form of the verb in conversation. We toil in school to learn a language which we dare not introduce into conversation, but which the force of custom compels us to abandon. In this respect, the present study of grammar is worse than useless.

This colloquial custom accords with other languages. The French say and write s'il est, if he is. The Latins often used the same form, "si quid est in me ingenii, judices;" but the use of the Latin subjunctive depends on certain other words which precede; as, "cum sit civis," as he is a citizen, or, since he is a citizen; and the present tense is often used to express what we express by an auxiliary. That the Greeks used the indicative to express a conditional present tense, we have seen by citations above.

By this arrangement of the verb, the indicative form after if and other verbs introducing a condition or hypothesis, may be used uniformly to express a fact or event under a condition or supposition, either in the present or past tenses; the speaker being uncertain respecting the fact, or representing it as doubtful.

"If the man is honest, he will return what he has borrowed." "If the ship has arrived, we shall be informed of it to-morrow." "If the bill was presented, it was doubtless paid." "If the law has been passed, we are precluded from further opposition."

On the other hand, when it is intended to speak of a future contingent event, I would always use the auxiliaries that are proper for the purpose. "If it shall or should rain to-morrow, we shall not ride to town." I would never use the subjunctive form, if it rain, in prose; and in poetry, only from necessity, as an abridged phrase, for if it shall or should rain. In this manner the distinction between the tenses, which are now constantly confounded, may be preserved and made obvious, both to natives and foreigners.

The effect of the study of Lowth's principles, which has been greatly extended by the popularity of Murray's Grammar,* has been to introduce or establish a form of the verb in writing, which is obsolete in colloquial language; to fill our books with a confusion of tenses, and thus to keep the language unsettled. Nothing can be more perplexing to the student, than every where to meet with discrepancies between rules and practice.

There is another erroneous manner of writing, common to the best authors in the language, which seems to have escaped notice. This is, to connect a verb in the past tense with a preceding one in the same tense, when the latter verb is intended to express a very different time from the former. Thus, "Then Manasseh knew that the Lord, he was God." 2 Chron. xxxiii. 13.

The Latins, in this case, would probably have used the infinitive; "Manasseh novit Jehovam Deum esse." In English we ought to write and say, "Manasseh knew Jehovah to be God," or, "Manasseh knew that Jehovah he is God." In most similar cases the use of the infinitive in English is as elegant as in Latin. But there are many cases where the infinitive can not be used. We can not use it after say; "he said him to be a good man," is not English; though "he declared, or affirmed, or believed him to be a good man," is elegant.

In order to understand the impropriety of the common mode of using the latter verb, as in the example above cited, it may be remarked, that the present tense is that which is used to express what exists at all times. Thus we say, God is or exists, whenever we speak of his permanent existence; we say, Gold is yellow or ductile; iron is a most valuable metal; it is not convertible into silver; plants and animals are very distinct living beings. We do not say, Gold was yellow; iron was a valuable metal; for we mean to express permanent qualities. Hence, in the passage cited from Chronicles, the first verb knew, referring to a fact past, is correct; but the last, which is intended to express the permanent being or character of God, should be in the infinitive or the indicative present tense. The following are examples of correct language: "His master had taught him that happiness consists in virtue." Anacharsis, ii. 120.

"Sabellius, who openly taught that there is but one person in the Godhead." Encyclopedia.

"Our Savior taught that eternal death is the proper punishment of sin." Emmons.

But very different is the following: "Having believed for many years, that water was [is] an elastic fluid." The following would be still better: "Having believed water to be an elastic fluid."

So the following: "We know not the use of the epidermis of shells. Some authors have supposed that it secured [secures] the shells from being covered with vermes." Edin. Encyc.

"It was just remarked, that marine fossils did not [do not] comprise vegetable remains." Ib.

"If my readers will turn their thoughts back on their old friends, they will find it difficult to call a single man to remembrance who appeared to know that life was short, [is short,] till he was about to lose it." Rambler, No. 71.

"They considered the body as a hydraulic machine, and the fluids as passing through a series of chemical changes; forgetting that animation was [is] its essential characteristic." Darwin.

"It was declared by Pompey, that if the Commonwealth was [should be] violated, he could stamp with his foot and raise an army out of the ground." Rambler, No. 10.

In the foregoing sentence, the past tense is used for the future contingent.

"It was affirmed in the last discourse, that much of the honorable practice of the world rested [rests] on the substratum of selfishness; that society was [is] held together, in the exercise of its relative virtues, mainly by the tie of reciprocal advantage; that a man's own interest bound [binds] him to all those average equities which obtained [obtain] in the neighborhood around him; and in which if he proved [should prove] himself glaringly deficient, he would be abandoned by the respect, and the confidence, and the good-will of the people with whom he had [might have, or should have] to do." Chalmers's Com. Dis. 4.

"In the last discourse, I observed that love constituted [constitutes] the whole moral character of God." Dwight's Theology.

"And he said, Nay, father Abraham; but if one went [shall or should go] to them from the dead, they will repent. And he said to him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose [shall or should rise] from the dead." Luke xvi. 30, 31.

"Independent of parties in the national legislature itself, as often as the period of discussion arrived, the state legislatures, who will always be not only vigilant, but suspicious and jealous guardians of the rights of the citizens, against encroachments from the federal government, will constantly have their attention awake to the conduct of the national rulers, and will be ready enough, if any thing improper appears, to sound the alarm to the people."

Let any man attempt to resolve the foregoing sentence, if he can, or render it into another language.

"Cicero vindicated the truth, and inculcated the value of the precept, that nothing was [is] truly useful which was [is] not honest."

"He undertook to show that justice was [is] of perpetual obligation."

"The author concedes much of his argument, and admits that the sea was [is] susceptible of dominion." [Better still, he admits the sea to be susceptible of dominion.]

* Lindley Murray, in the Introduction to his Grammar, acknowledges, in general terms, that "the authors to whom the grammatical part of this compilation is principally indebted for its materials are, Harris, Johnson, Lowth, Priestley, Beattie, Sheridan, Walker, and Coote." But on examination it appears that the greatest portion of the grammatical part is from Lowth, whose principles form the main structure of Murray's compilation. Some valuable notes and remarks are taken from Priestley's Grammar. I studied grammar in the originals long before Murray's compilation appeared, and, in citing authorities, deem it proper to cite the originals.

"A nation would be condemned by the impartial voice of mankind, if it voluntarily went [should go] to war, on a claim of which it doubted [should doubt] the legality."

"The Supreme Court observed that they were not at liberty to depart from the rule, whatever doubt might have been entertained, if the case was [had been] entirely new."

"He held that the law of nations prohibited [prohibits] the use of poisoned arms."

"He insisted that the laws of war gave [give] no other power over a captive than to keep him safely."

"The general principle on the subject is, that, if a commander makes a compact with the enemy, and it be of such a nature that the power to make it could be reasonably implied from the nature of the trust, it would be valid and binding, though he abused his trust." Let any man translate this sentence into another language, if he can, without reducing the verbs to some consistency.

"Congress have declared by law, that the United States were [are] entitled to priority of payment over private creditors, in cases of insolvency."

"The Supreme Court decided, that the acts of Congress, giving that general priority to the United States, were [are] constitutional."

"It was admitted that the government of the United States was [is] one of enumerated powers."

"From his past designs and administrations, we could never argue at all to those which were future." [This is an odd combination of words.]

"Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he was come from God and went to God." John xiii. 3.

"Alexander dispatched Eumenes with three hundred horse to two free cities — with assurance that if they submitted and received him [should or would submit and receive] as a friend, no evil should befall them."

"The apostle knew that the present season was [is] the only time allowed for this preparation."

"What would be the real effect of that overpowering evidence which our adversaries required [should require] in a revelation, it is difficult to foretell."

"It could not otherwise have been known that the word had [has] this meaning."

"I told him if he went [should go] to-morrow, I would go with him."

This fault occurs in our hearing every hour in the day.

A like fault prevails in other languages; indeed, the English may have been led into it by reading foreign authors. "Mais on a remarqué avec raison, que l'espace conchoidal était infini." Lunier. It has been remarked with reason, that the conchoidal space was [is] infinite.

But whatever may be the practice of other nations, there would be no difficulty in correcting such improprieties in our own language, if as much attention were given to the study of its true principles, as is given to other subjects of literature and science. But if, in this particular, there is a British or American author who writes his vernacular language correctly, his writings have not fallen under my inspection.

There is another fault very common among English writers, though it is less frequent in the United States; this is the conversion of an intransitive verb into a passive one. It is surprising that an error of this kind should have gained such an established use, in some foreign languages, as to be incurable. Barbarous nations may indeed form languages; but it should be the business of civilized men to purify their language from barbarisms.

In the transitive verb, there is an agent that performs some action on an object, or in some way affects it. When this verb becomes passive, the agent and the object change places in the sentence. Thus, John loves Peter, is transitive, but Peter is loved by John, is passive. In the intransitive verb the case is different; for the action is limited to the agent; and when it is stated that a thing is done, there is no agent by which it is done. I perish, is intransitive; I am perished, is the passive form; but the latter neither expresses nor implies an agent by which I perish.

This fault occurs frequently in the common version of the Scriptures.

"Yea, whereto might the strength of their hands profit me, in whom old age was [had] perished." Job xxx. 2.

"Their memorial is [has] perished with them." Ps. ix. 6.

"The heathen are [have] perished out of this land." Ps. x. 16.

"Israel is [has] fled before the Philistines." 1 Sam. iv. 17.

"David is [has] fled." 2 Sam. xix. 9.

"The days were [had] not expired." 1 Sam. xviii. 26.

"And when the year was [had] expired." 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10.

"I only am [have] escaped alone to tell thee." Job i. 15.

"And it came to pass, when he was [had] returned." Luke xix. 15.

Return is sometimes a transitive verb, and sometimes intransitive. When a sum of borrowed money is returned, the phrase is correct, for this is the passive form of a transitive verb. But when a man is returned, we may ask, who has returned him? In this case, the man returns by his own act, and he can not be said to be returned.

"He found the empress was [had] departed." Coxe.

"They were [had] arrived within three days' journey of the spice country." Gibbon, ch. i. note.

"Neither Charles nor Diocletian were [had] arrived at a very advanced period of life." Ib. ch. xiii.

"The posterity of so many gods and heroes was [had] fallen into the most abject state." Ib. ch. ii.

"Silver was [had] grown more common." Ib.

"He was [had] risen from the dead, and was [had] just ascended to heaven." Milner, i. 20.

"Hearing that they were [had] arrived." Ib. 211.

"Claudius — vexed because his wife was [had] become a Christian." Ib. 274.

"Does not the reader see how much we are [have] already departed from Christian simplicity?" Ib. 299.

"My age is [has] departed." Isaiah xxxviii. 12.

"The man out of whom the demons were [had] departed." Luke viii. 35.

"Workmen were [had] arrived to assist them." Mitford.

"A body of Athenian horse was [had] just arrived." Ib.

This fault is common in Mitford's History of Greece. In the writings of Roscoe, which are more elegant, it occurs, but less frequently.

"The time limited for the reception of the cardinal was expired." Roscoe, Leo X.

"He inquired whether the report was true, that a legate was arrived." Ib. L. Med.

"The nation being [having] once more got into a course of borrowing." Price on Liberty.

"When he was [had] retired to his tent." Coxe's Russ.

"He was [had] not yet arrived."* Ib.

The intransitive verb grow is constantly used by the English as a transitive verb; as, to grow wheat. This is never used in the Northern States, unless by persons who have adopted it recently from the English.

It seems almost incredible that such errors should continue, to this time, to disfigure the language of the most distinguished writers, and that they should escape animadversion. The practice has evidently been borrowed from the French or Italian; but surely no lover of correctness can excuse such violation of the best established principles in our language.

This fault occurs, in a few instances, in the writings of the best American authors, as in the writings of Ames and Hamilton. It is, however, very rare, either in books or colloquial usage. Even our common people are remarkably accurate in using the auxiliary have with the participles of intransitive verbs. They always, I believe, say, a ship has arrived, a plant has perished, the enemy had fled, the price had fallen, the corn has or had grown, the time has expired, the man has returned, the vessel had departed. Such also is the language of our most eminent writers.

"The Generals Gates and Sullivan have both arrived." Washington's Letters.

"The Indians of the village had fled." B. Trumbull.

"Our Tom has grown a sturdy boy." Progress of Dullness.

"Our patriots have fallen." Discourse of D. Webster, Aug. 1826.

"Our commissary had not arrived." Ellicott.

The exceptions to this correct practice are chiefly in the use of the participles of come and go. It is very common to hear the expressions, he is come or is gone, in which case the participle seems to take the character of an adjective; although, in most instances, the regular form of expression, he has come, or has gone, is to be preferred. So dead, originally a participle, is used only as an adjective; and deceased and departed are often used in the like manner. We say, a deceased or departed friend; but it should be remarked that the original expression was, our friend has deceased, or has departed this life; and this phraseology, by an easy but heedless transition, became is deceased, or is departed. In general, however, the conversion of an intransitive verb or form of expression into the passive form, is very rare among the people of New England.

* On this use of intransitive verbs, as, The ship was departed, it may be asked, Who departed it? — The mail is arrived. Who has arrived it? — The tree is perished. Who has perished it? — The enemy was fled. Who fled them? — The time was expired. Who expired it?

There is a grammatical error running through the writings of so respectable a writer as Mitford, which ought not to be passed unnoticed; as it seems to be borrowed from the French language, whose idioms are different from the English, but which the English are too apt to follow. This fault is, in using the preterit or perfect tense, instead of the past tense indefinite, usually called, most improperly, the imperfect. Take the following sentences for examples: "The conduct of Pelopidas toward Arcadia and its minister at the Persian court — has scarcely been the result of mere caprice or resentment." The verb here ought to be was.

"The oration [of Isocrates] has been [was] a favorite of Dionysius of Halicarnassus."

This form of expressing the time would be good in French, but is very bad in English. And it may be here remarked, that the tense he was, he arrived, he wrote, is not properly named imperfect. These verbs, and all verbs of this form, denote actions finished or perfect; as, "In six days God created the heaven and the earth." Imperfect or unfinished action is expressed in English in this manner — he was reading, they were writing. The error of calling the former tense imperfect, has probably proceeded from a servile adoption of the Latin names of the tenses, without considering the difference of application.

There are some errors in all the English Grammars, that have been derived to us from antiquity. Such is the arrangement of that among the conjunctions, like the Greek ὁτι, and the Latin ut. Και μακαρια ἡ πιστευσασα, ὁτι εσται τελειωσις τοις λελαλημενοις αυτῃ παρα Κυριου. And blessed is she who believed that there shall be a performance of the things which were told her from the Lord. Luke i. 45. In our version, ὁτι is rendered for, but most erroneously. The true meaning and character of ὁτι will best appear by a transposition of the clauses of the verse: "There shall be a performance of the things told her from the Lord; blessed or happy is she who believed that." Here ὁτι, that, appears to be what it really is, a relative or substitute for the whole clause in Greek succeeding it. So in Luke xxii. 18. Λεγω γαρ υμιν ὁτι ου μη πιω, &c. I say to you that I will not drink. I will not drink, I say to you that. It is the same in Latin: "Dico enim vobis quod non bibam." Quod is here a relative governed by dico, and referring to the following clause of the sentence.

So also Matthew ix. 28. Πιστευετε ὁτι δυναμαι τουτο ποιησαι; Do ye believe that I am able to do this? I am able to do this: do ye believe that?

This error runs through all Grammars, Greek, Latin, French, English, &c. But how such an obvious fact, that the word that, and its corresponding words in other languages, refer to the clause of a sentence, should escape observation, age after age, it is not easy to explain. How could it be supposed that a word is a conjunction which does not join words or sentences? That is used, in the passages cited, not to unite two sentences, but to continue the same sentence by an additional clause.

The relative, when referring to a sentence or the clause of a sentence, is not varied, for a variation of case is not wanted.

So notwithstanding and provided in English, and pourvu que in French, are called conjunctions, but most improperly, as they are participles; and when called conjunctions, they always form, with a word, clause, or sentence, the case absolute or independent. Thus, "It rains, but notwithstanding that, [it rains,] I must go to town." That fact (it rains) not opposing or preventing me, that is, in opposition to that, I must go to town; hoc non obstante.

"I will ride, provided you will accompany me." That is, I will ride, the fact, you will accompany me, being provided.

Such is the structure of these sentences. See my Philosophical and Practical Grammar.* It is the same in French, pourvu que, that being provided, que referring to the following clause.

There are other points in grammar equally faulty. Not only in English grammar, but in the grammars of other languages, men stumble at the threshold, and teach their children to stumble. In no language whatever can there be a part of speech properly called an article. There is no word or class of words that falls within the signification of article, a joint, or that can otherwise than arbitrarily be brought under that denomination. The definitive words called articles, are all adjectives or pronouns. When they are used with nouns, they are adjectives, modifying the signification of the nouns, like other adjectives; for this is their proper office. When they stand alone, they are pronouns, or substitutes for nouns. Thus hic, ille, ipse, in Latin, when used with nouns expressed, are adjectives; hic homo, this man; ille homo, that man. When they stand alone, hic, ille, they stand in the place of nouns. The fact is the same in other languages.

The English the is an adjective, which, for distinction, I call a definitive adjective, and for brevity, a definitive, as it defines the person or thing to which it refers, or rather designates a particular person or thing. But why this should be selected as the only definitive in our language, is very strange; when obviously this and that are more exactly definitive, designating more precisely a particular person or thing than the. These words answer to the Latin hic and ille, which were always used by the Romans, when they had occasion to specify definite persons or things.

As to the English an or a, which is called in grammars the indefinite article, there are two great mistakes. A being considered as the original word, it is said to become an before a vowel. The fact is directly the reverse. An is the original word, and this is contracted to a by dropping the n before a consonant.

But an is merely the Saxon orthography of one, un, unus, an adjective found in nearly all the languages of Europe, and expressing a single person or thing. It is merely a word of number, and no more an article than two, three, four, and every other number in the language. Take the following examples.

Bring me an orange from the basket; that is, any one of the number.

Bring me two oranges from the basket; that is, any two of the number.

Bring me three oranges from the basket; that is, any three of the number; and so on to any number, ad infinitum.

When thus used, an, two, three, are all indefinite; that is, they are used with nouns which are indefinite, or expressing things not particularly designated. But this is not owing to the essential character of the adjectives, an, one, two, three; for any of them may be used with definite nouns; and an is continually thus used.

"I will be an adversary to thine adversaries."

"The angel stood for an adversary against Balaam.

"Make this fellow return, lest in the battle he be an adversary to us"

"Rezon — was an adversary to Israel all the days of Solomon."

"And he spake a parable to them to this end."

"And there was a widow in that city."

"And seeing the multitude, he went up into a mountain."

"I will be a God to thee and thy seed after thee."

"Thou art a God ready to pardon."

Now, let any of these phrases be tested by the common definition of an or a, "that it is used in a vague sense, to point out one single thing of the kind; in other respects indeterminate."

Lowth.

"I will be an adversary to thine adversaries;" that is, "I will be any adversary, one of the kind, but vague or indeterminate."

"Rezon was an adversary to Israel;" that is, in a vague sense, any adversary, indeterminate.

"And he spake a parable to them;" that is, any parable, indeterminate.

"Thou art a God ready to pardon;" that is, any God, one of the kind, in a vague sense, indeterminate!

If it should be said, the noun is rendered determinate, by other words in the sentence, and not by an or a, this may be and generally is true; but this shows that an does not give to the noun its character of definiteness or indefiniteness; it always retains its proper signification, which is one, and nothing more; and it is used indifferently before nouns definite or indefinite.

This mistake of the character of an is found in other languages; but I was gratified to find a French Grammar in Paris, recommended by the Institute, the author of which had discarded the indefinite article.

In English, an or a is, for the most part, entirely useless. Used with a noun in the singular number, it serves no purpose, except that which the form of the word in the singular number is intended to answer. It expresses unity only, and this is the province of the singular number. Were it not for habit, "Give me orange," would express the sense of "give me an orange," with precision and certainty. In this respect the Latin language has the advantage over the English. But the use of such a short word is not very inconvenient, and the usage can not be changed. Other languages are subject to the same inconvenience; even the definite articles, or definitives, in Greek and in French, are very often useless, and, were it not for usage, would be improper.

* Now entitled An Improved Grammar.

ORTHOGRAPHY.

From the period of the first Saxon writings, our language has been suffering changes in orthography. The first writers, having no guide but the ear, followed each his own judgment or fancy; and hence a great portion of Saxon words are written with different letters, by different authors; most of them are written two or three different ways, and some of them fifteen or twenty. To this day the orthography of some classes of words is not entirely settled; and in others it is settled in a manner to confound the learner, and mislead him into a false pronunciation. Nothing can be more disreputable to the literary character of a nation, than the history of English orthography, unless it is that of orthoepy.

1. The Saxon diphthong æ, which probably had a specific and uniform sound or combination of sounds, has been discarded, and ea generally substituted in its place; as, bræth, breath. Now, ea thus united have not a uniform sound, and of course they are no certain guide to pronunciation. In some instances, where the Saxon spelling was not uniform, the modern orthography follows the most anomalous and difficult, instead of that which is regular. Thus the Saxons wrote fæther and fether, more generally the latter, and the moderns write feather.

2. The letter g, in Saxon words, has, in many English words, been sunk in pronunciation, and either wholly lost, or it is now represented by y or w. Thus dæg, or dag, has become day; gear is year, bugan is bow, and fæger is fair.

3. The Saxons, who adopted the Roman alphabet, with a few alterations, used c with its close sound like that of k. Thus lic, like; locian, to look. But after the Norman conquest, c before e, i, and y, took the sound of s; hence arose the necessity of changing this letter in words and syllables, where it was necessary to retain the sound of k before these vowels. Thus the Saxon licean, pronounced originally likean, becomes, with our present sound of c before e, lisean; and locian becomes losian. To remedy this evil, our ancestors introduced k from the Greek, writing it generally after c, as in lick, stick, though in some instances omitting c, as in like and look. Hence, in all monosyllables in which a syllable beginning with e or i is added to the word, as in the past time and participles of verbs, we use k in the place of the Saxon c, as in licked, licking.

Our early writers attempted to extend this addition to words introduced from the Latin and Greek, in which no such reason exists for the use of k. Thus they wrote publick, musick, rhetorick. In these and similar words the Latins used c for the Greek κ; as, musicus, for μουσικος; and the early English writers took both letters, the Roman c and Greek κ. This was absurd enough; but they never proceeded so far as to carry the absurdity through the derivatives; never writing publickation, musickal, rhetorickal, catholickism, skeptickism, stoickism. After a long struggle with the force of authority, good sense has nearly banished this pedantic orthography from use; and all words of this kind now appear, in most of our public acts and elegant writings, in their proper simplicity; public, publication, music, musical.

4. In many words, formerly ending in ie, these letters have been discarded from the singular number, and y substituted. Thus remedie, memorie, are now written remedy, memory. But, what is very singular, the plural of these words retains the ie, with the addition of s, as in remedies. This anomaly, however, creates no great inconvenience, except that it has been extended by negligent writers to words ending in ey, as in attornies. But words ending in ey properly make the plural by simply taking s, as in surveys, attorneys. The same rule applies to verbs when an s is added, as in conveys.

5. In a vast number of words the vowel e has been discarded as useless; as in eggs, for egges; certain, for certaine; empress, for empresse; goodness, for goodnesse. This is an improvement, as the e has no sound in modern pronunciation. But here again we meet with a surprising inconsistency; for the same reason which justifies this omission, would justify and require the omission of e final in motive, pensive, juvenile, genuine, sanguine, doctrine, examine, determine, and a multitude of others. The introduction of e, in most words of these classes, was at first wrong, as it could not plead any authority in the originals; but the retaining of it is unjustifiable, as the letter is not merely useless, but, in very numerous classes of words it leads to a false pronunciation. Many of the most respectable English authors, a century ago or more, omitted e in such words as examin, determin, famin, ductil, fertil, definit, &c.; but these improvements were afterwards rejected, to the great injury of orthography. In like manner, a final e is inserted in words of modern coinage, as in alumine, salicine, chloride, oxyde, &c., without the least necessity or propriety.

6. A similar fate has attended the attempt to anglicize the orthography of another class of words, which we have received from the French. At a very early period, the words chambre, desastre, desordre, chartre, monstre, tendre, tigre, entre, fievre, diametre, arbitre, nombre, and others, were reduced to the English form of spelling; chamber, disaster, disorder, charter, monster, tender, tiger, enter, fever, diameter, arbiter, number. At a later period, Sir Isaac Newton, Camden, Selden, Milton, Whitaker, Prideaux, Hook, Whiston, Bryant, and other authors of the first character, attempted to carry through this reformation, writing scepter, center, sepulcher. But this improvement was arrested, and a few words of this class retain their French orthography; such are metre, mitre, nitre, spectre, sceptre, theatre, sepulchre, and sometimes centre. It is remarkable that a nation distinguished for erudition should thus reject improvements, and retain anomalies, in opposition to all the convenience of uniformity. I am glad that so respectable a writer as Mitford has discarded this innovation, and uniformly written center, scepter, theater, sepulcher. In the present instance, want of uniformity is not the only evil. The present orthography has introduced an awkward mode of writing the derivatives, for example, centred, sceptred, sepulchred; whereas Milton and Pope wrote these words as regular derivations of center, scepter, sepulcher; thus, "sceptered king." So Coxe, in his Travels, "The principal wealth of the church is centered in the monasteries." This is correct.

7. Soon after the revival of letters in Europe, English writers began to borrow words from the French and Italian; and usually with some little alteration of the orthography. Thus they wrote authour, embassadour, predecessour, ancestour, successour; using our for the Latin termination or, and the French eur, and writing similar words in like manner, though not of Latin or French original. What motive could induce them to write these words, and errour, honour, favour, inferiour, &c., in this manner, following neither the Latin nor the French, I can not conceive. But this orthography continued down to the seventeenth century, when the u began to be rejected from certain words of this class, and at the beginning of the last century, many of these words were written, ancestor, author, error, &c., as they are now written. But favor, honor, labor, candor, ardor, terror, vigor, inferior, superior, and a few others, were written with u, and Johnson introduced this orthography into his Dictionary. Nothing in language is more mischievous than the mistakes of a great man. It is not easy to understand why a man, whose professed object was to reduce the language to some regularity, should write author without u, and errour and honour with it! That he should write labour with u, and laborious without it! Vigour with u, and vigorous, invigorate, without it! Inferiour, superiour, with u, but inferiority and superiority without it! Strange as it is, this inconsistency runs through his work, and his authority has been the means of continuing it, among his admirers, to this day.

In this country, most of our best writers have rejected the u from all words of this class, and reduced the whole to uniformity. This is a desirable event; every rejection of an anomaly being a valuable improvement, which sound judgment approves, and the love of regularity will vindicate and maintain.

8. There is another class of words, the orthography of which is not uniform nor fully settled — such as take the termination able to form an adjective. Thus Johnson writes proveable with e, but approvable and reprovable without it. So moveable, but immovable and removable; tameable, but blamable, censurable, desirable, excusable; saleable, but ratable.

With like inconsistency Walker and Chalmers write daub with u, and bedaub with w, deviating in this instance from Johnson. Chalmers writes abridgement and judgement with e, but acknowledgment without it. Walker writes these words without e, but adds it to lodgement. I have reduced all words of this kind, as far as possible, to uniformity.

9. Johnson writes octoedrical; Chalmers, octoedral; Sheridan. Walker, and Jones, follow Johnson; but Jones has octahedron, which is not in the other Dictionaries. The Greek, in words of this kind, is inconsistent, for οκτω is changed, in compound words, to οκτα. I have followed the Greek compounds, and have inserted h, which I consider as almost indispensable in the English orthography; as, octahedron.

10. Johnson introduced instructer, in the place of instructor, in opposition to every authority which he has himself adduced to exemplify his definitions — Denham, Milton, Roscommon, Locke, Addison, Rogers, and the common version of the Scriptures. But what is more singular, this orthography, instructer, is contrary to his own practice; at least, in four editions of his Rambler which I have examined, the word is uniformly written instructor. The fact is the same with visitor.

This is a point of little importance in itself; but when instructor had been from time immemorial the established orthography, why unsettle the practice? I have in this word and in visitor adhered to the old orthography. There is not a particle of reason for altering instructor and visitor, which would not apply to collector, cultivator, objector, projector, and a hundred other words of similar termination.

11. Most of these and some other inconsistencies have been of long continuance. But there are others of more recent date, which admit of no apology, as they are changes from right to wrong. Such is the change of the correct orthography of defense, expense, offense, pretense, and recompense, by substituting c for s, as in defence. This change was probably made or encouraged by printers, for the sake of avoiding the use of the old long s; but since this has been discarded, that reason no longer exists. The orthography defense, &c., is justified, not only by the Latin originals, but by the rule of uniformity; for the derivatives are always written with s — defensive, extensive, offensive, pretension, recompensing.

12. No less improper was the change of sceptic into skeptic. In favor of this innovation, it is alleged that the word is from the Greek σκεπτικος. True; but is not scene derived from the Greek σκηνη, and scepter from σκηπτρον, and ascetic from ασκητικος, and ocean from ωκεανος? Are not all these words in exact analogy with each other, in their original orthography? Were they not formerly analogous in the English orthography? Why violate this analogy? Why introduce an anomaly? Such innovations, by dividing opinions and introducing discrepancies in practice, in classes of words of like formation, have a mischievous effect, by keeping the language in perpetual fluctuation. But as usage inclines to the use of k in this class of words, I have adopted it.

13. In like manner, dispatch, which had from time immemorial been written with i, was changed into despatch, on the wonderful discovery that the word is derived from the French depêcher. But why change one vowel and not the other? If we must follow the French, why not write despech, or depech? And why was this innovation limited to a single word? Why not carry the change through this whole class of words, and give us the benefit of uniformity? Is not disaster from the French desastre? Is not discharge from decharger? Is not disarm from desarmer? Is not disobey from desobeir? Is not disoblige from desobliger? Is not disorder from desordre? The prefix dis is more properly English than de, though both are used with propriety. But dispatch was the established orthography; why, then, disturb the practice? Why select a single word from the whole class, and introduce a change which creates uncertainty where none had existed for ages, without the smallest benefit to indemnify us for the perplexity and discordance occasioned by the innovation? Now, let it be observed that Johnson himself wrote dispatch; for this orthography occurs twice under Send in his Dictionary, and five times under Speed.

It is gratifying to observe the stern good sense of the English nation, presenting a firm resistance to such innovations. Blackstone, Paley, Coxe, Milner, Scott, and Mitford, uniformly use the old and genuine orthography of instructor, visitor, and dispatch.

14. The omission of one l in befall, install, installment, recall, inthrall, &c., is by no means to be vindicated; as by custom the two letters ll serve as a guide to the true pronunciation, that of broad a or aw. According to the established rules of English pronunciation, the letter a in instalment would have the sound it has in balance; it is, therefore, expedient to retain both letters in all words of this class.

15. It is an established rule, in the English language, that monosyllabic verbs ending in a single consonant, not preceded by a long vowel, and other verbs ending in a single accented consonant, and of course not preceded by a long vowel, double the final consonant, in all the derivatives, which are formed by a termination beginning with a vowel. Thus, fit, blot, bar, when they take the terminations ed, eth, ing, are written fitted, fitteth, fitting; blotted, blotteth, blotting; barred, barreth, barring. Abet, compel, form the like derivatives; abetted, abetteth, abetting; compelled, compelleth, compelling. The reason of this rule is, that without this duplication of the last consonant, the vowel of the primitive word would, in the derivative, be naturally pronounced wrong, that is, with its long sound; fited, bloting, bared, compeled. Hence we see the reason why verbs, having the long sound of a vowel, do not double the last consonant; as, feared, repealed, repeated.

The converse of this rule is, that verbs ending in a single consonant, but having the accent on the first syllable, or on a syllable preceding the last, ought not to double the final consonant in the derivatives. Thus, limit, labor, charter, clatter, pardon, deliver, hinder, have for their derivatives limited, laboreth, chartered, clattered, pardoning, delivering, hinderest. But, strange as it may seem, the rule is wholly neglected and violated in numerous words of this class. Thus we observe, in all authors, biassing, bevelling, levelled, travelled, cancelled, revelling, rivalling, worshipped, worshipper, apparelled, embowelled, libelling, and many others, in which the last consonant is doubled, in opposition to one of the oldest and best established rules in the language. Perry, in his Dictionary, lays down the rule for guidance, but has not been careful, in all cases, to observe it. I have endeavored to reduce these classes of words to a regular and uniform orthography. In like manner, nouns formed from such verbs are written with a single consonant, as jeweler, traveler, worshiper, for the purpose of establishing a general rule, to which there may be no exception. What should we say to a man who should write audittor, alterrer, barterrer, banterrer, gardenner, laborrer? Yet no good reason can be assigned why the final consonant should not be doubled in these words as well as in jeweller, traveller, enameller. The truth is, the syllable to be added to the original word is the usual termination er or or, and nothing more.

Not less remarkable is the practice of doubling the last consonant in equalled, equalling, but not in the verb equalize. And to add to the inconsistency, the last consonant is sometimes doubled in tranquillize, a word in exact analogy with equalize. [The l, however, is properly doubled in crystallize and metallize, as if derived from χρυσταλλιζω and μεταλλιζω, in which the l is doubled; and for the sake of uniformity the double l is retained in the other derivatives of χρυσταλλος and μεταλλον. A few other words have the l doubled on the ground of their derivation; as, tranquillity, from tranquillitas; chancellor, from cancellarius, &c.]

A singular instance of inattention to analogy or uniformity, occurs in the formation of certain words from the Greek. Thus, in anatomy, bronchotomy, cacophony, euphony, lithotomy, and others, the final vowel of the Greek original is represented in English by y, which makes a syllable. But in epitome, catastrophe, hyperbole, and many others, the final vowel of the Greek is represented by e, which, in words of English origin, rarely or never makes a syllable at the end of a word. The consequence is, that the last two syllables are liable to be pronounced in one, tome, trophe, bole. Such a departure from analogy is very inconvenient. Besides, if the letter y closed the words in the singular number, the plural would be regularly formed by changing y into ies.

A like fault is observable in the spelling of certain derivatives ending in er. In barometer, hygrometer, thermometer, and all similar derivatives, the Greek μετρον gives meter, in English, while in English books the word is written metre, like the French word. The French are consistent, for they write the word in the same manner, both when single and in composition. Such discrepancies in the English language are little honorable to English philologists.

In the use of the prefixes en, em, in, im, there is not uniformity nor settled usage. The French changed the Latin in into en or em, and English authors have adopted one or the other, without regard to any settled rule. Johnson's Dictionary has done something toward reducing the number of discrepancies of this kind; but some changes have, since his time, been introduced. I have, in most words, followed his orthography; but, in a few instances, have adopted the more modern usage; as, indorse and insure, with their derivatives, according to prevailing mercantile practice.

In the use of the prefix un, many changes have taken place within the last century or two, and the use of in has been substituted for un; as, inaccessible, for unaccessible. The in quirer will observe that I have, under each word, noticed this change.

In the use of the termination ize, the English books are all at variance with each other; and no lexicographer is consistent with himself. Hence we every day see authorise and authorize, apostatise and apostatize, temporise and temporize. As this termination from the Greek or Latin has a definite signification, to make, I have adopted the rule to write it uniformly ize, when it is from either of those languages; as in legalize, to make legal. The French write the termination ise, and this has led to the English discrepancies.

In other cases, when the French ise does not proceed from the Latin ize, I have retained the original orthography of words from the French; as in enterprise, advise, surprise. This is a distinction of some importance.

In many cases, when a false orthography has been long established, I have noticed the fact, without making any alteration in the common spelling.

In a few words I have followed Milton, Dryden, Pope, and other authors of the Augustan age, who were more correct than more modern writers; as they followed the etymology, from which later writers have deviated, sometimes by mistake in taking the word from the French, instead of the Saxon.

In a few instances, I have discarded English innovations, which are evidently mere blunders. Such are comptroller and others, which convert the words into absolute nonsense. The words disannul, unloose, and others, fall under the like condemnation. No lexicographer, knowing the proper origin of these words, can be justified in giving support to such outrageous deviations from etymology. They are a reproach to the literature of the nation.

The negligence of the English in giving currency to such errors, hardly admits of an apology. Philology has indeed been neglected during a century and a half; it is not cultivated, to any extent, in the universities and schools; or it is studied in very superficial writers. Indeed, in etymology there is no accurate scholarship, either in English or French writers. No author, whose works have come under my observation, has explored the wide field of my researches; none has traced words to their primary source, and discovered the radical signification, with the manner in which derivative senses have been drawn from the radical signification, and moral ideas have been expressed by words denoting physical action or properties. The discoveries on this subject constitute an era in philology, and it is hoped that the advantage gained will be pursued.

If men of adult years do not choose to examine the subject of orthography, and correct their own practice, their children, learning the language as corrected, will become familiar with the true orthography, and familiarity and habit will lend support to truth and uniformity.

There are many words in the language containing superfluous letters, especially in the terminating syllable. Thus, one s in the syllables less and ness, at the end of words, is useless; one l in gill, rill, sill, dull, one f in cliff, bluff, are superfluous; but in such words no alteration is made.

The rule for adding two consonants of a sort should be, to add two letters to the original word, when they are both wanted in the derivatives. Thus fil would give the sound of fill; but this being a verb, the two letters are required in the past tense and participles, filled, filling. So in the adjective stiff, the second letter is wanted in stiffen, otherwise a person would be apt to pronounce the word sti-fen.

But in some words the terminating consonant is doubled, not only without necessity or use, but in opposition to propriety. Plaintiff is the French plaintif; pontiff is the French pontife; and no possible reason can be assigned for adding an f to the original word, any more than for adding the same letter to brief and relief. And what is worse, the letter is doubled in pontiff, the original, and then omitted in all the derivatives, pontificate, pontifical, &c. [In such words, however, the alteration has not been insisted on, as the public do not seem prepared to unite in rejecting the second f.]

In like manner, the vowel e is added to a multitude of words, in which it is not pronounced, and is worse than useless, as it often misleads the learner in the pronunciation. If the final e were omitted in juvenil, volatil, the pronunciation could not be mistaken; but as the preceding vowel is sometimes long and sometimes short in the terminating syllables ile, ine, ite, the final e serves only to perplex the learner. In such words, however, no alteration is made.

In the terminating syllable ive, the final e is worse than useless, as the i is always short, iv, and the addition of e contravenes the general rule, that the vowel followed by a consonant, and e final, is generally long, as in mate, mote, mute, dissipate. When I was young, the popular pronunciation of ive was īve, with the i long. The general use of my Spelling Book has nearly banished that pronunciation, and the orthography is not altered.

Our modern writers seem to delight in this useless addition of e final; as they annex it to words without reason or authority. This fault occurs frequently in words borrowed from foreign languages, in which the letter is not found in the original language. One would suppose that good taste alone ought to correct this error.

With regard to words which recent discoveries have introduced into the sciences, there may be some apology for differences of orthography, as writers have not established usage for a guide. Hence we find oxyd is written also oxide and oxyde; oxygen and hydrogen are written also oxigene, oxygene, and hydrogene. Sulphate, nitrate, &c., are written also sulphat, nitrat.

In this case, what course is the lexicographer to pursue? Shall he adopt the method by which Walker attempts to settle pronunciation, and cite authorities in favor of each mode of spelling? Then the result is, so many names appear on one side, and so many on the other. But who, it may be asked, will undertake to graduate the scale by which the weight of authorities is to be determined? Numbers will not always decide questions of this sort to the satisfaction of the public.

In this case I have determined to conform the orthography to established English analogies; the only authority from which there can be no legitimate appeal. Now, no rule in orthography is better established, than that which we have adopted from the Latin language, of representing the Greek upsilon by the letter y. In the orthography of oxygen and hydrogen, from ὀξυς and ὑδωρ, this rule has been observed; and why should oxyd be an exception?

With regard to sulphate, nitrate, and other names of that class of compounds, I consider the final e as essential to the words, to prevent a false pronunciation; the vowel a having its first sound as in fate, though slightly pronounced.

The word usually written chemistry has undergone two or three changes, according to fancy or to conjectural etymology. Men have blundered about the plainest thing imaginable; for to determine its true orthography, nothing was necessary but to open an Arabic lexicon. The inhabitants of the south of Europe, who introduced the word, doubtless knew its origin, and wrote it correctly, chimistry, with i, not with y or e; and had the English been contented to take it as they found it, the orthography would have been correct and uniform. [This alteration has not, however, been insisted on, as men of science have not as yet seemed ready to adopt it.]

In introducing words from other languages, it is desirable that the orthography should be conformed, as nearly as may be, to established English analogies. For this reason, I have written maneuver, reconnoiter, as English words; and should prefer to pronounce aiddecamp, as an English word, with English pronunciation and a regular plural termination. So also rendezvous.

The word talc is ill-formed. The original word on the continent of Europe is talk or talg; and the change of k into c is not merely needless, but worse, for it precludes the use of the regular adjective, talcy. Hence we see the adjective used is talcose, an awkward compound of a Teutonic word with a Latin termination. This word would more properly be written talk or talck, which admit regular derivatives, talcky, talckiness. In like manner, zinc, if written zink, would admit the regular adjective, zinky, as written by Kirwan.

It is with no small regret that I see new terms formed, without a due regard to regular English analogies. New terms are often necessary, or at least very useful; but they ought to be coined according to the settled principles of the language. A neglect of these principles is observable in the word systematize, which, not being borrowed from the Greek, ought to follow the general rule of English formation, in agreement with legalize, modernize, civilize, animalize, and others, and be written systemize. This is the more important, as the derivates systemizing, systemization, are of more easy utterance than those of systematize, and particularly the noun systematization.

On this head I would subjoin a remark or two on the mode of writing Indian names of rivers, mountains, and places in America, which we have adopted.

The French were the first Europeans who explored the country between the great lakes and the Gulf of Mexico, and, of course, the first to commit to writing the Indian names which occurred to them in their travels. In doing this, they attempted to express the sounds in letters, according to the French manner of pronunciation. Hence it happened that they wrote ch where we should have written sh, had we first reduced those names to writing. Thus we have Chenango, Michigan, and Michillimackinac,* in the French orthography. And as the French have no w in their language, they could not express the proper sound of the first syllable of Wabash, Wisconsin, Wachita, otherwise than by writing them Ouabache, Ouisconsin, Ouachita; and Missoori in French is Missouri. All this is very proper for Frenchmen, for the letters used express the true sounds of the words. But in English, the letters used lead to a false pronunciation, and for this reason should not be used in English compositions. It is to be deeply regretted that our language is thus doomed to be a heterogeneous medley of English and foreign languages; as the same letters representing different sounds, in different languages, serve to embarrass the reader who understands only his own.

The irregularities in the English orthography have always been a subject of deep regret, and several attempts have been made to banish them from the language. The first attempt of this kind was made by Sir Thomas Smith, Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth; another was made by Dr. Gill, a celebrated master of St. Paul's School, in London; another by Charles Butler; several attempts were made in the reign of Charles I.; an attempt was made by Elphinstone, in the last century; and lastly, another effort was made by Dr. Franklin. The latter gentleman compiled a Dictionary on his scheme of reform, and procured types to be cast, which he offered to me, with a view to engage me to prosecute his design. This offer I declined to accept; for I was then, and am still convinced, that the scheme of introducing new characters into the language, is neither practicable nor expedient. Any attempt of this kind must certainly fail of success.

But that some scheme for expressing the distinct sounds of our letters by visible marks, ought to be adopted, is a point about which there ought to be, and I trust there can be, but one opinion. That such a scheme is practicable as well as expedient, I should presume to be equally evident. Such is the state of our written language, that our own citizens never become masters of orthography, without great difficulty and labor; and a great part of them never learn to spell words with correctness. In addition to this, the present orthography of some classes of words leads to a false pronunciation.

In regard to the acquisition of our language by foreigners, the evil of our irregular orthography is extensive, beyond what is generally known or conceived. While the French and Italians have had the wisdom and the policy to refine and improve their respective languages, and render them almost the common languages of all well-bred people in Europe, the English language, clothed in a barbarous orthography, is never learned by a foreigner but from necessity; and the most copious language in Europe, embodying an uncommon mass of science and erudition, is thus very limited in its usefulness. And to complete the mischief, the progress of arts, science, and Christianity among the heathen, and other rude or unevangelized nations, is most sensibly retarded by the difficulties of mastering an irregular orthography.

The mode of ascertaining the proper pronunciation of words by marks, points, and trifling alterations of the present characters, seems to be the only one which can be reduced to practice. This mode, resembling the use of points in the Hebrew, has been adopted by some of the nations on the Continent; and I have pursued it, to a certain extent, in designating distinctions in the sounds of letters, in this work. The scheme I have invented is not considered as perfect; but it will accomplish some important purposes, by removing the most numerous classes of anomalies. With this scheme, the visible characters of the language will present to the eye of a reader the true sounds of words; and the scheme itself is so simple, that it may be learned in a few moments. To complete a scheme of this kind, a few other alterations would be necessary, but such as would not materially change the orthography, or occasion the least difficulty to the learner or reader.

After these alterations, there would remain a few words whose anomalies may be considered as incorrigible, such as know, gnaw, rough, &c., which may be collected into tables and easily learned; and all the other irregularities may be so classed under general rules, as to be learned with very little labor.

The adoption of this or any other scheme for removing the obstacles which the English orthography presents to learners of the language, must depend on public opinion. The plan I have adopted for representing the sounds of letters by marks and points, in this work, is intended to answer two purposes. First, to supersede the necessity of writing and printing the words a second time, in an orthography adapted to express their pronunciation. The latter method pursued by the English orthoepists, as applicable to most words, is, I think, not only unnecessary, but very inexpedient. The second purpose is, to exhibit to my fellow-citizens the outline of a scheme for removing the difficulties of our irregular orthography, without the use of new characters; a scheme simple, easy of acquisition, and sufficient to answer all the more important purposes of a regular orthography.†

Note. — In the formation of the plural number of nouns ending in ance, ancy; ence, ency; the general rules are to be observed. When the letter e terminates the word, the letter s only is to be added; as in compliance, compliances; but if the letter y terminates the word, this letter is omitted, and ies are added; as in discrepancy, discrepancies; dependency, dependencies. In some cases, the same word is sometimes written with e, and sometimes with y; in which cases the word admits of either form of the plural termination.

PRONUNCIATION.

As our language has been derived from various sources, and little or no systematic effort has been made to reduce the orthography to any regularity, the pronunciation of the language is subject to numerous anomalies. Each of our vowels has several different sounds; and some of the consonants represent very different articulations of the organs. That part of the language which we have received from the Latin, is easily subjected to

* This word is, I believe, customarily pronounced Mackinaw, and the original may well be suffered to fall into disuse.

† We hear it said that a lexicographer should adopt or follow the common orthography of words. This is true when the orthography accords with etymology, and is settled or undisputed. But in the English language there are many words whose spelling is not settled; some whose spelling is a deviation from established analogies; some whose spelling presents wrong component syllables or radical letters. In other words, whose origin is known, authors differ in the manner of writing them. Take the following examples.

In Johnson's Dictionary we find blamable, blamably, appeasable, approvable, desirable, ratable, without the final e of the original words; but saleable, tameable, with e; proveable, with e; improvable, reprovable, without it; moveable, with e, but immovable, removable, without it. Daniel H. Barnes, in the Red Book, remarks, that in this class of words, Johnson's contradictions (discrepancies) are ten on one side, and nine on the other. We every day see the like discrepancies in books and the public prints.

Johnson has cognisee, cognisour, recognise, recognisee, recognisor, with s, (but cognizable and cognizance, with z,) and the terminating syllable sour and sor. Walker has authorize, authorization; but disauthorise. Johnson and Walker have cauterize, cauterization, but epitomise; canonize, familiarize, fertilize, with z, but Johnson, modernise, Walker, modernize; Johnson, syllogize, but Walker, syllogise; both have extemporize, temporize, but contemporise, equalise; Walker has amortise, but amortization, amortizement. Similar discrepancies are seen in all our books and papers.

We every day see surprise and surprize; merchandise and merchandize; enquire and inquire; entrust and intrust; ensure, ensurance, and insure, insurance; endorse, endorsement, and indorse, indorsement; gulf and gulph; partisan and partizan; connection and connexion; chemist and chymist, both wrong; hedge, pledge, but allege, and many others. What then, and where, is the common orthography?

In our language, the unqualified rule of following the common orthography can not have place, for in respect to many words there is no such thing. It is, therefore, wrong in principle, for it would sanction mistakes and tend to perpetuate them; it would preclude correctness and regularity. Such a rule would have been as just in the age of Chaucer as it is now, and had it been observed, what would have been the present state of English orthography?

Many of the anomalies in our language have originated in carelessness, or in mistakes, respecting the origin of words. Philology, for a long series of years, has been most shamefully neglected.

In this condition of our language, I hold it to be the duty of a lexicographer to ascertain, as far as it is practicable, the genuine orthography of words, and introduce that which is correct; particularly when the true orthography serves to illustrate their signification. When this is known, men will be satisfied with it, and fluctuations of spelling will cease. With a full conviction of the value of truth and correctness in language, as in every other department of literature, I have diligently sought for truth, and made it the guide of my decisions. I can not consent to give countenance to errors, which obscure the origin or pervert the signification of words, and be an instrument of corrupting the purity and disfiguring the beauty of the language. A due regard to the purity of the language, to the convenience of learners, whether citizens or foreigners, and to the usefulness of a language which is to be the most extensive on the globe, and the chief instrument of civilizing and christianizing nations, seems to demand, and surely justifies, the labor of correcting the more enormous anomalies which deform it. One would suppose that these considerations, concurring with the honor of our nation, would induce the lovers of literature to make some concessions of private opinions for the accomplishment of these desirable objects.

a few general rules of pronunciation. The same is the fact with most of the derivatives from the Greek. Many words of French origin retain their French orthography, which leads to a very erroneous pronunciation in English; and a large portion of our monosyllabic words of Saxon origin are extremely irregular both in orthography and pronunciation.

If we can judge, with tolerable certainty, from the versification of Chaucer, the pronunciation of words must have been, in many respects, different in his age from that of the present day; particularly in making a distinct syllable of e final, and of the termination ed. But no effort was probably ever made to settle the pronunciation of words till the last century. In England, which was settled by various nations, there are numerous dialects or diversities of language still retained by the great mass of the population.

The first settlers of New England were almost all of English origin, and, coming from different parts of England, they brought with them some diversities of language. But in the infancy of the settlements, the people lived in towns adjacent or near to each other, for mutual aid and protection from the natives; and the male inhabitants of the first generation frequently assembled for the purpose of worship or for government. By the influence of these and other causes, particularly by that of common schools, the differences of language among our citizens have been gradually lost; so that in this part of the United States, there can hardly be said to exist a difference of dialect.

It is to be remarked, further, that the first ministers of the gospel, who migrated to this country, had been educated at the English universities, and brought with them all the learning usually acquired in those institutions, and the English language as it was then spoken. The influence of these men, who were greatly venerated, probably had no small effect in extinguishing differences of speech.

Hence it has happened that the traditional pronunciation of the language of well-educated people has been nearly the same, in both countries, to this day. Among the common people, whose pronunciation in all countries is more or less corrupt, the diversities in this country are far less numerous than in England.

About sixty or seventy years ago, Thomas Sheridan, an Irish gentleman, who had been the pupil of an intimate friend of Dean Swift, attempted to reduce the pronunciation of English words to some system, and to introduce it into popular use. His analysis of the English vowels is very critical, and in this respect, there has been little improvement by later writers, though I think none of them are perfectly correct. But in the application of his principles, he failed of his object. Either he was not well acquainted with the best English pronunciation, or he had a disposition to introduce into use some peculiarities which the English did not relish. The principal objection made to his scheme is, that he gives to s the sound of sh, in sudorific, superb, and other words where s is followed by u long. These he pronounces shoodorific, shooperb, shooperfluity, &c. This pronunciation of s, corresponding to the Shemitic ש, he probably learnt in Ireland, for in the Irish branch of the Celtic, s has often the sound of sh. Thus sean, old, is pronounced shean. This pronunciation was no sooner published, than condemned and rejected by the English.

Another most extraordinary innovation of Sheridan was, his rejection of the Italian sound of a, as in father, calm, ask, from every word in the language. Thus his notation gives to a in bar the same sound as in barren, barrel, bat; to a in father, pass, mass, pant, the same sound as in fat, passion, massacre, pan, fancy. Such a gross deviation from established English usage was of course condemned and rejected.

In his pronunciation of ti and ci, before a vowel, as in partiality, omniscience, Sheridan is more correct than Walker, as he is in some other words; such, for example, as bench, tench, book, took, and others of the same classes.

Sheridan also contributed very much to propagate the change of tu into chu, or tshu; as in natshur, cultshur, virtshue. This innovation was vindicated on the supposed fact, that the letter u has the sound of yu; and natyur, cultyur, virtyue, in a rapid enunciation, become natshur, &c. And to this day, this error respecting the sound of u is received in England as truth. But the fact is otherwise, and if not, it does not justify the practice; for in usage, u is short in nature, culture; so that on the principles of Sheridan himself, this letter can have no effect on the preceding articulation.

This innovation, however, has prevailed to a considerable extent, although Sheridan subjected the change of tu to no rules. He is consistent in applying this change equally to tu, whether the accent follows the t or not. If tu is to be changed to tshu, in future and perpetual, it ought to undergo the same change in futurity and perpetuity; and Sheridan, in pronouncing tutor, tutelage, tumult, as if written tshootor, tshootelage, tshoomult, is certainly consistent, though wrong in fact. In other words, however, Sheridan is inconsistent with himself; for he pronounces multitshood, rectitshood, servitshood, while habitude, beatitude, certitude, decrepitude, gratitude, &c., retain the proper sound of t.

Walker's rule for changing tu to chu only when the accent precedes, is entirely arbitrary, and evidently made by him to suit his own practice. It has, however, the good effect of reducing the chus, and removing the outrageous anomalies of tshootor, tshoomult, &c.

There are many other words which Sheridan has marked for a pronunciation, which is not according to good usage, and which the later orthoepists have corrected. In general, however, it may be asserted that his notation does not warrant a tenth part as many deviations from the present respectable usage in England, as Walker's; yet as his Dictionary was republished in this country, it had no small effect in corrupting the pronunciation of some classes of words, and the effects of its influence are not yet extinct. What the precise effect of Sheridan's scheme of pronunciation was in England, I am not able to determine. But I have had information from the late venerable Dr. Johnson, of Stratford, and from the late Dr. Hubbard, of New Haven, who were in England between the year 1765 and the revolution, that about that period, the change of t into chu had not taken place, to any extent. It began to prevail on the stage and among the younger barristers and members of parliament before Dr. Johnson left England, just before the war with America; and Sheridan's Dictionary, published soon after, undoubtedly contributed to extend the innovation. This change presents a new obstacle to the acquisition of a language, whose anomalies were before frightfully formidable and perplexing. The favorers of innovation seem not to reflect on the immense convenience of a correct notation of sounds in a language, by its proper characters; the utility of uniformity and permanence in that notation; and the extensive evil of destroying or impairing the use of alphabetical writing. The man who perverts or changes the established sound of a single letter, especially of a consonant, does an injury to that language, and to the community using it, which fifty men of the same talents can never repair.

In a few years after the publication of Sheridan's Dictionary, appeared Walker's, the author of which introduces the work to the public with the following remarks on the labors of his predecessors.

"Among those writers who deserve the first praise on this subject, is Mr. Elphinstone, who, in his Principles of the English Language, has reduced the chaos to a system, and laid the foundation of a just and regular pronunciation. But this gentleman, by treating his subject with an affected obscurity, and by absurdly endeavoring to alter the whole orthography of the language, has unfortunately lost his credit with the public, for the part of his labors which entitles him to the highest praise."

"After him, Dr. Kenrick contributed a portion of improvement, by his Rhetorical Dictionary; but he has rendered his Dictionary extremely imperfect, by entirely omitting a great number of words of doubtful and difficult pronunciation; those very words for which a Dictionary of this kind would naturally be consulted." Let it be noted, that the same objection lies in full force against Sheridan, Walker, and Jones.

"To him succeeded Mr. Sheridan, who not only divided the words into syllables, and placed figures over the vowels, as Dr. Kenrick had done, but by spelling these syllables as they are pronounced, seemed to complete the idea of a Pronouncing Dictionary, and to leave but little expectation of improvement. It must be confessed that his Dictionary is generally superior to every thing that preceded it, and his method of conveying the sound of words by spelling them as they are pronounced, is highly rational and useful. But here sincerity obliges me to stop. The numerous instances I have given of impropriety, inconsistency, and want of acquaintance with the analogies of the language, sufficiently show how imperfect I think his Dictionary is, upon the whole, and what ample room was left for attempting another, that might better answer the purpose of a guide to pronunciation."

"The last writer on this subject is Mr. Nares, who, in his Elements of Orthoepy, has shown a clearness of method, and an extent of observation, which deserve the highest encomiums.

But he seems, on many occasions,* to have mistaken the best usage, and to have paid too little attention to the first principles of pronunciation."

Soon after the publication of Walker's Dictionary, appeared the Dictionary of Stephen Jones, who undertakes to correct the errors of Sheridan and Walker. This author objects to Sheridan, that he has not introduced the Italian sound of a, [as in father,] in a single instance, and that Walker has been too sparing in the use of it. He objects that Sheridan has not, by any peculiar marks, pointed out the sound of oi or oy, as in noise and cloy; and that Walker has given distinct marks of pronunciation to the diphthong ou, which are terrific to the learner, and not well calculated to express the exact sound. He considers it as no trivial error in Walker's system, that he uses the long e in place of the short y, which gives to asperity, for example, the ludicrous sound of asperectee. He notices also, as a fault in Walker's scheme, that he makes no difference in the sound of oo in tool, tooth, and in look, took.

In all these particulars, except that of oi and oy, I think every man who understands genuine English, will accord with Jones. From careful observation, while in England, I know that Jones's notation is far more correct than that of Sheridan or Walker; and, except in two or three classes of words, his pronunciation is exactly that which I uniformly heard in England, and nearly the same as that of well-educated gentlemen in New England.

A few years after the appearance of Jones's Dictionary, William Perry published a Pronouncing Dictionary, in which an attempt is made to indicate the sounds of the letters by certain arbitrary marks. In this work, the author has rejected most of the peculiarities of Sheridan, Walker, and Jones, and given the language nearly as it was spoken, before those authors undertook to regulate the pronunciation. This author's manner of designating the sounds of the letters is too complex for convenience, but his pronunciation is nearer to the actual usage in England, than that of either of his predecessors before mentioned. His orthography also is more correct, according to present usage, than that of his predecessors.

During the year 1828, appeared the Dictionary of R. S. Jameson, of Lincoln's Inn, intended to combine the merits of the most popular Dictionaries, and to correct the false pronunciation of Walker, whose notation in some classes of words he entirely rejects. He condemns, as a slovenly enunciation, the sound given to d, which, before i and u, Walker directs, in certain words, to be pronounced like j. He rejects also his notation of ch, or tsh, in congratulation, flatulent, natural, and all similar words. He rejects also the affected pronunciation of Sheridan and Walker, in such words as guide and kind. Most of the other errors of Walker he copies, as he does his antiquated orthography.

The English orthoepists have analyzed, and in general have well defined or described, the sounds and appropriate uses of the letters of the alphabet. Sheridan's analysis, which appeared a few years before Walker's, is, for the most part, correct; but, in describing the sounds of what may be called the diphthongal vowel i, I think he has erred, in making it to consist of the broad a or aw and e. He admits, indeed, that the voice does not rest on the sound aw, but he contends that the mouth is opened to the same degree of aperture, and is in the same position, as if it were going to sound aw; but before the voice can get a passage to the lips, the under jaw is drawn up to the position for sounding e. On this it is justly remarked by Walker, that aw and e are precisely the component elements of the diphthong oi and oy. If the aw is pronounced, I would add, then i and oy must be pronounced exactly alike; and if aw is not pronounced, then it is not a component part of the diphthongal vowel i.

Walker contends that this diphthong i is composed of the sound of the Italian a, as in father, and the sound of e. If so, he must have given to a a very different sound from that which we are accustomed to give it. But this is a mistake; that sound of a is no more heard in i, than the sound of aw. The sound of i in fight, mind, time, idle, is not faweght, mawend, tawem, awedle; nor is it fäeght, mäend, täem, äedle. Let any man utter the aw or the Italian a before the e, and he will instantly perceive the error, and reject both definitions, as leading to a false pronunciation. The truth is, the mouth, in uttering i, is not opened so wide as in uttering aw or ä; the initial sound is not that of aw or ä; nor is it possible, by any characters we possess, to express the true sound on paper. The initial sound is not formed so deep in the throat as aw or ä; the position of the organs is nearly, yet not exactly the same. The true sound can be learned only by the ear.

Equally inaccurate is the definition of the first sound of u, or long u, which these writers allege to consist of the sounds of e and oo, or you. It has this sound, indeed, in certain words, as in unite, union, and others; but this is a departure from the proper sound of this character, as heard in cube, abuse, durable, human, jury. These words are not pronounced keoob, abeoose, deoorable, heooman, jeoory. The effort to introduce this affected pronunciation is of most mischievous tendency. The sound of e is not heard in the proper enunciation of the English u, and for that reason it should not be so stated on paper, nor named yu; as the error naturally leads to a corrupt pronunciation. Dr. Kenrick remarks, that we might as well prefix y to the other vowels, as to u, and pronounce them ya, ye, yi, yo.

But this is not the whole evil; this analysis of u has led orthoepists to give to our first or long u two distinct sounds, or rather to make a diphthong and a vowel of this single letter. Thus they make it a diphthong in almost all situations, except after r, where they make it a vowel equivalent to oo, or the French ou. They represent u as being equivalent to ew, that is, e and oo, in cube, tube, duty, confusion, endure, pronounced kewbe, tewbe, dewty, confewsion, endewre; but in brute, fruit, rude, intrude, ruby, they make u equivalent to oo; thus, broote, froot, roode, introode, rooby.

I know not where this affectation originated; it first appeared in Sheridan's Dictionary, but it is a most unfounded distinction, and a most mischievous error. No such distinction was known to Dr. Johnson; he gives the long u but one sound, as in confusion; and no such distinction is observed among good speakers generally, either in this country or in England. I was particularly attentive to the public speakers in England, in regard to this point, and was happy to find that very few of them made the distinction here mentioned. In that country, as in this, the long u has a uniform sound after all the consonants.

The source of the error in this, as in another case to be mentioned hereafter, may be an inattention to the manner in which the articulations affect the vowels which follow them. To understand this, it will be necessary or useful to examine the anatomical formation of articulate sounds.

"An articulate sound," says Lowth, "is the sound of the human voice, formed by the organs of speech. A vowel is a simple articulate sound."

These definitions seem not to be sufficiently accurate. Articulation, in human speech, is the jointing, juncture, or closing of the organs, which precedes and follows the vowels or open sounds, and which partially or totally intercepts the voice. A vowel or vocal sound is formed simply by opening the mouth. Thus, in sounding a or o, the mouth is opened in a particular manner, but without any articulation or closing of the organs. In strictness, therefore, a simple vowel is not an articulate sound, as Lowth supposes; and it is certain that many irrational animals, without the power of articulation, do utter vowel sounds with great distinctness.

An articulate sound, then, is, properly, a sound preceded or followed, or both, by an articulation or junction of the organs. Thus ba, ab, and bad, are articulate sounds; the vowel being begun or closed, with a junction of the lips, interrupting the voice, in ba and ab; and in bad, the vocal sound being preceded by one articulation and followed by another. The power of articulation constitutes the great difference between men and brutes; the latter, being unable to articulate, can utter only vocal sounds. The imperfect articulations of the parrot and some other animals, form no exception that deserves notice.

I give the name articulation to the act of joining the organs, and to the character or letter which represents the junction. In the latter sense, the word is equivalent to consonant; and articulation may be considered the preferable term, as it expresses the fact of closing the organs.

Human speech, then, consists of vocal sounds separated and modified by articulations of the organs. We open the mouth in a particular manner, to utter a vowel; we then close the organs, interrupt that sound, and open the organs to utter a second vowel; and continue this opening and closing, to the end of the word. This process is carried on with surprising rapidity.

Now, in passing from an articulation, or close position, to an open position for uttering a vowel, it happens often that a very slight sound of e is uttered so as to be perceptible to the ear, either before or after the utterance of the proper vowel. This is remarkably the case with the long vowels preceding r; for such is the nature of that letter, that bare, mire, more, parent, apparent, &c., can not well be pronounced without a slight sound of e between the long vowel and the consonant. Thus the words above named are pronounced nearly bāer, mier, moer, pāerent, appāerent; and bare, mire, approach toward two syllables drawn very closely together.

* In many instances, I suppose the writer means.

A like case, though less obvious, occurs in uttering u, particularly after the labial and palatal articulations. In passing from the articulations eb, eg, em, ep, or pe, to the sound of u, as in mute and pure, we are apt, insensibly, to utter a slight sound of e; and this utterance, which proceeds from the particular situation of the organs, has been mistaken for the first component sound of the long or open u. The same cause has given rise to the pronunciation of e before the vowel in such words as guide, guard, kind, guise. This is precisely similar to the vulgar pronunciation of cow, gown, county, town, &c., that is, keow, geown, keounty, teown — a pronunciation formerly common in New England, and not yet wholly extinct. This vicious pronunciation, in all words of this kind, whether countenanced by men of low life or of fashionable life, ought to be carefully avoided; as the slender sound of e, in such cases, gives a feebleness to the words utterly inconsistent with that full, open, and manly enunciation which is essential to eloquence.

The genuine sound of u long, detached from the influence of consonants, is the same in all the words above specified; and the reason why it has been made a distinct vowel after r, as in rude, [rood,] is, that the organs are open before the sound commences; whereas, when it follows most of our consonants, the sound is commenced immediately after an articulation, or close position of the organs, as in mutable and infusion. For this reason, u has more distinctly its long or open sound after labials and palatals, than after r; but this accidental circumstance should not be the ground of radical distinctions, equivalent to the sounds of different letters.

There is, in Walker's analysis of the alphabet, an error peculiar to himself. This is, in making a distinction between the short i when it is followed by a consonant, and when it is not; as in ability. In this case, he calls the first i, in abil, short; but the second he calls open, and equivalent to e in equal. (See Principles 107, 544.) He also makes the unaccented y, at the end of a syllable, precisely like the first sound of e in me, meter. Ability, then, written according to his principles, would be abileetee. Never was a grosser mistake. The sound of i and y in unaccented syllables, whether followed by an articulation or not, is always the short sound of e long, that is, e shortened; the same sound in quality or kind, but not in quantity. To prove this fact, nothing is necessary but an attention to the manner in which the words little and tiny are pronounced, when they are made emphatical by utterance. They are then pronounced leetle, teeny; and this we hear every day, not only among children, but often among adults. In this change of pronunciation, there is nothing more than a prolongation of the sound of i, which, in the syllables lit, tin, is short, in leetle, teeny, is long.

In consequence of this mistake, Walker has uniformly made a different notation of i when accented, and followed by a consonant in the same syllable, and when it stands alone in the syllable and unaccented. Thus to the first i in ability he assigns a different sound from that of the second; and in article, he gives to i the sound of e long, arteecle; but in articular, articulate, he gives it the short sound, tik. It is in consequence of this mistake, that he has throughout his Dictionary assigned to i and y unaccented, and to y unaccented terminating words, the sound of e long; an error, which, it is ascertained by actual enumeration, extends to more than eleven thousand vowels or syllables; an error, which, if carried to the full extent of his principles, would subvert all the rules of English versification. Jones and Perry have corrected this error in their notations, throughout the language.

If it should be said that Walker did not intend to direct y, in this case, to be pronounced as e long, but that his notation is intended only to mark the quality of the sound, it may be replied, he either intended the sound to be that of e long, according to his express direction, or he did not. If he did, his notation is not according to any good practice, either in England or the United States; and by changing a short vowel into a long one, his notation would subvert the rules of metrical composition. If he did not, his notation is adapted to mislead the learner, and it does mislead learners, wherever his book is strictly followed. In truth, this notation is generally condemned in England, and universally rejected in practice.*

In the notation of sounds, there is a mistake and inconsistency in most orthoepists, which deserves notice, not on account of its practical importance so much, as to expose an error in syllabication or the division of words into syllables, which has been maintained by all writers in Great Britain, from time immemorial. The rule is, that "a single consonant between two vowels, must be joined to the latter syllable." According to this rule, habit, baron, tenet, are to be divided thus, ha-bit, ba-ron, te-net.

This rule is wholly arbitrary, and has for ages retarded and rendered difficult the acquisition of the language by children. How is it possible that men of discernment should support a rule, that in thousands of words makes it necessary to break a syllable, detaching one of the letters essential to it, and giving it a place in the next? In the words above mentioned, hab, bar, ten, are distinct syllables, which can not be divided without violence. In many words, as in these, this syllable is the radix of the word; the other syllable being formative or adventitious. But where this is not the case, convenience requires that syllables should, if possible, be kept entire; and in all cases, the division of syllables should, as far as possible, be such as to lead the learner to a just pronunciation.

As in our language the long and short vowels are not distinguished by differences of character, when we see a single consonant between vowels, we can not determine, from the preceding vowel character, whether the sound is long or short. A stranger to the language knows not whether to pronounce habit, ha-bit or hab-it, till he is instructed in the customary pronunciation. It was probably to avoid this inconvenience, that our ancestors wrote two consonants instead of one in a great number of words, as in banner, dinner. In this respect, however, there is no uniformity in English; as we have generally retained the orthography of the languages from which we have received the words, as in tutor, rigor, silent, and the like.

Now, it should be observed that although we often see the consonant doubled, as in banner, yet no more than one articulation, in these cases, is ever used in speaking. We close the organs but once between the first and second syllable, nor is it possible to use both the letters n, without pronouncing ban, then intermitting the voice entirely, opening the organs and closing them a second time. Hence, in all cases, when the same consonant is written twice between vowels, as in banner, dinner, better, one of them only is represented by an articulation of the organs; the other is useless, except that it prevents any mistake as to the sound of the preceding vowel.

In the notation of most orthoepists, there is inconsistency, at least, if not error. If they intend to express the true pronunciation by using the precise letters necessary for the purpose, they all err. For instance, they write bar'run for bar'on, when one articulation only is, or possibly can be, used; so also ballance, biggot, biggamy, mellon, mettaphor, mellody. This is not only useless, for the use of the accent after the consonant, as bar'on, bal'ance, big'ot, mel'on, &c., completely answers the purpose of determining the pronunciation, but it is contradictory to their own practice in a vast number of cases. Thus they write one consonant only in civil, civic, rivet; and Walker writes kollonade, doubling l, but kolony, kolonise, with a single l. This want of system is observable in all the books which are offered to the public as standards of orthoepy.

A still greater fault, because it may lead to innumerable practical errors, consists in the notation of unaccented syllables. In this particular, there is error and discrepancy in the schemes of the orthoepists, which shows the utter impossibility of carrying them into effect. The final y unaccented Walker makes to be e long, as I have before observed; while Sheridan, Jones, and Perry, make it equivalent to short i, or, at least, give it a short sound, according to universal practice. Walker pronounces the last vowel in natural and national, as a short; Sheridan, as e short, naturel; Jones, as u short, naturul. Sheridan's notation

* From the fact, which Walker relates of himself, (Prin. 246,) that he made a distinction between the sound of ee in flee and in meet, until he had consulted good speakers, and particularly Mr. Garrick, who could find no difference in the sound, it might be inferred that his ear was not very accurate. But his mistake evidently arose from not attending to the effect of the articulation in the latter word, which stops the sound suddenly, but does not vary it. It is the same mistake which he made in the sound of i in the second syllable of ability, which he calls short, while the sound of the second i and of y is that of long e. The celebrity of Walker as a teacher of elocution, and his Key to the Pronunciation of Ancient Names, which, with a few exceptions, is a good standard work, have led many persons to put more confidence in his English Orthoepy, than a close examination of its principles will support.

may be a mistake, for he gives to al in national, the sound of ul. In the adjective deliberate, Walker and Jones give a in the last syllable its proper long sound; and Sheridan, the sound of e short, deliberet. Dignitary is pronounced by Sheridan dignitery, and Walker and Jones give to a its short sound, as in at. The terminating syllable ness is pronounced by Walker and Jones nes, by Sheridan nis; as, blessednes, blessednis. The same difference exists in their notation of less; Sheridan pronouncing it lis, as in blamelis, and Walker and Jones giving e its proper sound. These differences, and many others, run through their works, and appear in a large portion of all the words in the language.

Now, it is probable that all these gentlemen pronounced these words alike, or so nearly alike, that no difference would be noticed by a bystander. The mischief of these notations is, that attempts are made to express minute distinctions or shades of sounds, so to speak, which can not be represented to the eye by characters. A great part of the notations must, necessarily, be inaccurate, and for this reason, the notation of the vowels in unaccented syllables should not be attempted. From a careful attention to this subject, I am persuaded that all such notations are useless, and many of them mischievous, as they lead to a wrong pronunciation. In no case can the true pronunciation of words in a language be accurately and completely expressed on paper; it can be caught only by the ear, and by practice. No attempt has ever been made to mark the pronunciation of all the sounds, in any other language; and in our language it is worse than useless.

As Walker's pronunciation has been represented to the people of this country as the standard, I shall confine my remarks chiefly to his work, with a view to ascertain its merits, and correct any erroneous impressions which have been received from such representations.

1. The first class of words which I shall mention, is that in which a has what is called its Italian sound, as we pronounce it in father, psalm, calm. From a hasty enumeration of words of this class, I find there are two or three hundred in number, in which Walker gives to a its short sound, as in fat, bat, fancy, when, in fact, the most respectable usage in England, as well as in the United States, gives that letter its Italian sound. This error Jones and Perry have corrected. To be correct in this class of words, we have only to retain the customary pronunciation of the Northern States.

2. The notation of the sound of oo by Walker is wrong in most or all the words in which oo are followed by k, and in some others. Notwithstanding the distinction between the long and short sound of oo is clear, and well established in a great number of words, yet he assigns the short sound to eight words only, viz. wool, wood, good, hood, foot, stood, understood, and withstood. (Prin. 307.) It seems inconceivable that a man, bred or resident in London, should assign to oo in book, cook, took, and other like words, the same sound as in cool, boom, boot, food. Jones and Perry have corrected this notation, and given the pronunciation according to good usage, and just according to our customary pronunciation. While in England, I did not hear a single word of this class pronounced according to Walker's notation.

3. To the letters ch in bench, bunch, clinch, drench, inch, tench, wrench, and many other words, Walker gives the French sound, that is, the sound of sh, instead of ch; as, bensh, insh, &c. It would seem by this and other examples of wrong notation, that the author had been accustomed to some local peculiarities, either in London, where all kinds of dialects are heard, or in some other place. In this instance, he gives to these words a pronunciation different from that of other orthoepists, and one which I have never heard, either in England or in this country. His notation is palpably wrong, as our customary pronunciation is universally correct.

4. It has been already remarked, that Walker's notation of the sound of i and y short, in unaccented syllables, which he directs to be pronounced like e long, in me, mete, is contrary to all good usage, and is rejected by every other orthoepist, except Jameson. Walker admits i to be short, when followed by a consonant in the same syllable. Thus the first i in ability is short, but the second i and the y are long e, abileetee. Now, observe the consequence. In the plural, abilities, according to his rule, must be pronounced abileeteez; but the word is never thus pronounced; universally it is pronounced abilitiz; the last vowel sound is, in practice, immediately followed by a consonant, and by his own rule, must be short. Then the result is, y in ability is long e, but ie in the plural, is short i. And for this change of sound, no provision is made in Walker's scheme, nor in any other that I have ever seen.

5. In the analysis of the sounds of our letters, Walker alleges the diphthong ou, ow, to consist of the broad a or aw, and the Italian sound of u. According to his scheme, about, abound, round, now, vow, are to be pronounced abawut, abawund, rawund, nawu, vawu. But who ever heard this pronunciation? The fact is not so; the broad sound of a is not the initial sound of this diphthong; it is not commenced as deep in the throat, or with the same aperture, as aw; it is a sound that can be learned only by the ear. The pronunciation of this diphthong is uniform in both countries.

6. In noting the sound of the unaccented vowels, and those which have the secondary accent, there are mistakes without number, in all the schemes which I have seen, and one continued series of differences between the orthoepists. The following is a specimen.

I take no notice of the different letters by which these writers express the same sound, one using e where another uses y, but of the different sounds which they give to the vowels in the second, third, or last syllable. Now, I appeal to any person who has a tolerably correct ear, whether it is the sound of a that is uttered by good speakers, or any speakers, in deliverance and dignitary. Is it the sound of a that we hear in the last syllable of penance, penetrant, and assemblage? Do we hear, in the last syllable of profligate, the short a, as in fat? So far from it, that a public speaker, who should utter the sound of a so that it should be distinctly recognized in any polite audience, would expose himself to ridicule. The sound of the last vowel approaches to that of e or u, and the notation of Sheridan is nearest the truth. But any notation is worse than useless; for without it, there would be no difference in customary pronunciation.

To show the utter impracticability of expressing the unaccented vowels, in all cases, with precision, let the reader observe Walker's notation of a in the word moderate, and its derivatives. In the adjective and verb, the a is long, as in fate; in moderately and moderateness it is short, as in fat. This is certainly incorrect notation; no good speaker ever pronounces these words moderatly, moderatness. In addition to this, the a in the verb to moderate, is more distinctly pronounced than it is in the adjective, in which it has rather the sound of e short, moderet; at least the sound is more nearly that of e than of a. And this distinction of sound, between letters in the same word, when an adjective, and when a verb, occurs in a multitude of cases — a distinction for which no provision is made in any system of orthoepy that I have seen, and one which must be left to the cognizance of the ear alone.

There is another class of vowel sounds that comprises too many inaccuracies to be overlooked. This is the class in which the first syllable has an unaccented e, as in debate. In all words of this kind, Walker directs the letter e to have its long sound, as in me, mete. Then, become, bedeck, begin, debate, debar, declare, elect, legitimate, mechanic, medicinal, memorial, necessity, peculiar, petition, rebuke, recant, relate, secure, select, velocity, &c., are to be pronounced beecome, beedeck, beegin, deebate, deebar, deeclare, eelect, leegitimate, meechanic, meedicinal, meemorial, neecessity, peeculiar, peetition, reebuke, reecant, reelate, seecure, seelect, veelocity, &c.

According to this notation, the first vowel e in evil, even, and in event, is to have the same sound, being all marked with the same figure. Now, let me ask, where a speaker can be found who pronounces these words in this manner. Who ever heard of such a pronunciation? This notation is erroneous and mischievous, as it is inconsistent with the regular accent, which carries the stress of voice forward to the next syllable, and must, necessarily, leave the first vowel with the feeble sound of short i or y. This short sound, and not the long one, as in even, is that which we always hear in such words.

The like error occurs in Walker's notation of i in direct, diminish, and many other words. Walker himself, under despatch, calls the sound of e the short i; but under rule 107, says this sound of i can not be properly said to be short, as it is not closed by a consonant; yet it has half its diphthongal sound, the sound of e!! This reason, that i or e is not short, because the sound is not closed by a consonant, is entirely groundless, and contradicted by the universal pronunciation of thousands of English words. To direct such words to be pronounced deerect, deeminish, is inexcusable. This error corresponds with that specified under No. 4, supra.

Thus there is neither uniformity nor consistency among the orthoepists, in the notation of the unaccented vowels; and it is hardly possible there should be, for many of the sounds are so slight, in ordinary pronunciation, that it is almost impossible for the ear to recognize the distinctions, and absolutely impossible to express them on paper. In truth, as Dr. Ash remarks, in a dissertation prefixed to his Dictionary, the sounds of the five vowels, in unaccented, short, and insignificant syllables, are nearly coincident; and it must be a nice ear that can distinguish the difference of sound in the concluding syllable of altar, alter, manor, murmur, satyr. It is for this reason that the notation of such vowels at all savors of hypercritical fastidiousness, and, by aiming at too much nicety and exactness, tends only to generate doubts and multiply differences of opinion. If the accent is laid on the proper syllable, and the vowel of that syllable correctly pronounced, the true pronunciation of the word will follow of course; at least the pronunciation is more likely to be right than wrong, and no mistake will occur, which shall be an object of notice.

Nor can I approve the practice of writing all words in different characters, to express their pronunciation, as if their proper letters were so many hieroglyphics, requiring interpretation. A great part of English words have an orthography sufficiently regular, and so well adapted to express the true pronunciation, that a few general rules only are wanted as a guide to the learner.

7. Another error of notation, in most of the English books, is that of the vowel in the first syllable of circle, circumstance, and many other words, the first syllable of which Sheridan first, and afterwards Walker and Jones, directed to be pronounced ser. This pronunciation I have never heard either in England or in this country. Perry's notation makes the syllable sur, according to all the usage with which I am acquainted.

8. Another objection to the books offered as standards of pronunciation, particularly to the Dictionaries of Sheridan and Walker, is, that the rules are inconsistent, or the execution of the work is inconsistent with the rules. Thus Walker lays it down as a rule, (No. 357,) that c after the accent, and followed by ea, ia, ie, io, or eous, takes the sound of sh, as in ocean, social, Phocion, saponaceous, which are pronounced as if written oshean, *soshe*a*l*, Phosheon, saponasheous. But in the Dictionary, the author departs from the rule, and directs these words to be pronounced as if written oshun, soshal, saponashus. So also in gracious, ancient, especial, provincial, tenacious, rapacious, and I know not how many others, the author departs from his own rule; so that either his rule or his practice must be wrong.

And here it may be proper to notice a mistake of the author, which has led to an erroneous notation in a great number of words. The mistake is, that he assigns to c and t before the vowels ea, ia, ie, eo, and io, the sound of sh. Thus in ocean, he considers c as pronounced like sh; and in partial, he considers the sound of sh as proceeding from t only. Now, the truth is, that the sound of sh, in these and in all similar cases, results from the combination of c, t, or s, with the following vowel; that is, from the rapid enunciation and blending of the two letters. Then the sound of the first vowel being blended with c or t, it ought not to be repeated, and form a distinct syllable. To make three syllables of ocean, is to use the vowel e twice. In most cases, all the orthoepists agree in pronouncing these combinations correctly in dissyllables, and primitive words; as, oshun, grashus, tenashus, parshal, substanshal, nashun, relashun, preshus, and the like. But in a number of words that are primitive in our language, Walker and Jones depart from this rule; for although they pronounce conscience in two syllables, conshense, yet they pronounce nescience and prescience in three, neshyense, preshyense. So also when they make tial one syllable in the primitive word, they make two syllables of these letters in the derivatives; partial is parshal, but partiality is parsheality. Thus one error has led to another, and a large part of all words of this kind are mispronounced. Sheridan and Perry, in this respect, are consistent and correct; making one syllable only of cia, cie, cio, tia, tio, both in primitives and derivatives, throughout the language. A single line of poetry ought to settle this point forever.

9. A remarkable instance of inconsistency occurs in the following words. Armature, aperture, breviature, feature, &c., Walker pronounces armatshure, apertshure, breviatshure, overtshure; but forfeiture is forfeetyure, and judicature, ligature, literature, miniature, nunciature, portraiture, prefecture, quadrature, signature, are pronounced as here written. Can any reason be possibly assigned for such inconsistency?

10. Obedience and its family of words Walker pronounces obejeence, obejeent, obejeently; but disobedience, disobedient, as here written. Expedient is either as here written, or expejeent; but expedience without the alternative. Why this inconsistency?

11. Obdurate, obduracy, are marked to be pronounced obdurate or objurate, obduracy or objuracy; but objurately, objurateness, without an alternative. In these last words occurs another error; the a in the third syllable is made short, as if pronounced rat — a deviation from all good usage.

This notation of obdurate is inconsistent, also, with that of indurate, and with that of obdure — an inconsistency which appears to have no plausible pretext.

The conversion of d into j before i is rejected, I believe, in all words, by Jones, Perry, and Jameson, and before u is rejected by Perry and Jameson, and in many words by Jones. It is a departure from orthography wholly inexcusable.

12. Walker (Principles, No. 92) lays it down as a rule, that when a is preceded by the gutturals hard g or c, [he should have said palatals,] it is, in polite pronunciation, softened by the intervention of a sound like e, so that card, cart, guard, regard, are pronounced like keard, keart, gheard, regheard. Now, it is remarkable that in the vocabulary or dictionary, the author has departed from his rule, for in not one of the foregoing words, except guard, nor in a multitude of other words which fall within the rule, has he directed this sound of e before the following vowel. Had he conformed to his own rule, he must have perverted the pronunciation of car, carbuncle, care, carcass, cardinal, cargo, garden, garter, discard, and a long list of other words, too long to be here enumerated. The English orthoepists now confine this prepositive sound of e to guard, guaranty, guardian, guile, kind, and a few others. The probable origin of this fault has been already assigned, in treating of the letter u. It is an affected pronunciation, which Nares calls "a monster, peculiar to the stage." Indeed, this slender sound of e before another vowel, is wholly incompatible with that manly enunciation which is peculiarly suited to the genius of the language. Perry and Jameson have rejected it.

13. In the first edition of Walker's Dictionary, the author, under the word tripod, observes, that "all words of two syllables, with the accent on the first, and having one consonant between two vowels, ought to have the vowel in the first syllable long." But this was too rash, for such words as cem'ent, des'ert, pref'ace, pres'ent, prof'it, reb'el, trop'ic, and a multitude of others, stand, in the author's book, in direct opposition to his own rule. In a subsequent edition, the author, or some other person, has qualified the rule by an exception in favor of settled usage. This exception destroys the value of the rule; and indeed there is, and there can be, no rule applicable to words of this class. The pronunciation of the first vowel can be known only by the usage.

14. The derivatives of nation and ratio Walker and Jones pronounce nash'onal, rash'onal. If this should be defended on the ground of the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent, then let me ask why we have not nosh'onal from notion, devosh'onal from devotion, probash'oner from probation, stash'onary from station? Why make rules and not apply them? Why indulge such palpable inconsistencies and multiply anomalies?

15. Possess is, by the English orthoepists, pronounced pozzess; but why not, then, pronounce assess, assist, assassin, concession, obsession, with the sound of z? Can any good reason be assigned for making possess an exception to the pronunciation of this class of words? This utterance of sounds through the nose is always disagreeable to the ear, and should be restricted to words in which usage is established. Good taste should rather induce a limitation than an extension of this practice. This remark applies also to some words beginning with dis, in which Walker goes beyond other orthoepists in giving to s this nasal sound.

16. Walker lays it down as a fact, that u has the sound of e and oo or yu. This is true in many words, as in union, unite, unanimity, &c. Hence, according to his principle, u in these words is to be pronounced yunion, yunite, without the letter y prefixed. Yet he writes these and similar words with y, yunion, which, upon his principles, would prefix yu to the sound of yu, and the pronunciation would be yuyunite, or eooyunite. But his notation of this sound of u is not uniform; for he writes disunion and disunite without y, though it must be as proper in the compound as in the simple word. The same inconsistency occurs between use, written yuse, yuze, and disuse, disuze.

17. There is a fault in Walker's notation of o, when it has the sound of oo, the French ou. In the Key, he marks o, when it has this sound, with the figure 2, and gives move as an example. Then, according to his Key, o alone, when thus marked, sounds as oo. But in the Vocabulary, he thus marks both vowels in book, look, boot, and all similar words. Then, according to his notation, each of the vowels has the sound of oo, and book, look, are to be pronounced boo-ook, loo-ook. He certainly did not intend this; but such is precisely his direction, or the result of his notation; and a foreigner, without counter-direction, must be led into this pronunciation.

The same fault occurs in his notation of ee, as in meet and seek.

18. Volume, Walker and Jones pronounce volyume, but this is not exactly correct. Will it be said that in volume the u is long? This is not the fact; at least I never heard it thus pronounced either in England or America; it is always short in common usage, i. e., has the first sound of u, shortened.

19. Ink, uncle, concord, concourse, concubine, are pronounced by Walker, ingk, ungkl, kongkord, kongkorse, kongkubine; and these odious vulgarisms are offered for our adoption. There can be no apology for such attempts to corrupt our language.

20. It is known that the word imagery is, by Walker and the other orthoëpists, pronounced in four syllables; the final e of the primitive word being detached from it, and uttered with r, as a distinct syllable. Why savagery has escaped the same fate, I do not know. It is obvious that, in negligent practice, these words have often been thus pronounced. But the most correct pronunciation retains the original word entire in the derivative, the slight sound of e before r no more constituting a syllable, than it does in more and mire. Take the following examples: —

Of marble stone was cut
An altar carv'd with cunning imagery. Spenser.

When in those oratories might you see
Rich carvings, portraitures, and imagery. Dryden.

Your gift shall two large goblets be
Of silver, wrought with curious imagery. Dryden.

What can thy imagery of sorrow mean? Prior.

Pronounced in four syllables, imagery, in these lines, makes a syllable too much, and injures the measure, and in the last example utterly destroys it. The true pronunciation of Spenser, Dryden, and Prior, is the same as it always has been in my elementary books. [Although the same remarks may be applicable to such words as bravery, finery, knavery, scenery, slavery, &c., it has been thought best to make a distinct syllable of the e and r, to avoid misunderstanding as to the sound intended.]

21. Formerly the words puissance, puissant, had the accent on the second syllable; although the poets seem, in some instances, to have blended the four first letters into one syllable. But the modern change of the accent to the first syllable, is not in accordance with English analogies, and it impairs the measure of many lines of poetry, in which these words occur. In the adverb puissantly, it has a very bad effect.

The foregoing observations extend to whole classes of words, in which the genuine pronunciation has been changed, unsettled, and perverted. It would be inconsistent with the limited nature of this Introduction, to enter into an examination of every particular word of disputable pronunciation. It seems to be inexpedient and useless to bestow, as Walker has done, half a page, or a page, on a single word, in attempting to settle some trifling point, or, in many cases, to settle a point that, in this country, has never been disputed.

To give a brief statement of the errors, diversities, and contradictions of the principal schemes of orthoepy which have been offered to the public, within the last half century, two classes of words only will be sufficient as specimens.

The following lists are not complete, but they comprehend the greatest number of words in their respective classes. The dates at the head of the columns, designate the year when the Dictionaries in my possession were published, indicating nearly, but not exactly, the origin of each scheme. In the orthography, I have given the letters used by each author, in the syllable which contains the difference of pronunciation; in the others, I have followed the common orthography.

This table of words may, perhaps, be thought a burlesque on English orthoepy. It certainly presents a phenomenon altogether novel in the history of language.

Of these five authorities, the notation of Perry, with the exception of a few words ending in ure, is most nearly accordant to the present usage in England, as far as my observations, while in that country, extended. That of Walker is by far the most remote from that usage. From an actual enumeration of the syllables in certain classes of words in which the vowel is erroneously pronounced, in Walker's scheme, I have ascertained that the number amounts to more than twelve thousand, without including several classes of unaccented syllables, which would swell the number by some thousands. Of this whole number, I did not, while in England, hear one vowel pronounced according to Walker's notation. The zeal manifested in this country to make his pronunciation a standard, is absolute infatuation, as, if adopted in its full extent, it would introduce many differences in the pronunciation of words in the two countries, in which sameness now exists; and even the attempt, should it not be successful, must multiply discordancies and distract opinions, and thus place the desired uniformity at a greater distance than ever. Fortunately, Walker's pronunciation has never been generally received in England, and where it has been received, we see, by Jameson's Dictionary, that it is becoming unpopular and obsolete. Walker's pronunciation of several classes of words is also condemned by Jones and Knowles.

We observe in the following list, that the three first of these orthoepists have no rule by which their pronunciation is regulated. Hence the want of uniformity in words of like orthography. See bounteous, courteous, duteous, and plenteous. Why should plenteous be reduced to two syllables, when bounteous is pronounced in three? And what reason can be assigned for the different notation of capitulate and recapitulate?

A remarkable instance of inconsistency in Walker's notation, occurs in words of more syllables than two, ending in ture. Thus we find ture converted into chure [tshure] in

In this class of words, Sheridan and Jones are also inconsistent with themselves, though not to the same extent as Walker. Perry and Jameson retain, in all these words, the true orthography and pronunciation. In these words, also, Walker gives to u, in the last syllable, its first or long sound; but this is an inaccurate notation; the sound is that of the long u, shortened, at least so far as my observation extends, either in England or the United States.

In the following classes of words, as pronounced by Walker, there is either error or inconsistency, or both.

Assidjuous.	Obejeence.
Commodious or Commojeus.	Obejeent.

Noctidyal or Noctidjeal.

It would seem that, in a large part of these words, we may take our choice, either to retain the proper sound of d, or to convert it into that of j. This choice certainly makes an odd kind of standard. But why mediate should retain the sound of d, while immediacy and medium suffer a change; or why radiate should be given in the alternative, radiate or rajeate, while irradiate and irradiance are not subjected to any change; or why obedience should be changed into obejeence, and disobedience remain unchanged, I am not able to conjecture.

These classes of words exhibit a specimen of the modern ORTHOEPY, so called, of our language; it is indeed a brief and imperfect specimen, for I have ascertained by actual enumeration, that a catalogue of all the differences of notation in these authors, would comprehend about one third of all the words in their vocabularies. Amidst this mass of errors and contradictions, our consolation is, that the good sense of the English nation, a learned and respectable people, is triumphing over the follies and caprices of fashion, and frowning on this most mischievous spirit of innovation.*

In proportion as the importance of settled usages and of preserving inviolate the proper sounds of letters, as the true and only safe landmarks of pronunciation, shall be appreciated by an enlightened people, just in that proportion will all attempts of affected speakers to innovate upon such established usages, be reprobated and resisted.

The intentions of the men who have undertaken to give a standard of pronunciation, have, unquestionably, been upright and sincere; but facts have proved that instead of good, they have, on the whole, done harm; for instead of reducing the pronunciation of words to uniformity, they have, to a considerable extent, unsettled it, and multiplied differences. The whole process of these attempts, from Sheridan's first publication, is within my memory; and I am confident that, whatever has been the effect of these attempts in Great Britain, the result of them, in the United States, has been to multiply greatly the diversities of pronunciation. And such is the present state of the authorities, offered as standards, that it is impossible, from books, to gain a correct knowledge of what is the general usage. If I had no other means of knowing this general usage, than the English books, I should be utterly unable to ascertain it, and should give up the attempt as hopeless.†

Some of the differences of notation, in the several books, may be rather apparent than real; but with all due allowance for this imperfection of the schemes, I am persuaded that there are ten differences among these orthoepists, where there is one in the actual pronunciation of respectable people in England and the United States; and in most of them the notation, if strictly followed, will lead to ten differences of pronunciation, where one only now exists in the actual practice of the two countries.

This effect of multiplying doubts and diversities has resulted from very obvious causes.

1. The limited acquaintance of orthoepists with the general usage, and their taking the pronunciation of London, or some dialect or local practice in that city, for the best usage. The propagation of such a dialectical or peculiar practice would of course disturb the uniformity of any other practice in other parts of England or in this country.

2. The difficulty, or rather impracticability, of representing sounds, and nice distinctions of sound, on paper; especially in unaccented syllables.

3. The partiality of authors for the practice of particular speakers, either stage players or others, which would lead them to denominate that the best practice which had been adopted by their favorites.

4. A spirit of fastidious hypercriticism, which has led writers to make minute distinctions, that are liable to be disputed, and which tend only to perplex the inquirer, and generate uncertainty or diversity, where no essential difference had previously existed in practice. This spirit is continually producing new books and new schemes of orthoepy, and every additional book serves only to increase the difficulty of uniting opinions and establishing uniformity.

This view of the subject is probably the most favorable that can be presented. The real fact seems to be this: these men have taken for the standard what they were pleased to call the best usage, which, in many cases, is a local usage, or some favorite peculiarity of particular speakers, at least if they have had any authority at all; or they have given the pronunciation which

* Walker's Dictionary has been trumpeted, in this country, as the standard of orthoepy in England. This is so far from the truth, that three later compilers of pronouncing dictionaries, living in London, have expressly condemned his pronunciation in whole classes of words.

Walker's notation of a before s, in such words as lass, last, past, giving a the short sound it has in fan, lack, is condemned by Jones, who calls it a mincing, modern affectation. Walker's giving to oo in look, took, and others, the same sound as in tooth, tool, is condemned by the same author. Walker's giving to the short i and y the sound of ee or long e, in such words as glory, probity, which, by his notation, are to be pronounced gloree, probeetee, Jones pronounces to be ludicrous. This error extends to more than eleven thousand syllables.

Walker's change of the sound of d into that of j, in certain classes of words, is condemned by Jameson. He remarks that Walker's adjulation for adulation; compenjeum for compendium; ingrejent for ingredient, if spoken with solemnity, would be intolerable. He condemns, also, Walker's change of tu into tsh, in such words as congratshulation, flatshulent, natshural. This pronunciation, Knowles, a still later compiler, declares to be absolute pedantry and vulgarity.

† The multiplicity of books for instructing us in our vernacular language, is an evil of no small magnitude. Every man has some peculiar notions which he wishes to propagate, and there is scarcely any peculiarity or absurdity for which some authority may not be found. The facility of book-making favors this disposition; and while a chief qualification for authorship is a dextrous use of an inverted pen, and a pair of scissors, we are not to expect relief from the evil.

happened to please their fancy, though not authorized by usage. In this manner they have attempted to bend the common usage to their particular fancies.

It has been in this manner, by presenting to the public local or particular practice, or mere innovation, for a standard, instead of general or national usage, that the authors above mentioned have unsettled the pronunciation of many words, and multiplied diversities of practice. These attempts to obtrude local usage on the public, and bend to it the general or national usage, are the boldest assumptions of authority in language that the history of literature has ever exhibited. In England, however, these pretensions to direct the pronunciation of the nation, have less effect than they have in the United States, for this obvious reason, that in England pronunciation is regulated almost exclusively by the practice of the higher classes of society, and not by books; hence, if books do not exhibit the customary pronunciation, the falsity of notation is easily detected, and the work which offers it is neglected. But in this country, where the people resort chiefly to books for rules of pronunciation, a false notation of sounds operates as a deception, and misleads the inquirer. How long the citizens of this country will submit to these impositions, time only can determine.

The English language, when pronounced according to the genuine composition of its words, is a nervous, masculine language, well adapted to popular eloquence; and it is not improbable that there may be some connection between this manly character of the language and the freedom of the British and American constitutions. They may, perhaps, act and react upon each other mutually, as cause and effect, and each contribute to the preservation of the other. At the same time, the language is by no means incapable of poetical sweetness and melody. The attempts to refine upon the pronunciation, within the last half century, have, in my opinion, added nothing to its smoothness and sweetness, but have very much impaired its strength of expression as well as its regularity. The attempts to banish the Italian sound of a, and to introduce the sound of e before i and u, as in kind, guard, duty, &c., ought to be resisted, as injurious to the manly character of the genuine English pronunciation.*

In order to produce and preserve a tolerable degree of uniformity, and the genuine purity of our language, two things appear to be indispensable, viz.,

1. To reject the practice of noting the sounds of the vowels in the unaccented syllables. Let any man, in genteel society or in public, pronounce the distinct sound of a in the last syllable of important, or the distinct sound of e in the terminations less and ness, as in hopeless, happiness, and he would pass for a most inelegant speaker. Indeed, so different is the slight sound of a great part of the unaccented vowels, in elegant pronunciation, from that which is directed in books of orthoepy, that no man can possibly acquire the nicer distinction of sounds, by means of books; distinctions which no characters yet invented can express. Elegant pronunciation can be learned only by the ear. The French and Italians, whose languages are so popular in Europe, have never attempted to teach the sounds of their letters by a system of notation embracing the finer sounds of the vowels.

2. To preserve purity and uniformity in pronunciation, it is necessary to banish from use all books which change the orthography of words, to adapt the pronunciation to the fashion of the day. The scheme now pursued is the most mischievous project for corrupting the language that human ingenuity ever devised. By removing the landmarks of language, all the fences which can secure the purity and regularity of the language from unlicensed depredations without end are demolished, the chief use and value of alphabetical writing are destroyed, and every thing is given to chance and to caprice.

In determining the pronunciation of words in this work, I have availed myself of the most respectable English authorities, as well as of my own personal observations in both countries, and of the observations of American gentlemen of erudition, who have visited England. In selecting from a mass of contradictory authorities, I may not, in all cases, have adopted the best pronunciation; but I have spared no pains to execute this part of the work with fidelity.

In general, the rules I have prescribed to myself are these. 1. The usage of respectable people in England and the United States, when identical in the two countries, settled and undisputed. This rule comprehends most of the words in the language. 2. When usage is unsettled or uncertain, I have adjusted the pronunciation to the regular, established analogies of the language, as far as these can be definitely ascertained; having, however, in accentuation, some regard to euphony, or the prosaic melody which proceeds from a due succession of accented and unaccented syllables.

There are some words, differently pronounced by respectable people, in which no decisive reasons appear for preferring one mode of pronouncing them to another; either might be adopted, without any injury to melody or analogy. I see no particular reason why pat'ent should have its first vowel short, and ma'tron, pa'tron, and pa'triot, the first vowel long. Much less do I approve the reasons assigned for making the a short in mat'ronal, and not in ma'tronly, or short in pat'ronal, and not in pa'troness. The reasons assigned by Walker appear to me to be absolute trifling. The rule of uniformity is paramount to every other, excepting that of general, undisputed custom; and when the practice is unsettled, it seems to be the duty of the lexicographer to be guided by that rule, for his authority may lead to the uniformity desired.

In a few instances, the common usage of a great and respectable portion of the people of this country accords with the analogies of the language, but not with the modern notation of English orthoepists. In such cases, it seems expedient and proper to retain our own usage. To renounce a practice confessedly regular, for one confessedly anomalous, out of respect to foreign usage, would hardly be consistent with the dignity of lexicography. When we have principle on our side, let us adhere to it. The time can not be distant, when the population of this vast country will throw off their leading-strings, and walk in their own strength; and the more we can raise the credit and authority of principle over the caprices of fashion and innovation, the nearer we approach to uniformity and stability in practice.

It is difficult, if not impracticable, to reconcile the opinions of a nation, in regard to every point, either of orthography or pronunciation. Every attempt that has yet been made in regard to the English language, has served only to increase the difficulty; and as a gentleman remarked to me in London, a convention of learned men could not effect the object, for no two men would think alike on the subject.

The language of a nation is the common property of the people, and no individual has a right to make inroads upon its principles. As it is the medium of communication between men, it is important that the same written words and the same oral sounds to express the same ideas, should be used by the whole nation. When any man, therefore, attempts to change the established orthography or pronunciation, except to correct palpable errors and produce uniformity, by recalling wanderers into the pale of regular analogies, he offers an indignity to the nation. No local practice, however respectable, will justify the attempt. There is great dignity, as well as propriety, in respecting the universal and long-established usages of a nation.

With these views of the subject, I feel myself bound to reject all modern innovations, which violate the established principles and analogies of the language, and destroy or impair the value of alphabetical writing. I have, therefore, endeavored to present to my fellow-citizens the English language in its genuine purity, as we have received the inheritance from our ancestors, without removing a landmark. If the language is fatally destined to be corrupted, I will not be an instrument of the mischief.

ETYMOLOGY.

Irregular as is the orthography of the English language, and unsettled or corrupt as is the pronunciation, there is nothing either in English or in any other language of which I have any knowledge, which exhibits so strikingly the low state of philology, as the etymological deductions of words, or the history of their origin, affinities, and primary signification. To enable the young inquirer to estimate the erudition, correctness, or negligence of writers on this subject, and to awaken more attention to this branch of learning, I will state briefly the results of my researches, and the opinions which I have been compelled to form on the merits of the principal treatises on this subject. And if these opinions or this statement should be charged to egotism, or my overweening confidence in the success of my own investigations, my apology is, that I have suffered so much myself by a misplaced confidence in the erudition of writers; I have so often embraced errors which it has cost me more labor to unlearn than to learn; that if I can prevent my fellow-citizens, who have a taste for this study, from being subjected to the same evils, I shall think the advantage obtained more than a balance for any unmerited imputation.

* The French language, by the loss or imperfect use of articulations, though rendered easy in utterance, has become so feeble in sound as to be unfit for bold, impressive eloquence. From the specimens which I have witnessed in the Chamber of Deputies in Paris, I should suppose the orator must depend almost entirely on his own animation and action for success in popular speaking, with little or no aid from the strength and beauty of language. The language of popular eloquence should be neither the mouthing cant of the stage, nor the mincing affectation of dandies, nor the baby talk of the nursery. Such was not the language of Demosthenes nor of Cicero; and such may never be the language of the British Chatham and of the American Ames.

The first example of etymology which I shall mention is that of Josephus, the historian of the Jews, who informs his readers that the first man "was called Adam, which, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies one that is red, because he was formed out of red earth compounded together; for of that kind is virgin and true earth." Here is a mistake proceeding from a mere resemblance of words; it being certain that Adam no more signifies red earth, than it does red cedar. This mistake is connected with another, that Adam was the proper name of the first man, an individual; whereas the word is the generic name of the human species, and, like man in English, signifies form, shape, image, expressing distinctively the characteristic eminence or distinction of form of the human race. This fact explains the use of the plural pronoun, in the account of the creation of the species. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea," &c. Gen. i. 26. It is evident, also, that the words used in relation to the species, the image, the likeness of God, have reference, not only to their intellectual and moral faculties, but also to their external form; and so the apostle interprets the words, 1 Cor. xi. 7. Not that God has any bodily shape of which man can be the image, but that man has a superior or super-excellent form, corresponding to his intellectual powers, and distinguishing him from all other animals. Now, the mistake of Josephus has infected the Christian world for eighteen hundred years, and the mistake, with erroneous inferences from it, enters into the most recently published systems of theology.

Among the most celebrated authors of antiquity, who have written on the subject of language, is Varro, who has left a treatise De Lingua Latina. On this author's learning, Cicero, Quinctilian, and Augustine have bestowed the most unbounded praises. He is pronounced to have been vir egregius; eruditissimus Romanorum; peritissimus linguæ Latinæ et omnis antiquitatis, sine ulla dubitatione, doctissimus.* He was, doubtless, a man of uncommon erudition for the age in which he lived; and his etymological treatise may be consulted with advantage, by persons who have knowledge enough of this subject to separate the certain or probable from the improbable and conjectural. But it is certain, from what remains of his treatise, that his knowledge of the origin of words did not extend beyond the most obvious facts and principles. Thus he deduces initium from ineo; exitus from exeo; victoria from vinco. All this is well; and we have reason to think him correct, in deducing vellus, fleece, from vellere, to pluck, as, doubtless, fleeces were plucked from sheep, before the use of shears. And we have reason to believe him when he informs us that imber was originally written himber; that hircus was written by the Sabines fircus, and hædus, fedus.

Very different must be our opinion of the following etymologies.

Pater, says Varro, is from patefacio; ager cultus is so called because in it seeds coalesce or unite with the earth; referring ager, perhaps, to the root of agger, or the Greek αγειρω. Campus, he says, was so named because fruits were first gathered from the open field, deducing the word from capio. Next to this were the hills, colles, so named colendo, from colo, because these were cultivated next to the open plain. That land or field which appeared to be the foundation of cattle and money, was called fundus, or it was so called because it pours forth [fundat] annual crops. He deduces cogitare from cogendo; concilium from cogitatione; cura from burning cor, the heart; volo from voluntas, and a volatu, a flying, because the mind flies instantly whither it will. How low must have been the state of philology, when such improbable conjectures as these could attract the encomiums before mentioned from Cicero and Quinctilian!

The reader will find many things in Isidore and Priscian worthy of his attention, though much of what their works contain is now so familiar to scholars of moderate attainments, as scarcely to repay the labor of perusal. But he who learns that Isidore makes oratio, a compound of oris ratio; nomen, a contraction of notamen; and that he derives verbum from verberato aere, will hardly think it worth his labor to pursue his researches into that author's works. Nor will he be disposed to relish Priscian's deduction of litera from legilitera, because a letter affords the means of reading, or from lituro, to obliterate, because the ancients used to write on wax tables, and afterwards to obliterate what they had written.

Vossius wrote a folio on the etymology of Latin words; but from repeated examinations of his book, I am persuaded that most of his deductions are far-fetched, conjectural, and fanciful; many of them are certainly erroneous.

Menage and Minshew I have not consulted; chiefly because from such extracts as I have seen, from their writings, I am certain that little reliance can be placed on their opinions, except in cases too plain to be mistaken.

Junius and Skinner, the authorities for most of the etymologies of Bailey and Johnson, are sufficiently correct in referring English words to the language from which they are immediately derived, especially when the orthography is too plain to be mistaken. They inform us, that father is from the Saxon fæder, that drop is from the Saxon droppan, that picket is from the French piquet, and the like. So Johnson informs us that accent is from the Latin accentus, and accept from the French accepter, Latin accipio. All this is well, but it can hardly be called etymology, or the deduction of words from their originals.

Whiter, in his Etymologicon Magnum, the first volume only of which I have perused, began his work on a good plan, that of bringing together words of the same or of cognate radical letters, and in pursuance of his plan, he has collected many real affinities. But he has destroyed the value of his work by mistaking the radical sense of many words, and by confounding words of different elements.

Jamieson, in his Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language, has collected the affinities of words in that language, particularly words of Gothic and Teutonic origin, with industry, and probably with judgment, and a good degree of accuracy. In some instances, I think, he has departed from correct principles of etymology, and mistaken facts; and he, as well as Whiter, falls very short of truth in a most important particular, a clear understanding of the primary sense of words. Jamieson's Dictionary, however, contains a valuable addition to our stock of etymological materials.†

* Of the full value of these encomiums we can hardly judge, as most of Varro's writings have perished, and some of those which survive appear in a mutilated form. But the greater his erudition, the more striking will appear his ignorance of this subject.

† Thus far had I written, before I had seen this author's Hermes Scythicus. By this work I find the author agrees with me in regard to the identity and common origin of many of the Gothic and Greek prepositions. Indeed, I had supposed that proof of such an obvious fact could hardly be necessary, in the present state of philological knowledge. Some of these prepositions he has illustrated with a good degree of accuracy; although, should this work ever fall into his hands, I think he will be convinced that in one or two important points, his explanations are defective. In regard to other prepositions, I am satisfied the author has ventured upon unsafe ground; at least his opinions appear to me not to be well supported.

In respect to his explanations of the names of the mythological deities, it appears to me the author, like all other authors whose works I have seen, wanders in darkness. From all my researches into the origin of words, I have drawn this conclusion, that the pagan deities are mostly the powers or supposed powers of nature, or imaginary beings supposed to preside over the various parts of creation, or the qualities of men, deified, that is, exalted and celebrated as supernatural agents. There are few of the names of these deities which I pretend to understand; but there are a few of them that seem to be too obvious to be mistaken. No person, I think, can doubt that the Dryads are named from δρυς, an oak or tree. Hence I infer that this name was applied to certain imaginary beings inhabiting the forests.

No person can doubt that Nereus, the deity of the sea, and the nereids, so-nymphs of the sea, are named from the Oriental נהר, נהר, a river, from the corresponding verb, to flow. No person doubts that Flora, the goddess of flowers, is merely a flower deified.

Hence I infer that the true method of discovering the origin of the pagan deities, is to find the meaning of their names.

Now, Diana is the goddess of hunting. What quality, then, is most necessary for a hunter? What quality would rude men, destitute of the weapons which we possess, most value as useful in obtaining subsistence? Doubtless courage and swiftness. Thus we have substantial reasons for believing that Diana is the Celtic dan or dian, which signifies bold, strong, vehement, impetuous, the root of Danube, Don, and other names of large rivers.

If we examine the name of Minerva, we shall find that the first syllable contains the elements of manus, the hand, and of mind; and the last constituent part of the word corresponds well with the German arbeit, D. arbeid, labor, work, the last consonant being lost. Well, what are the characteristics of Minerva? Why, she is the goddess of wisdom and of the arts. The sense of μενος, would give one of her characteristics, and that of manus and arbeit, the other; but which is the true word, I do not know.

To Horne Tooke are we indebted for the first explanation of certain indeclinable words, called conjunctions and prepositions; and for this let him have all merited praise. But his researches were very limited, and he has fallen into most material errors, particularly in his second volume. I have made no use of his writings in this work.

The Hermes of Harris, according to Dr. Lowth, "is the most beautiful and perfect example of analysis that has been exhibited since the days of Aristotle." This, in my opinion, is not the character of the work, which, for the most part, consists of passages from the works of Aristotle, Ammonius, Apollonius, Priscian, and other grammarians. It is little more than a collection of the opinions of the ancient writers on philology, whose metaphysical subtilties rather obscure than illustrate the subject. To show how easily men may be misled by metaphysics, when applied to the plainest subject imaginable, take the following example from the Hermes.

"A respects our primary perception, and denotes individuals as unknown; the respects our secondary perception, and denotes individuals as known." [This is nearly a literal translation of a passage in Priscian, lib. 17.]

To illustrate the truth of this observation, the author gives the following example: "There goes a beggar with a long beard;" indicating that the man had not been seen before; and, therefore, a denotes the primary perception. A week after, the man returns, and I say, "There goes the beggar with the long beard;" the article the here indicating the secondary perception, that is, that the man had been seen before. All this is very well. But let us try the rule by other examples, and see whether it is universal, or whether it is the peculiar and proper office of an or a to denote primary perception.

"The article a," says Harris, "leaves the individual unascertained." Let us examine this position.

"But Peter took him, saying, Stand up; I myself also am a man." Now, according to Harris, a here denotes the primary perception, and the individual is unascertained. That is, this man is one I have never seen before.

"He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Whether a, in this sentence, denotes first perception, I can not determine; but sure I am the individual is not left unascertained.

A. B. says to me, "I have lately dismissed an old servant, who has lived with me for thirty years." Here an may present a primary perception to the hearer, but not so to the speaker. To both, the individual must be well ascertained.

It appears, then, that this definition of an or a is incorrect; and the pains of these metaphysical writers, who form such perfect analyses of language, is little better than learned trifling. On testing the real character of an or a by usage and facts, we find it is merely the adjective one, in its Saxon orthography, and that its sole use is to denote one, whether the individual is known or unknown, definite or indefinite.

Again, Harris translates and adopts the definition which Aristotle has given of a conjunction. "An articulate sound or part of speech devoid of signification by itself, but so formed as to help signification, by making two or more significant sentences to be one significant sentence."

This is so far from being true, that some of the conjunctions are verbs, equivalent to join, unite, or add, in the imperative mode. In like manner, the prepositions called inseparable, and used as prefixes, are all significant per se, although, by custom, they sometimes lose their appropriate use. For example, re, which denotes repetition, has lost its use in recommend, which is equivalent to commend, without the sense of repetition. But still it has ordinarily an appropriate sense, which is perfectly understood, even when first prefixed to a word. Let any person prefix this word to pronounce for the first time, and direct a boy fourteen years old to repronounce his oration, and he would perfectly well understand the direction.

Bryant, the author of "An Analysis of Ancient Mythology," whose works I should love to read, if I could have confidence in his opinions, has given to the public a history of the Cuthites, or descendants of Ham, a race of bold adventurers, who, as he supposes, made expeditions by sea and land, introducing arts, founding cities, and corrupting religion by the propagation of Sabianism. For proof of his opinions, he relies very much on etymology and the signification of names. Two or three examples of his deductions will be sufficient to show his manner of proof. Ham, or Cham, signifying heat and the sun, he deduces from חמם, to be hot, to heat. So far he may be correct. But he goes on to deduce from this root, also, as Castell had done before him, the Greek καυμα, heat, not considering that this is from καιω, to burn, in which m is not radical; but probably s is the radical consonant, as this occurs in the derivatives. Καυμα has no connection with Ham. From Cam, or Cham, he then deduces the Latin camera, Gr. καμαρα, an arched roof or vault, whence our chamber, though it is not easy to discover the connection between this word and heat; and from the same root he deduces Camillus, Camilla, and many other words, without any support for his opinions but a mere similarity of orthography in the first syllable. In all this he is certainly wrong.

The Greek Θεος, God, he supposes, most unwarrantably, to be formed from the Egyptian Theuth, or Thoth, Mercury.

The sun he supposes to have been styled El-uc; El [ἡλιος] and uc or och, a title of honor among the Babylonians. This word, says Bryant, the Greeks changed into λυκος, [a wolf,] and hence the Latin lux, luceo. A strange conjecture this, not to call it by a harsher name. Now, if Bryant had examined the Teutonic dialects, and the Welsh, he would have seen his mistake; for the Saxon leoht, liht, Dutch and German licht, are from the common root of the Welsh llug, a shooting or gleaming, lluciaw, to throw, lluc, a darting or flashing, the root of luceo; a simple root, that can have no connection with El-uc.

Excepting Faber's work on the Cabiri, I have seen scarcely a book in any language, which exhibits so little etymological knowledge, with such a series of erroneous or fanciful deductions, as Bryant's Analysis. Drummond's Origines abounds with etymological deductions of a similar character.

Gebelin, a French writer, in his Monde Primitif, has bestowed much labor in developing the origin and signification of words; but a large part of his labor has produced no valuable effect. His whole system is founded on a mistake, that the noun is the root of all other words.

Of all the writers on etymology, whose works I have read or consulted, Spelman and Lluyd are almost the only ones in whose deductions much confidence can be placed. I do not name Camden, Hickes, Selden, and Gibson, as their etymological inquiries, though generally judiciously conducted, were very limited. This is true, also, in some degree, of Spelman and Lluyd; but the researches of Spelman into the origin of law terms, and words of the middle ages, have generally produced very satisfactory results. From the limited nature of the designs of Spelman and Lluyd, errors may have occasionally escaped them; but they are few, and very pardonable.

I know of no work in any language, in which words have been generally traced to their original signification, with even tolerable correctness. In a few instances, this signification is too obvious to be mistaken; but in most instances, the ablest etymologist is liable to be misled by first appearances, and the want of extensive investigation. I have been often misled myself, by these means, and have been obliged to change my opinions, as I have advanced in my inquiries. Hence the tendency of my researches has been very much to increase my caution in referring words to their originals; and such, I am persuaded, will be the result of all critical and judicious investigations into the history and affinities of language.

A principal source of mistakes on this subject is a disregard of the identity of the radical consonants, and a licentious blending and confounding of words, whose elementary letters are not commutable. Another source of error is an unwarrantable license in prefixing or inserting letters, for the purpose of producing an identity or resemblance of orthography; a fault very justly opposed by Sir William Jones.

The learned Dr. Good, in his Book of Nature, Lecture IX. of the second series, suggests it to be probable that both papa and father issued from the Hebrew source אב, אבא, אבת. He then

The two circumstances which chiefly distinguish Hercules, are his labors and his club. We never hear of Hercules but with these accompaniments. Now, the first syllable of his name is precisely the root of the Greek εργον, εργαω, that is, εογ or εργ, which would give the sense of work, labor. Whether the last constituent of the name is κλεος, or from that root, I shall not pretend to affirm: Indeed, I offer these explanations rather as probable, than as clearly proved; but they do appear to be probably well founded. Hercules, then, was a name given to any bold, heroic leader of a tribe of rude men, who was distinguished for his achievements as a warrior; and this name must have originated in very early ages, when clubs were the principal weapons of war, and instruments of defense. And hence, probably, the origin of the scepter, as a badge of royalty. Now, it is worthy of remark, that the war club of rude nations, at this day, especially of the savage nations of the South Sea Isles, is of the same shape as the ancient scepter fearlessly ventures to affirm, that there is scarcely a language or dialect in the world, polished or barbarous, in which the same idea is not expressed by the radical of one or the other of these terms. True, the letter א is found in most words of this signification; although our knowledge of languages is too limited to warrant such a broad assertion. But the attempt to deduce all words signifying father from the Hebrew, must certainly fail; for we know from history, that a great part of Asia and of Europe was inhabited before the existence of the Hebrew nation. Besides, a large portion of the European population have no word for father, which can be rationally deduced from אב. The Welsh tâd, whence our daddy, the Gothic atta, Irish aithair, Basque aita, and Laponnic atki, can not be formed from the Hebrew word, the letter d and t not being commutable with b. One would suppose that a learned physiologist could not fail to assign the true cause of the similarity of words bearing the sense of father and mother, among the nations of the earth. The truth is, the sound of a is very easy, and probably the easiest for children, being formed by simply opening the mouth, without any exertion of the organs to modulate the sound. So, also, the articulations b, m, and d or t, being natural and easy, will generally enter into the first words formed by children. The labials are formed by simply closing the lips, and the dentals, by placing the tongue against the root of the upper teeth; the position which it naturally occupies in a healthy child. From these circumstances, we may fairly infer, a priori, that such words as ab, aba, papa, tad, mamma, must be the first words uttered by children. Indeed, were the whole human race to lose their present names for father, mother, and nurse, similar names would be formed by a great portion of mankind, without any communication between different nations.

The author further observes, that the generic terms for the Deity are chiefly the three following — Al or Allah, Theus or Deus, and God. "Besides these, there is scarcely a term of any kind, by which the Deity is designated, in any part of the world, whether among civilized or savage men. Yet these proceed from the same common quarter of the globe." True; men, and of course words, all came from a common quarter of the globe. But it so happens, that these three terms must have originated among different families, or from different sources, for they are all formed with different radicals, and can have had no connection with a common radix. But it happens, also, that not one of these terms, as far as I can learn, exists among the Slavonic nations, who compose a large portion of all the population of Europe, and whose name of God is Bog, a word radically distinct from all which the author has mentioned.

The author proceeds to say, "that the more common etymon for death, among all nations, is mor, mort, or mut." But if either of these terms for death is a native word among the great Gothic, Teutonic, and Slavonic families, which constitute the half or two thirds of all the inhabitants of Europe, I have not been able to find it. Besides, mor and mut are words radically distinct, and thus originated in different families.

"Sir," says the author, "is, in our language, the common title of respect; and the same term is employed in the same sense throughout every quarter of the globe. In the Sanscrit and Persian, it means the organ of the head itself." He finds the word in Arabia, Turkey, in Greek, among the Peruvians in South America, in Germany, Holland, and the contiguous countries. In some of the languages of these countries I have found no such word; but if it exists, the author's inference, that the name of the head gave rise to this term of respect, (for this is what I understand him to mean,) is totally unfounded; and equally fanciful and unfounded is his supposition, that, by the loss of h from sher, the pronoun her, and the German herr, lord, are to be deduced from sir. In all this it is demonstrably certain there is no truth or even semblance of reality.

Man the author deduces from the Hebrew מנה, to discern or discriminate, a sense I do not find in the Lexicons; and hence he infers that the radical idea of man is that of a thinking or a reasonable being. With this word he connects Menu, Menes, Minos, and μενος, mens, mind; a sweeping inference, made at random, from a similarity of orthography, without a distant conception of the true primary meaning of either of these words. But what is worse, he appears, if I do not mistake his meaning, to connect with these words the tane, tanato, or tangi, of the Sandwich Isles; words which are formed with a radical initial consonant, not convertible with m, and most certainly unconnected with man. See the words FATHER, MAN, and SIR, in the Dictionary.

The author offers some other etymologies and affinities equally remote from truth, and even from probability.

The governing principles of etymology are, first, the identity of radical letters, or a coincidence of cognates, in different languages; no affinity being admissible, except among words whose primary consonants are articulations of the same organs, as B, F, M, P, V, and W; or as D, T, Th, and S; or as G, C close, K, and Q; R, L, and D. Some exceptions to this rule must be admitted, but not without collateral evidence of the change, or some evidence that is too clear to be reasonably rejected.

Second. Words in different languages are not to be considered as proceeding from the same radix, unless they have the same signification, or one closely allied to it, or naturally deducible from it. And on this point, much knowledge of the primary sense of words, and of the manner in which collateral senses have sprung from one radical idea, is necessary to secure the inquirer from mistakes. A competent knowledge of this branch of etymology can not be obtained from any one, or from two or three languages. It is almost literally true, that, in examining more than twenty languages, I have found each language to throw some light on every other.

That the reader may have more clear and distinct ideas of what is intended by commutable letters, and the principles by which etymological deductions are to be regulated, it may be remarked that commutable or interchangeable letters are letters of the same organs; that is, letters or articulations formed by the same parts of the mouth. Thus, b, m, and p, are formed immediately by the lips, the position of which is slightly varied to make the distinction between these letters. F and v are formed by the lips, but with the aid of the upper teeth. Now, the difference of the jointings of the organs to utter these letters is so small, that it is easy for men, in utterance, to slide from one form into another.

The following examples will illustrate this subject.

Labial Letters commuted for other Labials.

English bear, Lat. fero, pario, G. φερω, φορεω, D. voeren, G. führen.

Here is the same word written in different languages, with five different initial letters.

German wahr, true, L. verus.
Celtic lamh, lav, the hand, Goth. lofa.
L. guberno, Fr. gouverner, Eng. govern.

Dental Letters commuted for other Dentals.

Eng. dew, G. thau.
Eng. good, G. gut.
Eng. dare, Gr. θαρρεω.
Eng. day, G. tag.
Eng. thank, D. danken.
Eng. brother, D. broeder.

Palatal Letters commuted for other Palatals.

Eng. call, W. galw, Gr. καλεω.
Eng. get, It. cattare.
Greek χειμα, L. hiems, winter.

Dentals converted into Sibilants

Eng. water, G. wasser.
Lat. dens, a tooth, G. zahn
Eng. let, Fr. laisser.
Ch. כות, Heb. כוש.
Sax. tid, time, G. zeit.

Change of Linguals.

Eng. escort, Sp. and Port. escolta.
Fr. blanc, white, Port. branco.

Change of F into H.

Sp. habla for Lat. fabula; haz for facies, face; hacer for facio.

It is believed that n and s are sometimes convertible; as in Latin pono, posui, and also r and s, as in English iron, German isen.

Letters formed by different organs are not commutable; hence we are not to admit a radical word beginning or ending with b, f, or v, to be the same as a word beginning or ending with g, d, t, r, or s; nor a word whose radical letters are m, n, to be the same as one whose elements are r, d, or s, t. If such words are in any case the same, they must have suffered some anomalous changes; changes which are very unusual, and which are never to be admitted without the clearest evidence.

When this work was in the press, I first obtained a sight of a "History of the European Languages," by the late Dr. Alexander Murray, professor of Oriental languages in the University of Edinburgh.

From a hasty perusal of the first volume, I find this learned professor studied the European languages with much attention and profit. He has gone further into the origin and formation of languages, than any author whose works I have read; and his writings unfold many valuable principles and facts. But he formed a theory which he attempted to support, in my opinion, with little success; at least, on his principles, all the usual rules of etymology are transgressed, and all distinction between words of different radical letters is abandoned. According to his theory, nine words are the foundations of language, viz., ag, wag, hwag, bag, or bwag, [of which fag and pag are softer varieties,] dwag, thwag, or twag, gwag, or cwag, lag, and hlag, mag, nag, and hnag, rag, and hrag, swag. "By the help of these nine words and their compounds, all the European languages have been formed." These are the author's words.

To make out his scheme, he joins ag, having, to wag, move, and forms a diminutive, wagag, to move a little or often. With ba, bear or bring, and la, hold, wagaba signifies, literally, move-bearing, and wagla is move-having. Then wagaba contracted into wabba, to wave, to weave, and wagla into wala, to turn. From dag, to wet, bedew, comes damp; from ceag, to chew, comes champ; fal, joined, wrought together, from fag, to work, to join; hwal and hal, to hold, and turn, from hwag; bat from bagd or bagt; bigt, a bite, from bigt; bladder from blag; modera, mother, the producer, from magd, produced; bottom from bogd, a stump, root, or foundation; field from fagd; earth, from airtha, acertha, from acer, aker, ager; field, an uncultivated plain, from fag, to make to fall.

It seems that, in order to maintain his theory, it was necessary to make it appear that g formed a part of all original words, and that this letter has, in modern words, been dropped. The author then introduces this letter into words where it never had any place, such as field, earth, bat, &c. The author's work presents one of the most singular medleys of truth and error, of sound observation and visionary opinions, that has ever fallen under my notice.

On the same principles he must have inserted the letter g in bear, fero, pario, ברא; in bend, found, tame, δαμαω, domo; in dream, wander, turn, &c.; and supposed them to have been originally beager, fegro, pagrio, בגרא, begnd, fougnd, tagme, δαγμαω, dogmo, dreagm, wagnder, tugrn, &c.

Now, on such a principle as this, we might deduce any word in the language from any other word, or from any root that could be imagined. In short, all such theories are the produce of wild conjecture, and they serve no purpose but to confound the student, and bring the study of etymology into contempt.

ACCENTUATION.

Accent is the more forcible utterance of a particular syllable of a word, by which it is distinguished from the others. The accented syllable of a word serves, therefore, as a kind of resting-place or support of the voice, which passes over the unaccented syllables with more rapidity and a less distinct utterance.

Accent is of two kinds, or rather of two degrees of force — primary and secondary. Words of one syllable can have no accent. Words of two syllables have the primary accent only. Words of three and four syllables may have the primary and secondary accent; but many of them have no secondary accent that deserves notice; such are dignity, enemy, annuity, fidelity. In words of four, five, or more syllables, a secondary accent is often essential to a clear, distinct articulation of the several syllables. Thus heterogeneous can not be well uttered without two accented syllables; the fourth syllable receiving the principal stress of the voice, and the first clearly distinguished by more forcible utterance than the second, third, fifth, and sixth.

The accent of most English words has been long established; and, evidently, it has been determined by the natural ease of speaking, without the aid of rules or instruction. If any man should ask, why we lay the accent of such words as elocution, meditation, relation, congratulation, on the last syllable except one, the answer is, that such accentuation renders the pronunciation more easy to the organs of speech, and more agreeable to the ear, than the accentuation of any other syllable. The ease of speaking, and a kind of prosaic melody, resulting from a due proportion of accented and unaccented syllables, which enables the speaker to bound with ease from one accented syllable to another, without omitting those which are unaccented, are the two great principles by which the accentuation of words has been regulated. And it is to be extremely regretted that these principles should, in any instances, be neglected, or forced to yield to arbitrary reasons of derivation, or to a pedantic affectation of foreign pronunciation. When we know that the great mass of a nation naturally fall into a particular manner of pronouncing a word, without any rule or instruction, we may rely upon this tendency as a pretty certain indication that their accentuation is according to the analogies of the language, by which their habits of speaking have been formed; and this tendency can not be opposed without doing violence to those analogies and to national habits.

Thus, formerly, the word horizon was universally accented on the first syllable, and this accentuation was according to the settled analogy of the language. But the early poets had a fancy for conforming the English to the Greek pronunciation, and accented the second syllable; the orthoepists followed them; and now we have this forced, unnatural pronunciation of the learned, in collision with the regular, analogous, popular pronunciation. By this affectation of the Greek accent, the flowing smoothness of the word is entirely lost.

In like manner, an imitation of the French pronunciation of confesseur and successeur led the early poets to accent the English words on the first syllable, in violation of analogy and euphony; and some orthoepists affect to follow them; but public usage frowns on this affectation. and rejects their authority.

There are many words in the English language, indeed a large part of the whole number, which can not be reduced under any general rule of accentuation, as the exceptions to any rule formed will be nearly as numerous as the words which the rule embraces. And, in most instances, we shall find in the structure of the words satisfactory reasons for the difference of pronunciation.

DISSYLLABLES.

No general rule can be given for the accentuation of words of two syllables. It is, however, worth observing, that when the same word is both a noun, or an adjective, and a verb, it happens, in many instances, that the noun or adjective has the accent on the first syllable, and the verb on the last; instances of which we have in ab'sent, to absent'; con'cert, to concert'; ex'port, to expórt. The reason is, the preterit and participles of the verbs require to have the same syllable accented as the verb; but if the first syllable of the preterit and participles were to be accented, it would be difficult to pronounce the words, as may be perceived by attempting to pronounce ab'senting, con'certed, con'ducted, with the accent on the first syllable.

In a few instances, the word has a different accent when a noun, from that which it has when an adjective; as Au'gust, august'; gallant', gal'lant.

TRISYLLABLES.

Words of three syllables, derived from dissyllables, usually retain the accent of their primitives. Thus,

Póet, póetess; pleas'ant, pleas'antly; grácious, grácіously; reláte, relâted; poli'te, poli'test.

In like manner, words of four syllables, formed from dissyllables, generally retain the accent of the primitives; as in collect' ible, from collect', ser'viceable, from ser'vice.

In all cases, the preterit and participles of verbs retain the accent of the verbs.

Words ending in tion, sion, tian, cious, tious, cial, cian, tial, tiate, tient, cient, have the accent on the syllable preceding that termination; as, motion, Christian, precious, erudition, patient, &c.

Words of more than two syllables, ending in ty, have, for the most part, the accent on the antepenult; as, gratuity, propriety, prosperity, insensibility.

Trisyllables ending in ment, for the most part, have the accent on the first syllable; as, compliment, detriment; but to this rule there are many exceptions, and particularly nouns formed from verbs; as, amendment, commandment.

Words with the following terminations, have the accent on the last syllable except two, or antepenult: — —fluous; as, super'fluous, melli'fluous.

—ferous; as, bacci'ferous, argenti'ferous.
—fluent; as, circum'fluent.
—cracy; as, democ'racy, theoc'racy.
—gonal; as, diag'onal, hexag'onal.
—gony; as, cosmog'ony, theog'ony.
—machy; as, logom'achy, theom'achy.
—loquy; as, ob'loquy, ventril'oquy.
—mathy; as, polym'athy.
—meter; as, barom'eter, hygrom'eter.
—nomy; as, econ'omy, astron'omy.
—ogy; as, philol'ogy, cosmol'ogy.
—pathy; as, ap'athy, antip'athy.
—phony; as, eu'phony, sym'phony.
—parous; as, ovip'arous, vivip'arous.
—scopy; as, deuteros'copy, aeros'copy.
—strophe; as, apos'trophe, catas'trophe.
—vomous; as, igniv'omous.
—vorous; as, carniv'orous, graminiv'orous.
—tomy; as, anat'omy, lithot'omy.
—raphy; as, geog'raphy, orthog'raphy.

Compound words, as book-case, ink-stand, pen-knife, note-book, usually have a slight accent, that is, one syllable is distinguished by some stress of voice; but as the other syllable is significant by itself, it is uttered with more distinctness than the syllables of other words which are wholly unaccented. And in some words there are two accents, one on each component part of the word, which are barely distinguishable. Thus, in legislative, legislator, legislature, the accent on the first syllable can hardly be distinguished from that on the third; and if a speaker were to lay the primary accent on the third syllable, his pronunciation would hardly be noticed as a singularity. Indeed, there are some compound words, in which there is so little distinction of accent, that it is deemed unnecessary to mark either syllable or part of the word as accented.

As to a great part of English words, their accent must be learned from dictionaries, elementary books, or practice. There is no method of classification, by which they can be brought under a few simple general rules, to be easily retained by the memory; and attempts to effect this object must only burden the memory, and perplex the learner.

The differences in the accentuation of words, either in books or in usage, are not very numerous. In this respect, the language is tolerably well settled, except in a few words. Among these are acceptable, commendable, confessor, successor, receptacle, receptory, deceptory, refragable, dyspepsy, which the orthoepists incline to accent on the first syllable. But with regard to most of these words, this accentuation is contrary to common usage, and with regard to all of them, it ought to be rejected. The ease of pronunciation requires the accent to be on the second syllable, and no effort to remove it can ever succeed.

The words accessory, desultory, exemplary, and peremptory, would all have the accent on the second syllable, were it not very difficult, with this accent, to articulate the three last syllables of the derivatives, accessorily, desultorily, exemplarily, peremptorily. It is for this reason that the primary accent is laid on the first syllable, and then a secondary accent on the third enables the speaker to articulate distinctly, and with tolerable ease, the last syllables. If the primary accent is laid on the second syllable, there can be no secondary accent. Yet the natural accent of the primitives being on the second syllable of the three first, and the derivatives little used, we find good speakers often lay the accent on the second syllable; nor is it easy to change the practice.

This circumstance of regarding the pronunciation of derivative words, in settling the accent, has been either wholly overlooked, or not sufficiently observed in practice. Hence the orthoepists accent the second syllable of the verbs alternate, demonstrate, contemplate, compensate, confiscate, expurgate. Notwithstanding all authorities, however, such is the tendency to consult ease and melody in utterance, that many respectable speakers lay the accent of these and similar words on the first syllable. The reason of this is obvious, although, perhaps, it never occurs to the speakers themselves. It is, that when the accent is laid on the second syllable, the two last syllables of the participles altern'ating, demon'strating, compen'sated, &c., are either pronounced with difficulty, being wholly unaccented, or they are disgustingly feeble. How very difficult it is to utter distinctly the words alternating, demonstrating, &c., with the accent on the second syllable; the organs being compelled to change their position, and form three, four, five, or six articulations in an instant, to utter the two last syllables! But place the primary accent on the first syllable, and a secondary one on the third, and the voice resting on these, the speaker is enabled to bound with ease from syllable to syllable, and utter the whole word distinctly, without effort — al'ternating, dem onstrating.

In compensate and confiscate, the accent on the second syllable leaves the last syllable of the participle most miserably weak. What a feeble line is this of Pope! —

Each seeming ill, compen'sated of course.

This evil is remedied by placing the primary accent on the first syllable, and a secondary one on the third; com'pensated; com'pensating; con'fiscating; con'fiscated; the full sound of a giving due strength to the last syllables.

It is further to be observed that there are some words which, in poetry and prose, must be differently accented, as the accent has been transferred by usage from one syllable to another within the two last centuries. Nares enumerates more than a hundred words, whose accent has been thus changed since the age of Shakspeare. Of this class of words are aspect, process, sojourn, convex, contest, retinue, converse, the noun horizon, which Milton accents on the second syllable, and acceptable, which he accents on the first, as he does attribute and contribute. But the accent of all these words has been changed; the seven first have the accent indisputably on the first syllable; the two last, on the second syllable; and although some difference of opinion may exist as to the accentuation of horizon and acceptable, yet the practice of accenting horizon on the first, and acceptable on the second, is according to regular analogies. [In respect to horizon, however, this is not here insisted on, as later usage is against accenting the first syllable.]

OF JOHNSON'S DICTIONARY,

AND OF THE MANNER IN WHICH THE FOLLOWING WORK IS EXECUTED.

Dr. Johnson was one of the greatest men that the English nation has ever produced; and when the exhibition of truth depended on his own gigantic powers of intellect, he seldom erred. But in the compilation of his Dictionary, he manifested a great defect of research, by means of which he often fell into mistakes; and no errors are so dangerous as those of great men. The authority created by the general excellence of their works, gives a sanction to their very mistakes, and represses that spirit of inquiry which would investigate the truth, and subvert the errors of inferior men. It seems to be owing to this cause, chiefly, that the most obvious mistakes of Johnson's Dictionary have remained to this day uncorrected, and still continue to disfigure the improved editions of the work recently published.

In like manner, the opinions of this author, when wrong, have a weight of authority that renders them extremely mischievous. The sentiment contained in this single line,

Quid te exempta juvat spinis de pluribus una?

is of this kind; that we are to make no corrections, because we can not complete the reformation — a sentiment that sets itself in direct opposition to all improvement in science, literature, and morals; a sentiment, which, if it had been always an efficacious principle of human conduct, would have condemned, not only our language, but our manners and our knowledge, to everlasting rudeness. And hence, whenever a proposition is made to correct the orthography of our language, it is instantly repelled with the opinion and ipse dixit of Johnson. Thus, while the nations on the European continent have purified their languages, and reduced the orthography to a good degree of regularity, our enemies of reform contend most strenuously for retaining the anomalies of the language, even to the very rags and tatters of barbarism. But, what is more extraordinary, the very persons who thus struggle against the smallest improvement of the orthography, are the most ready to innovate in the pronunciation, and will, at any time, adopt a change that fashion may introduce, though it may infringe the regularity of the language, multiply anomalies, and increase the difficulty of learning it. Nay, they will not only innovate themselves, but will use their influence to propagate the change, by deriding those who resist it, and who strive to retain the resemblance between the written and spoken language.

A considerable part of Johnson's Dictionary is, however, well executed; and when his definitions are correct, and his arrangement judicious, it seems to be expedient to follow him. It would be mere affectation or folly to alter what can not be improved.

The principal faults in Johnson's Dictionary are,

1. The want of a great number of well-authorized words belonging to the language. This defect has been, in part, supplied by Mason, but his supplemental list is still imperfect, even in common words, and still more defective from the omission of terms of science.

2. Another great fault, that remains uncorrected, is the manner of noting the accented syllable; the accent being laid uniformly on the vowel, whether it closes the syllable or not. Thus the accent is laid on e in te'nant as well as in te'acher, and the inquirer can not know from the accent, whether the vowel is long or short. It is surprising that such a notation should still be retained in that work.

3. It is considered as a material fault, that, in some classes of words, Johnson's orthography is either not correct upon principle, or not uniform in the class. Thus he writes heedlessly, with ss, but carelesly, with one s; defence, with c, but defensible, defensive, with s; rigour, inferiour, with u, but rigorous, inferiority, without it; publick, authentick, with k, but publication, authenticate, without it; and so of many other words of the same classes.

4. The omission of the participles, or most of them, is no small defect, as many of them, by use, have become proper adjectives, and require distinct definitions. The additions of this kind in this work are very numerous. It is also useful, both to natives and foreigners, to be able, by opening a dictionary, to know when the final consonant of a verb is doubled in the participle.

5. The want of due discrimination in the definitions of words that are nearly synonymous, or sometimes really synonymous, at other times not, is a fault in all the dictionaries of our language which I have seen. Permeate, says Johnson, signifies to pass through; and Permeable, such as may be passed through. But we pass through a door or gate; although we do not permeate it, or say that it is permeable. Obedience, says Johnson, is obsequiousness; but this is rarely the present sense of the word; so far from it, that obedience is always honorable, and obsequiousness usually implies meanness. Peculation, says Johnson, is robbery of the public, theft of public money. But as robbery and theft are now understood, it is neither. Inaccuracies of this kind are very numerous.

6. There are in Johnson's Dictionary some palpable mistakes in orthography, such as comptroller, redoubt, and some others, there being no such legitimate words in the language. In other instances, the author mistook the true origin of words, and has erred in the orthography, as in chymistry and diocess.

7. The mistakes in etymology are numerous; and the whole scheme of deducing words from their original is extremely imperfect.

8. The manner of defining words in Johnson, as in all other dictionaries, is susceptible of improvement. In a great part of the more important words, and particularly verbs, lexicographers, either from negligence or want of knowledge, have inverted the true order, or have disregarded all order, in the definitions. There is a primary sense of every word, from which all the other have proceeded; and whenever this can be discovered, this sense should stand first in order. Thus the primary sense of make is to force or compel; but this in Johnson's Dictionary is the fifteenth definition; and this sense of facio in Ainsworth, the nineteenth.

9. One of the most objectionable parts of Johnson's Dictionary, in my opinion, is the great number of passages cited from authors, to exemplify his definitions. Most English words are so familiarly and perfectly understood, and the sense of them so little liable to be called in question, that they may be safely left to rest on the authority of the lexicographer, without examples. Who needs extracts from three authors, Knolles, Milton, and Berkeley, to prove or illustrate the literal meaning of hand? Who needs extracts from Shakspeare, Bacon, South, and Dryden, to prove hammer to be a legitimate English word, and to signify an instrument for driving nails? So, under household, we find seven passages and nearly thirty lines employed to exemplify the plain interpretation, a family living together.

In most cases, one example is sufficient to illustrate the meaning of a word; and this is not absolutely necessary, except in cases where the signification is a deviation from the plain, literal sense, a particular application of the term; or in a case where the sense of the word may be doubtful and of questionable authority. Numerous citations serve to swell the size of a Dictionary, without any adequate advantage. But this is not the only objection to Johnson's exemplifications. Many of the passages are taken from authors now little read, or not at all; whose style is now antiquated, and by no means furnishing proper models for students of the present age.

In the execution of this work, I have pursued a course somewhat different; not, however, without fortifying my own opinion with that of other gentlemen, in whose judgment I have confidence. In many cases, where the sense of a word is plain and indisputable, I have omitted to cite any authority. I have done the same in many instances, where the sense of a word is wholly obsolete, and the definition useful only to the antiquary. In some instances, definitions are given without authority, merely because I had neglected to note the author, or had lost the reference. In such cases, I must stand responsible for the correctness of the definition. In all such cases, however, I have endeavored to be faithful to the duty of a lexicographer; and if, in any instance, a mistake has escaped me, I shall be happy to have it suggested, that it may be corrected.

In general, I have illustrated the significations of words, and proved them to be legitimate, by a short passage from some respectable author, often abridged from the whole passage cited by Johnson. In many cases, I have given brief sentences of my own; using the phrases or sentences in which the word most frequently occurs, and often presenting some important maxim or sentiment in religion, morality, law, or civil policy. Under words which occur in the Scriptures, I have often cited passages from our common version, not only to illustrate the scriptural or theological sense, but even the ordinary significations of the words. These passages are short, plain, appropriate, and familiar to most readers. In a few cases, where the sense of a word is disputed, I have departed from the general plan, and cited a number of authorities.

In the admission of words of recent origin into a Dictionary, a lexicographer has to encounter many difficulties; as it is not easy, in all cases, to determine whether a word is so far authorized as to be considered legitimate. Some writers indulge a licentiousness in coining words, which good sense would wish to repress. At the same time, it would not be judicious to reject all new terms, as these are often necessary to express new ideas; and the progress of improvement in arts and science would be retarded by denying a place in dictionaries to terms given to things newly discovered. But the lexicographer is not answerable for the bad use of the privilege of coining new words. It seems to be his duty to insert and explain all words which are used by respectable writers or speakers, whether the words are destined to be received into general and permanent use or not. The future use must depend on public taste, or the utility of the words — circumstances which are not within the lexicographer's control.

Lexicographers are sometimes censured for inserting in their vocabularies vulgar words, and terms of art, known only to particular artisans. That this practice may be carried too far, is admitted; but it is to be remarked that, in general, vulgar words are the oldest and best authorized words in language; and their use is as necessary to the classes of people who use them, as elegant words are to the statesman and the poet. It may be added, that such words are often particularly useful to the lexicographer, in furnishing him with the primary sense, which is no where to be found but in popular use. In this work I have not gone quite so far as Johnson has done, in admitting vulgar words. Some of them are too low to deserve notice.

The catalogue of obsolete words in Johnson has been considerably augmented by Mason. I have, though somewhat reluctantly, inserted nearly the whole catalogue, which, I presume, amounts to seven or eight, and perhaps to ten thousand words. Most of these may be useful to the antiquary; but to the great mass of readers they are useless.*

* There is, among some poets of the present day, an affectation of reviving the use of obsolete words. Some of these may, perhaps, be revived to advantage; but when this practice proceeds so far as to make a glossary necessary to the understanding of a poem, it seems to be a violation of good taste. How different is the simple elegance of Dryden, Pope, Gray, Goldsmith, and Cowper!

I have also inserted many words which are local in England; being retained from the different languages that have been spoken in that country, but which are no more a part of our present language in the United States, than so many Lapland words. These, however, occur in books which treat of agriculture and the arts — books which are occasionally read in this country.

Law terms, which are no part of the proper language of the United States, and never can be, as the things they express do not exist in this country, are, however, retained, as it is necessary that the gentlemen of the bar should understand them; and it will be time to dismiss them from books when they are obsolete in practice.

As to Americanisms, so called, I have not been able to find many words, in respectable use, which can be so denominated. These I have admitted and noted as peculiar to this country. I have fully ascertained that most of the new words charged to the coinage of this country, were first used in England.

In exhibiting the origin and affinities of English words, I have usually placed first in order the corresponding word, in the language from or through which we have received it; then the corresponding words in the languages of the same family or race; then the corresponding word in the languages of other families. Thus, for example, the word break we have from our Saxon ancestors; I therefore give the Saxon word first; then the same word in the other Teutonic and Gothic languages; then the Celtic words; then the Latin; and, lastly, the Hebrew, Chaldaic, and Arabic. This order is not followed in every instance, even of vernacular words, but it is the more general course I have pursued. When there can be no rational doubt respecting the radical identity of words, I have inserted them without any expression of uncertainty. When there appears to be any reason to question that identity, I have mentioned the probability only of an affinity, or inserted a query, to invite further investigation. Yet I am aware that many things, which in my view are not doubtful, will appear so to persons not versed in this subject, and who do not at once see the chain of evidence which has led me to my inferences. For this there is no remedy but further investigation.

In regard to words which have been introduced into the language in modern days, I have generally referred them to the language from which the English immediately received them. A great part of these are from the Latin, through the French; sometimes, probably, through the Italian or Spanish. In some instances, however, the order is reversed; indeed, it can not always be known from which language the words have been received, nor is it a matter of any consequence.

One circumstance, however, deserves to be particularly noticed— that when I refer a vernacular word to the corresponding word in one of the Shemitic languages, I would not have it understood that the English word was derived or borrowed from that Oriental word. For example, I have given the Shemitic פרק as the verb corresponding with the English break, that is, the same word in those languages; not intending by this that our ancestors borrowed or received that word from the Chaldeans, Hebrews, or other Shemitic nation. This is not the fact. It would be just as correct for the compiler of a Chaldee or Hebrew Lexicon to derive פרק from the English break or German brechen. So when I deduce coin, through the French, Spanish, or Italian, from the Arabic, قَانٌ, I do not consider the word as borrowed from the Arabic, but as proceeding from a common radix. With regard to vernacular words, in any European language, such deduction is always incorrect. Yet errors of this kind abound in every book I have seen, which treats of this subject. The truth is, all vernacular words in the languages of Europe are as old as the same words in Asia; and when the same words are found in the Shemitic and Japhetic languages, it is almost demonstrably certain that these words were in use before the dispersion; the nations of both families have them from the common stock, and the words, like the families of men which used them, are to be considered as of the same antiquity.

When, therefore, I state the words of another language as corresponding with vernacular words in the English, they are offered as affinities, or the same word varied dialectically, perhaps, in orthography or signification, but words from the same root as the English. Thus, under the word bright, I state the Saxon word, and then the corresponding word in the Ethiopic, the participle of a verb; not that our ancestors borrowed the word from the Ethiopians, but that the verb from which bright was derived, though lost in the Saxon, is still retained in the Ethiopic. This fact proves that the ancestors of the Saxons once used the verb, but suffered it to go into disuse, substituting shine, scinan, in its place.

It is much to be regretted that British authors and travelers admit into their writings foreign words, without conforming them, in orthography, to regular English analogies. It is owing to this disregard of the purity and regular form of orthography in English, that we are perplexed with such words as burlesque, soup, group, tour, corps, depot, suite, pacha, ennui, and many others. In this respect, modern writers manifest less taste than the writers of former centuries, who, when they borrowed foreign words wrote them in conformity to English analogies. This practice of blending with the English many words of an orthography which in our language is anomalous, is very embarrassing to readers who know only their vernacular tongue, and often introduces an odious difference between the pronunciation of different classes of people — an evil more sensibly felt in this country than in Great Britain, where differences of rank exist; in short, it multiplies the irregularities of a language, already so deformed by them as to render it nearly impracticable for our own citizens ever to overcome the difficulties of its orthography — irregularities which foreigners deem a reproach to the taste of a literary nation.

Where is the good sense which should dictate a manly firmness in preserving the regular analogies and purity of the language? Where is there a due attachment to UNIFORMITY, which constitutes the principal beauty and excellence of a language, and, beyond all other means, facilitates its acquisition? I would not refuse to admit foreign words into the language, if necessary or useful; but I would treat them as our laws treat aliens; I would compel them to submit to the formalities of naturalization, before they should be admitted to the rights of citizenship; I would convert them into English words, or reject them. Nor would I permit the same word to be written and pronounced in two different ways, one English, the other French. The French suite in English is suit, whether it signifies a set of clothes, or of apartments, or of armor, or of attendants.

In the orthography of certain classes of words I have aimed at uniformity; but I have not proceeded so far in this desirable reformation of the common spelling, as my own wishes and strict propriety might dictate. Thus, if vicious, from the Latin vitium, is written with c, the verb vitiate should regularly be written with the same letter; and we have precedents in the words appreciate and depreciate, from the Latin pretium. In like manner, expatiate should be conformed to the orthography of spacious; exceed, proceed, and succeed, should follow the analogy of concede, intercede, and recede. These are points of minor importance, but far from being unimportant.

In writing the termination of such verbs as civilize, legalize, modernize, there is a diversity which may be corrected without inconvenience. We indeed have some of the verbs of this class from the French, in which language iser is the termination; but most of them we have borrowed directly from the Latin or Greek, or perhaps from the Spanish or Italian, or they are of our own coinage. As the termination ize is conformable to the Greek original, as it has a definite meaning, and as it expresses the true pronunciation in English, it seems expedient to reduce the whole class to a uniformity of orthography.

Enterprise, devise, comprise, revise, compromise, and surprise, belong to a different class, and retain the orthography of their originals.

There is a fact respecting the pronunciation of gn in cognizance and recognizance, which seems to have escaped observation; this is, that g was introduced to express a nasal sound, as in the French gn, or Spanish ñ, but not for the purpose of being pronounced as g. It is probable that the Latins changed con, before nosco, into cog, for this reason; and it may be inferred, from the modern pronunciation of these words, that the Greeks omitted or softened the sound of γ in γιγνωσκω and γιγνομαι. However this may be, the old pronunciation of the words was undoubtedly conusance, or conizance, reconizance; and hence, in the old writers on law, the letter g was omitted. Indeed, there is a harshness in the pronunciation of g in these words, that offends the organs both of the speaker and hearer, and which well justifies the pronunciation of the old lawyers — a pronunciation which we frequently hear at this day among gentlemen of the bar.

Whether the Latins pronounced the letter g in such words as benignus, condignus, malignus, it is of no moment for us to determine. In our mode of writing benign, condign, malign, the sound of g must be dropped; but it is resumed in the derivatives, benignity, condignity, malignity: so in design, designate; resign, *resignation.

In noting the obsolete words, which amount to some thousands, I may have committed mistakes; for words obsolete in one part of the British dominions, or in some part of the United States, may be words in common use in some other part of such dominions not within my knowledge. The rule I have generally observed, has been to note as obsolete such words as I have not heard in colloquial practice, and which I have not found in any writer of the last century. The notation of such words as are disused, may be of use to our own youth, and still more to foreigners who learn our language.

Under the head of etymology, in brackets, the reader will observe references to another work, for a more full explanation or view of the affinities of the words under which these references occur. These are references to a Synopsis of the principal uncompounded words in twenty languages — a work that is not published, and it is uncertain whether it will ever be published. But if it should be, these references will be useful to the philologist, and I thought it expedient to insert them.

ENGLISH ALPHABET.

Language or speech consists of human voices or articulate sounds, intended to communicate thoughts or ideas from one person to another.

Articulate voices are those which are formed by closing and opening the organs of speech — the lips, the tongue, the teeth, &c. An articulation is a jointing or closing of the organs, as in pronouncing ab, ed, op, un, at, eth, ag, eng.

Articulate sounds of the human voice are represented by letters or characters written, painted, engraved, or printed. A letter, or letters in combination, form syllables and words, which are the symbols of ideas.

To letters, syllables, and words, are annexed certain sounds, which, being uttered by the organs of speech, communicate ideas, through the instrumentality of the ears. When letters and words are written, painted, engraved, or printed, they communicate thoughts, through the instrumentality of the eyes.

In order to the communication of thoughts or opinions correctly, from one person to another, it is essential that both persons should annex the same sounds to the same letters and words; or that the letters and words used should be symbols of the same thoughts to both persons. This identity of sounds and symbols constitutes a particular language, the instrument of social intercourse in a nation.

In the English language, the letters are twenty-six; representing sounds, simple or compound; or modifying such sounds.

Letters are of two kinds, vowels and consonants.

Vowels are vocal sounds, uttered by opening the mouth or organs of speech, without a contact of the parts of the mouth. The sound of a perfect vowel may be prolonged at pleasure, without altering the position of the organs. Such is the first or long sound of a, e, o.

The vowels in the English are six — a, e, i, o, u, y. But i and u are not always simple vowels; and y is sometimes used as a consonant. These letters also represent different sounds — a circumstance which creates much difficulty in learning the language.

The broadest or deepest vowel sound is that of a in fall, au in aught, aw in law. This sound requires the largest opening of the mouth. A less opening of the organs gives the sound of the Italian a, as in father, glass. One less deep gives the sound of the short a, as in fat, cat, can. A still smaller opening gives the sound of a in fate, make; and a still smaller, gives the sound of e in mete, feet. The first sound of o, as in note, is made by a circular position of the lips; and with a less circular opening of the lips we utter the sound of oo in tool.

The first or long sound of i is compound, as in pine; so is the first sound of u in due, suit, tribunal. These sounds can not be exactly expressed or described in writing.

The first or long sound of each vowel is exemplified in the following words: —

a in make, name.	o in note, hold.
e in me, mete.	u in duty, true.
i in pine, bind.	y in dry, defy.

The short sound of each vowel may be exemplified in the following words: —

a in mat, ban.	o in not, boss.
e in bet, men.	u in dun, must.
i in bit, pin.	y in pity, duty.

The vowel a has a third sound, called broad, as in ball, all, walk. The same sound is expressed by au in taught, and by aw in saw. This sound is shortened in what, quadrant, quality. Its remaining sound is the Italian one mentioned above, as in father, glass.

The vowel e has the sound of long a in a few words, as in prey, survey, their.

The letter i retains its French sound, that of the English long e, in some words which we have received from the French language, as in pique, marine, machine.

The vowel o, in a few words, has the sound of oo, the French ou, as in move, prove, lose. This sound of oo is shortened in book, look. In a few words, o has the sound of u short, as in dove, love.

The first sound of y, as in dry, is the same as that of i in pine; and its short sound in glory, pity, is the same as that of i in pin, brisk. This short sound of i and y is, properly, the short sound of e long. Hence little, when the first vowel is prolonged, becomes leetle. Hence been is pronounced bin.

The short e in let is nearly, but not precisely, the short sound of a in late.

[Short e before r at the end of a word, and before r followed by any consonant but itself in the middle of a word, verges toward the sound of short u, as in her, fertile, in which e has not exactly the same sound as in herring, ferry. Most persons, indeed, as Smart remarks, run completely into the sound of short u, pronouncing the first syllable of mercy and of murder alike. Those who are more delicate in their pronunciation, endeavor to avoid this in accented syllables, retaining very slightly the sound of short e, though it is difficult to do this, in some cases, without running into the sound of a. These remarks apply also to the sound of short i and y in the same circumstances, as in sir, circle, mirth, &c. Smart remarks that, "even among the more refined classes, sir, dirt, bird, are pronounced sur, durt, burd; and, indeed, in all very common words, it would be somewhat affected to insist on the delicacy refered to."]

The vowel u, in some words, has the sound of oo in book, as in pull, full, put.

The letter u, in some words, is pronounced yu, in which case it is anomalous, representing both a consonant and a vowel. This pronunciation occurs in words which begin with u, forming a syllable by itself; as in unite, union, unanimous; and before r, as in failure, measure, insure, and in a few other cases.

Some English writers allege that the proper sound of u is yu. This is a great mistake; the true sound is nearly eu, but these letters do not express its exact sound.

The letter w has its form and its name from the union of two v's, in old books; v being called yu. This name is ill chosen, and not adapted to express its sound. This letter is, properly, a vowel, with the sound of oo, French ou, but shortened in pronunciation, as in dwell, pronounced dooel'.

That w is a vowel, is proved by the fact, that its sound, oo, may be prolonged at pleasure, with the same position of the organs; and it has the same sound both in the middle and at the beginning of a word; as in dwell, well. Yet at the beginning of a word, it is preceded by a, as a wall, a woolen garment, which has led writers to number it among the consonants.

W, before another vowel, forms a diphthongal sound; at least this combination seems to deserve a place among diphthongs. It corresponds exactly with u before a vowel, as in equal, equity, iniquity, antiquity, quote, question, persuade, in which w might be substituted for u, as it is in the Dutch language.

In a few words, w is written before h, but pronounced after it, as in when, white, pronounced hooen, hooite. This absurdity has proceeded from a change of the order of letters in the Saxon, in which h preceded u; thus, hwen, hwite.

* The Spanish puño is the Latin pugnus; and our word pawn, the D. pand, is the Latin pignus. So we pronounce impune, for impugn, French impugner, from the Latin pugno, pugna. How far these facts tend to show the Latin pronunciation, let the reader judge.

Before r, as in wrench, wring, w is not pronounced. Before the diphthong ou, as in wound, w aids in forming a triphthong.

Following o, w forms part of a diphthong, as in now, vow; or is mute, as in low, slow, snow.

Two vowels rapidly pronounced in one syllable, constitute a diphthong; as oi in join; oy in joy; ou in sound; and ow in vow.

Two vowels in succession, when one only is pronounced, do not form a diphthong. In my books I follow Sheridan, and denominate such vowels a digraph; that is, double written. Such are the following: ai, ay, au, aw, ea, ee, ei, eu, ew, ey, ie, ou, ui.

Consonants are the letters which represent the articulations of the organs. The letters of this sort, in the English language, are the following, in large and small characters: B, b; C, c; D, d; F, f; G, g; H, h; J, j; K, k; L, l; M, m; N, n; P, p; Q, q; R, r; S, s; T, t; V, v; X, x; Z, z.

The articulations or jointings made by these letters, may be learned from the following syllables: ab, ac, ad, af, ag, aj, ak al, am, an, ap, aq, ar, as, at, av, ax, az. Observe the point of contact in the organs which stops the sound.

The letters b, f, p, m, v, represent the articulations of the lips, and are called labials, or lip-letters.

The consonants d, t, l, n, and th, represent the jointings of the tongue and the upper teeth, or gum in which the teeth are inserted. For this reason, they are denominated dentals, or tooth-letters.

The consonants close c, close g, k, and q, represent the articulations of the lower part of the tongue and upper part of the mouth, or palate; hence they are called palatals, or palate-letters.

The consonants s and z represent the position of the end of the tongue near the upper teeth; and when pronounced, the breath issues or is driven out between the tongue and teeth, with a hissing; hence these letters are called sibilants, or hissing-letters. The letter c before e, i, and y, is precisely equivalent to s.

The letter r is uttered with a jar or vibration of the end of the tongue, near the upper teeth.

The letters j and x represent each two sounds; those of j may be expressed by dj, and those of x by ks. The consonant g before e, i, and y, is, in many words, the exact equivalent of j.

The close articulations interrupt all distinct sound; such are k, p, and t, as in ak, ap, at. These are called mutes. B and d are mutes, but less close.

C and g are close articulations at the end of syllables, as in public, rag. At the beginning of syllables, they are close before a, o, and u, as in can, cot, cud; gap, go, gun. But before e, i, and y, c is equivalent to s, as in cedar, city, cycle; and g is sometimes close, as in gift, and sometimes compound, as in general, ginger.

The consonants which represent articulations not close, are f, l, m, n, r, s, v, z; as in the syllables ef, el, em, en, er, es, ev, ez.

H represents a breathing, and is denominated aspirate.

There are, in English, four articulations, for which there are no single characters; but they are represented by ch, sh, th, and ng.

The sound of ch, as in church, cheer, may be represented by tsh.

The sound of sh occurs in shine, shall. It is precisely equivalent to the French ch.

Th are aspirated in think, throne; but vocal in that, thou.

Walker, in explaining the letters of the alphabet, represents or denominates the consonant b as flat, and p as sharp; v as flat, and f as sharp; d as flat, and t as sharp; th in thee, thou, as flat, and th in think, as sharp. These epithets do not express the powers of these consonants, nor the differences between them. The true representation of them is this: B is a labial, representing a less close articulation than p, which indicates a compression of the lips, that instantly stops all sound. The articulation is the same. D represents a less close articulation of the tongue and upper teeth than t. T represents an articulation of the upper teeth and the lower lip, with a breathing without sound; v represents the same articulation with sound. S represents a near articulation of the end of the tongue and the upper teeth, with a breathing or hissing without sound; z represents the same articulation with a hissing sound. The same distinction exists between the articulation sh as in fresh, and that of zh as in osier, fusion, delusion;

The sound of ng is simple, and occurs in sing, thing, in which the articulation is not close. The same is also true of the participles and verbals, as singing, singer. But there is another class of words, as anger, longer, in which the g goes to the subsequent syllable, while, at the same time, the peculiar sound of ng is retained on the preceding syllable. To indicate this, such words are marked with a double accent, thus, an''ger, lon''ger, denoting that they are not to be pronounced either ang-er, or an-ger, but with the peculiar sound of ng followed by g, as described above. Yet there are not, in this case, two articulations, as some orthoëpists seem to suppose. The g directly succeeds the peculiar sound of ng without any new position of the organs, so that there is only one articulation or jointing between the syllables, though that is a close one.

Orthoëpists represent, that, in the combination nk, as in ink, bank, n has the sound of ng. This is a mistake. The sound of ng is nasal, the articulation being less close than nk. If the n in such words had the sound of ng, then ink would have a nasal sound, ing, preceding k; but this is not the fact; on the other hand, the close articulation k stops all sound. Walker, then, in representing bank, brink, as being pronounced bangk, bringk, entirely mistakes the fact.

Note. — In this work, the diphthongs of foreign words, from which anglicized words are derived, are very often rejected; as in economy, edematous, atheneum, maneuver, pean. The diphthongs æ and œ are of difficult formation in writing, and of no use in English words.

RULES FOR PRONUNCIATION,

AND EXPLANATIONS OF THE MANNER OF DESIGNATING SOUNDS IN THIS WORK.

The first or long sound of the vowels is designated by a horizontal mark over the vowel, thus, ā, ē, ī, ō, ū, ȳ. This mark is not necessary (though it is here used) in words and syllables ending in e, after a single consonant, as in fate, mete, rite, note, mute, in which the first vowel is long, and the final e is silent. So also it is unnecessary in the last syllables of colonnade, fortitude, antipode, suicide, proselyte, consecrate, and others of similar formation.

The first sound of a vowel is also indicated by the mark of accent immediately after the vowel, as in fa'vor, ce'dar, vi'tal, glo'ry, tru'ly, cy'cle.

The second or short sound of a single vowel is indicated by one or more consonants terminating the word or syllable, as in ban, band, pen, bend, pin, flint, not, plot, sun, must, cyst, withstand descend, rotund.

The short sound is also indicated by the mark of accent immediately after a single consonant, as in sal'ary, en'ergy, in'famy, bot'any, hus'band, sym'bol.

The third or broad sound of a is designated by two points under the vowel; thus, bạll, broạd. But the necessity of these points is superseded by a general rule, that, in most words in which a is followed by ld, lk, ll, as in bald, balk, fall, the letter a has its broad sound. [Still the ạ is generally used for greater clearness.]

This broad sound occurs in the digraphs au and aw; as in taught, law.

When this broad a is shortened, the sound is indicated by a single point under a; as in what, quadrant.

The fourth or Italian sound of a is designated by two points over the letter; thus, bär, mäst, fäther.

The letter e having the sound of a long, has a mark under the letter; as in prey, convey.

The letter i, when it has the sound of e long, has two points over the letter; thus, fatïgue, marïne.

The letters i and o, when they have the sound of u short, have a curving mark; thus, bĭrd, dŏve.

The vowel o has, in a few words, the sound of oo, French ou, which is indicated by two dots over the letter; thus, mo̤ve, lo̤se. This sound, when shortened, is designated by a point under each of the vowels; thus, bo̤ok, lo̤ok; bṳsh, full.

The two letters oo, without points, have the sound of the French ou; as in fool, room.

The digraphs ai, ay, always have the sound of the first or long a, unless otherwise marked.

The digraphs ea, ee, ei, ie, always have the sound of the first or long e, unless otherwise marked.

In all cases, when one vowel of a digraph is marked, that vowel has the sound designated by the mark, and the other is quiescent; thus, uphrāid, arrāyed, decēit, siēge, appēar, cōurse, flōat, broạd, veïn, shōw.

By marking the vowel o, in the digraphs ou and ow, the digraph is distinguished from the diphthong; thus, in sōurce, ou are a digraph; but in sour they are a diphthong; and bōw, a weapon, is distinguished from bow, to bend.

Thus ou and ow, without a mark, are always diphthongs.

The digraphs eu, ew, and ui, have the sound of the first u; as in feud, brew, bruise. The writers who attempt to give u and ew, after r, the sound of oo, as in rude, brew, [rood, broo,] encourage an affected pronunciation. In all such words, u and ew have the proper sound of u in duty, tumult, lucid, both in this country and in the general usage in England. Some persons affect to pronounce the letters e and w distinctly, e and oo; but this affectation was condemned by Wallis, as early as the reign of Charles II.

The vowel i, in the termination ive, is always short; as in motive, relative, pronounced motiv, relativ.

The peculiar articulation of the letter r renders it necessary to utter a slight sound of e short between a vowel and that letter. Thus, bare, mere, mire, more, mure, are pronounced bāer, meer, mier, moer, muer; so in parent, apparent, pronounced nearly pāerent, appāerent. This necessity makes a slight variation in the sound of a, but too inconsiderable to deserve a particular mark of distinction.

The accented syllable is designated by this mark ′ at the end, as in la′bor, glo′ry, ten′or, amend′, det′riment, withdraw′, avow′, destroy′, renew′.

After syllables having two or more consonants followed by e quiescent, or a diphthong, the accent has no effect upon the vowel, as in dislodge′, rejoice′.

In many cases, the mark over the vowel might designate both the sound of the vowel and the accented syllable, as in abrāde, upbrāid, dedūce, besiēge; but the accent is uniformly marked.*

The letters ch, in words from the French, are pronounced as sh, and over the letter c is a mark; thus, chaise, pronounced shāyz.

The letters ce, ci, and ti, before a vowel, often blend into the sound of sh. Thus, ocean, Phocion, motion, are pronounced o′shun, Pho′shun, mo′shun. Hence, ceous, cious, tious, blend into the syllable shus, as in cetaceous, gracious, factious, pronounced ceta′shus, gra′shus, fac′shus.†

The termination sion, after a consonant, is pronounced shun; concession is pronounced concesh′un. But after a vowel, it is pronounced zhun; diffusion is pronounced diffu′zhun.

The termination tion, in most words, is pronounced shun, after a vowel or consonant; nation, affection, are pronounced na′shun, affec′shun.

In a few words, tian, tion, are pronounced chun; as in Christian, bastion. Egyptian is an exception; Egypshun.

The termination sier, when not under the accent, is pronounced zher or zhur, as in o′sier, bra′sier; but when under the accent, it has the sound of seer, as in cuirassier′.

When two accents occur after e or i, and before ci and ti, they indicate that the preceding syllable ends with the pronunciation of sh. Thus, pre″cious, vi″tiate, are pronounced presh′ous, vish′ate; the ci and ti blending into the sound of sh.

In such words as pronunciation, euphony seems to require that cia should be uttered in two syllables, pro-nun-ci-a′tion, to prevent the repetition of the sound of sh; pronunshashun.†

Dr. Ash remarks, that the different vowels, in unaccented syllables, are pronounced alike, or nearly so. Thus, in the words altar, alter, manner, manor, murmur, all the vowels of the last syllables have nearly the same sound. Hence it is useless to mark the unaccented vowels, their sounds being too obscure and indistinct to be defined, or to be distinguished by marks. The nice distinctions between them, if any exist, are to be acquired only by usage and good taste.

The letters gh, in most English words, are quiescent. In the following, they are pronounced like f; cough, chough, clough, enough, laugh, rough, tough, trough.

H after r is mute, as in rhetoric.

G and k before n are mute, as in gnaw, knave.

W before r is mute, as in wrest, wrong.

In a few words, h after w is pronounced before it, as in what, which.

In the termination en, e is usually mute, as in broken, pronounced brokn.

The final e is mute after l, in the following syllables: ble, cle, dle, fle, gle, kle, ple, tle, zle.

B after m is mute, as in dumb.

L is mute before k, as in walk; before m, as in calm; and before f, as in half, calf.

N is mute after m, as in hymn.

Ph are always pronounced like f, as in philosophy; but they are silent in phthisic, pronounced tizzic.

P is mute before s, as in psalm; and before t, as in ptyalism, Ptolemy.

In the terminating syllable of adjectives, ous, the letter o is always silent.

The unaccented y, at the end of words, is short, like i in pin, pit, as in glory, probity. In the plural of such words, ies are pronounced iz, as glories, pronounced gloriz.

But y, in monosyllables, has its first sound, as in dry, my; and in verbs and plurals of nouns the same sound occurs in the inflections, as in fly, flies; try, tries; pronounced flīze, trīze.

In the termination fy, the y has its first sound, as in fortify. So also i in the last syllable of fortifies.

S has its proper sound after f, p, k, t, and th aspirate, as in chiefs, caps, franks, pits, deaths.

S has the sound of z after b, d, g, gh, l, m, n, r, s and ss, z, v, aw, ay, ew, ey, ow, oy, sh, ng, th vocal, ch, oe, ie, and after c followed by e final; as in robs, robes, races, rods, rides, rags, rages, toils, dreams, sighs, rains, bars, waves, roses, passes, mazes, laws, days, news, preys, vows, joys, brushes, sings, breathes, churches, foes, flies.

S before m has the sound of z, as in spasm, baptism

The letter z, in Welsh words, is pronounced as the vocal th in that, thou.

In many cases, a word, the better to express the pronunciation, is written a second time, in the letters most proper for the purpose. In this case, the pronunciation of the radical word is to be observed in the derivatives, unless otherwise noted. Thus, bright is written brīte, to show the pronunciation; and this pronunciation is to be observed in its derivatives, brightness, brightly.

The letter u, it has been remarked, has the sound of yu in words in which this letter forms a syllable by itself, as in u-nit, u-nanimous, u-biquity, u-surp, and in some monosyllables, as in use, pronounced yuse.

In extending this sound to u after d, as in gradual, credulous, Walker has changed the sound of d to that of dj; and gradual becomes gradjual or grajual; credulous is changed to credjulous or crejulous. But this pronunciation of Walker is severely condemned by Jameson and Knowles. So also Walker's butsheus for beauteous, plentshus for plenteous, are condemned and discarded. The same fate attends Walker's ingrejent for ingredient, and other words of a like orthography.

The present practice is to give to u the sound of yu, in such words as nature, feature, rapture; which are pronounced nāt-yur, fēat-yur, rapt-yur. This practice seems to have been adopted to avoid the common corruption of a change of t into tsh, as in natshur — a pronunciation condemned by the latest orthoëpists.

But in words of more syllables than two, this pronunciation of u as yu, in the last syllable, as in caricature, literature, judicature, is not to be commended. [Still, as the corruption referred to occurs quite as frequently in words of this class as in those of two syllables, it has been thought best to place them all on the same footing, and to mark with the sound of u as heard in unite, all the terminations in ure, with their derivatives.]

The termination ed, in the past tense and participles of verbs, retains the vowel e, in this vocabulary, for showing the proper orthography, especially to foreigners; but in the customary pronunciation, this vowel is omitted, except after d and t. Thus, abandoned, delivered, charmed, are pronounced abandond, deliverd, charmd. This rule extends to all cases, except to some formal uses of particular words, or to occasional uses of some words in verse.

After d and t, this termination ed is, from necessity, pronounced as a distinct syllable; as in abraded, hated.

* It is said by some writer, that the accent never falls on a vowel, but always on a consonant. This is a great mistake. The last syllable of foresee has the accent on the last syllable, and on the vowels which end the syllable. In open, the accent is on the first syllable, in which there is no consonant.

† The English orthoëpists allege that the letter c, in such words, has the sound of sh. This is a mistake. The pronunciation of sh, in such words, is the effect of blending the sound of c with the following vowel This mistake has misled Walker and others into a multitude of errors

PICTORIAL ILLUSTRATIONS

WEBSTER'S UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY.

"There is no knowledge of things conveyed by men's words, when their ideas agree not to the reality of things. * * * He that hath names without ideas, wants meaning in his words, and speaks only empty sounds. * * * The only sure way of making known the signification of the name of any simple idea, is by presenting to his senses that subject which may produce it in his mind, and make him actually have the idea that word stands for. * * * The shape of a horse, or cassiowary, will be but rudely and imperfectly imprinted on the mind by words; the sight of the animals doth it a thousand times better. * * * It is not unreasonable to propose, that words standing for things which are known and distinguished by their outward shapes, should be expressed by little draughts and prints made of them. * * * Naturalists, that treat of plants and animals, have found the benefit of this way, and he that has had occasion to consult them, will have reason to confess, that he has a clearer idea of apium or ibex, from a little print of that herb or beast, than he could have from a long definition of the names of either of them. And so no doubt he would have of strigil and sistrum, if instead of currycomb and cymbal, which are the English names dictionaries render them by, he could see stamped in the margin small pictures of these instruments, as they were in use among the ancients. * * * Such things as these, which the eye distinguishes by their shapes, would be best let into the mind by draughts made of them, and more determine the signification of such words than any other words set for them, or made use of to define them."

Locke on the Human Understanding.

A little before the appearance of the Revised Edition of Webster's Dictionary in 1847, there was commenced in Great Britain a work published in numbers, under the title of THE IMPERIAL DICTIONARY. This was a reprint (almost verbatim) from an earlier edition of the AMERICAN DICTIONARY, with a few omissions and insertions; but containing, of course, none of the improvements made in the Revised Edition. The editor, DR. OGILVIE, in his preface, remarks, "Webster's Dictionary, which forms the basis of the present work, is acknowledged, both in this country [Great Britain] and America, to be superior to every other Dictionary hitherto published." A prominent feature of the work, however, was the introduction of PICTORIAL ILLUSTRATIONS; thus seeking, by "the assistance of DIAGRAMS and ENGRAVINGS ON WOOD, to furnish clearer ideas of various subjects and objects, and of the signification of various terms, than could be conveyed by mere verbal description." Dr. Ogilvie well remarks, "For all practical purposes the chief value of a Dictionary consists in its definitions." While, however, Webster stands confessedly preëminent in this department, it is obvious that a correct pictorial representation of the object or thing to be defined, will often aid in giving a clearer conception of that object than could be conveyed by any mere statement in words. Terms in Architecture, Botany, Geometry, Heraldry, Mechanics, Music, Coats of Arms, objects of Natural History, &c., are evidently of this description.

Intelligent gentlemen whose judgment could be relied on, have frequently urged the publishers of Webster's Dictionary, to incorporate this same feature of Pictorial Illustrations into their work. They accordingly gave some assurances in this direction a considerable time since: and, in presenting the public a new edition of their work, they have now the pleasure of redeeming any pledges given or implied of this character, in a manner which they trust will be satisfactory to the public; earnestly desirous that in no department WEBSTER'S UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY may fail to meet any reasonable expectation or wish of the countrymen of Dr. Webster, by whom his lexicographical labors have been so generously appreciated.

The following pages will perhaps sufficiently explain themselves, and witness to the honesty of our endeavor, that no suitable expenditure or proper degree of artistic skill, should be wanting to render this new feature alike useful and attractive. For the designs, we are indebted, to a very great degree, to the IMPERIAL DICTIONARY before referred to. Yet we have by no means relied exclusively on that work. Many things of this nature, useful and appropriate in a work designed for the public of Great Britain, it was found would be much less so in a work designed more particularly for the American people, for example, the fullness to which the department of Heraldry is there carried. On the other hand, there are here presented several entirely new features, or a much greater fullness of illustration; as, for example, in Coats of Arms, the Deaf and Dumb Alphabet, Musical Terms, Geometry, Races of Men, &c.

Another distinguishing peculiarity (and, it is believed, excellence) here introduced, is that the Illustrations in a given department are grouped and presented by themselves. Thus will be found together, in alphabetical arrangement, the cuts illustrative of Architecture, Botany, Carpentry, Coats of Arms, Entomology, Geology, Geometry, Ichthyology, Heraldry, Mechanics, Machinery, Music, Mythology, Ornithology, Philosophical Instruments, Plants and Shrubs, Reptiles, Quadrupeds, &c., &c. The advantages of this arrangement are obvious, as are those of having the Illustrations together; since, besides admitting of better mechanical execution, the consulter has thus placed before him, at one view, the diagrams or engravings illustrative of an entire department. There is, at the same time, usually appended to the engravings the number of the page where the verbal definition can be found, under the appropriate word in the vocabulary; and also in the body of the work, a star, *, to the words in the vocabulary which are illustrated in the Pictorial department, and even to the particular definition so illustrated, where there are more than one. Thus the consulter will find little if any inconvenience from this grouping of the cuts, which has in every other respect very important advantages. This, indeed, is the usual arrangement in Encyclopedias, and works executed in the highest style of art.

It has not been deemed necessary to make this classification very rigid, as it is not always easy to determine under what particular head a given word should fall. It has been thought sufficient to give this general division, and as the arrangement throughout is alphabetical, any illustrated word will readily be found, either under what may be deemed an appropriate head, as given in the Index, or in its general alphabetical place.

To the engraver, JOHN ANDREW, Esq., of Boston, and the electrotypers, Messrs. THOMAS B. SMITH & SON of New York, is this new feature indebted for its superior workmanship and beauty.

FOR

WEBSTER'S UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY.

The figures given refer to the page in the Dictionary, where the word and its appropriate definition may be found. Where the page is not indicated, the word may usually be found in its appropriate alphabetical place in the Appendix.

A.

ABACUS, p. 1, def. 2.

ACALEPHÆ, p. 8.

1. 2.

1. Medusa pellucens. 2. Rhizostoma Cuvieri.

ÆGIS, p. 23.

Pallas with the Ægis.

AILETTES, n. [Fr. little wings.]

A term applied to the small square shields of arms which were worn upon the shoulders of knights during a part of the middle ages. They were the prototypes of the modern epaulets.

AIR-GUN, p. 30.

ALCHEMIST, p. 32.

ALLECRET, n., [Ger. all strength.]

Allecret Armor, A.D. 1540.

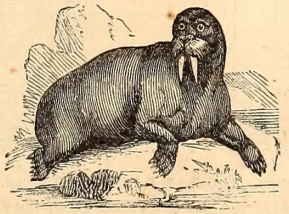
Light armor, used both by cavalry and infantry in the sixteenth century, and more especially by the Swiss. It consisted of a breastplate and gussets, often reaching to the middle of the thigh, and sometimes below the knees.

ALTAR, p. 39, def. 1.

Grecian Altar.

AMPHIBIOUS ANIMALS.

MORSE, p. 730.

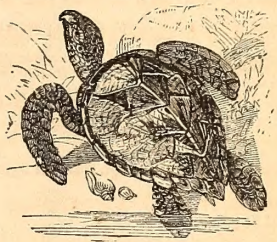


Morse or Walrus (Trichechus rosmarus.)

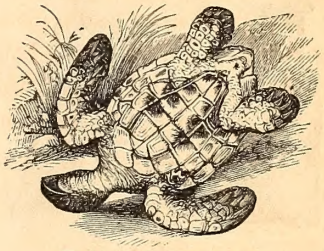
TORTOISE, p. 1161, def. 1.

Common or Greek Tortoise (Testudo Græca.)

AMPHIBIOUS ANIMALS—Continued.



Hawk's-bill Turtle (Chelonia imbricata). (See Tortoise Shell, p. 1161.)



Hawk's-bill Turtle, under side.

ANAMORPHOSIS, p. 46, def. 1.

In perspective drawings, a deformed or distorted portrait or figure, which, in one point of view is confused or unintelligible, and in another, is an exact and regular representation; or confused to the naked eye, but reflected from a plane or curved mirror, appearing regular, and in right proportion.

ANDROSPHINXES, n. [G. ανηρ, ανδρος, a man, and σφιγξ, a sphinx.] In Egyptian art, lions with human heads.

ANONA, n. A genus of plants, a type of the nat. order Anonaceæ. A. squamosa, sweet sop, grows in the West Indian islands, and yields an edible fruit having a thick, sweet, luscious pulp. A. muricata, sour sop, is another species cultivated both in the West and the East Indies, which produces a large oval fruit of a greenish yellow color, containing a sweet pulp, mixed with a most agreeable acid.

Sour Sop (Anona muricata.)

ANTENNÆ, p. 53.

Fire-fly, a a, Antennæ.

They rarely exceed two in number, though in some insects of the apterous kind, they amount to four, and even six; the variations in their structure are very great, they are considered as the organs of touch and hearing. The figure represents the fire-fly, a native of America, which emits a brilliant phosphorescent light.

ANT-HILLS, p. 52.

Termite Ant-hills.

In tropical climates, the nests of some species of the white ant (Termites) are sometimes elevated to a great height above the surface of the ground, like pyramids or towers, occasionally surmounted by a solid roof, which, by their height and number, appear at a distance like a small village.

ANTLER, p. 56.

Antlers of Fossil Elk (Cervus giganteus.)

APLYSIA, n.

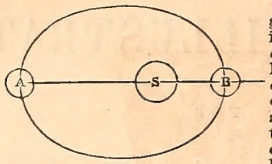
Sea-hare (Aplysia depilans).

The sea-hare, a genus of mollusca, of the order of Tectibranchiata. Some of the species have the power of throwing out a deep purple liquor, with which the animal colors the water around to a considerable distance, when it perceives any danger.

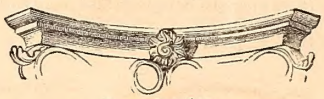
APSIS, p. 63, def. 1.



The point at the greatest distance is called the higher apsis, and at the least the lower apsis. The line of the apsides has a slow angular motion in the plane of the planet's orbit. In the annexed figure, A and B are apsides, or points of greatest and least distance of a planet from the sun, the orbit of such planet being an ellipse with the sun in one of the foci, as at S.

ARCHITECTURE.

ABACUS, p. 1, def. 3.



Abacus, Corinthian.

Abacus, Grecian Doric.

Abacus, Roman Doric.

ACANTHUS, p. 8, def. 2.

ALETTE, n. [Ital. aletta.]

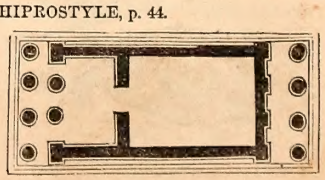
Alette. A, Arch. B, B, Pillars. C, C, Alettes.

The face of the pier of an arch, extending from the arris of the reveal; but more particularly, that portion betwixt the arris of the reveal and the pillar or pilaster which is used to decorate the arch.

AMPHIPROSTYLE, p. 44.

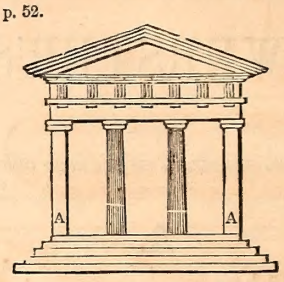


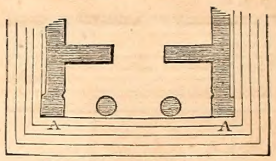
ARCHITECTURE—Continued.

ANNULET, p. 51, def. 1.

A small member, whose horizontal section is circular.

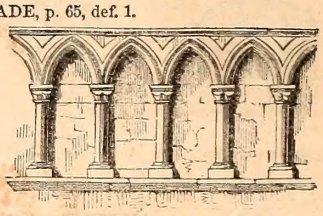
ANTA, p. 52.





Portico in Antis. ; A, A, Antæ.

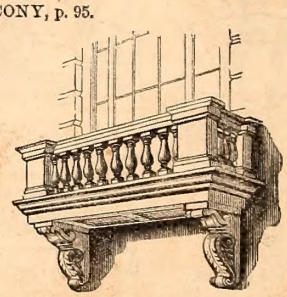
ARCADE, p. 65, def. 1.



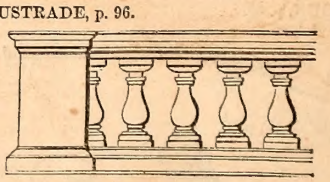
Arcade, Romsey Church, Hampshire, Eng.

In the architecture of the middle ages, more commonly applied as an ornamental dressing to a wall, as in the figure.

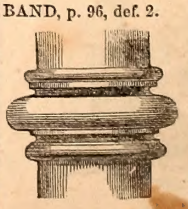
BALCONY, p. 95.



BALUSTRADE, p. 96.



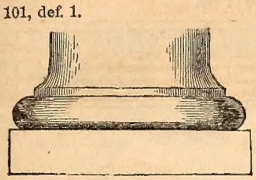
BAND, p. 96, def. 2.



Also the round molding or suit of moldings, which encircles the middle of the shaft in the early English style. The term is also used for the tablet or string course round a tower, or other part of a building.

ARCHITECTURE—Continued.

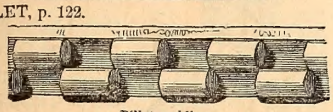
BASE, p. 101, def. 1.



Tuscan Base.

BASTON, or BATOON, p. 103.

BILLET, p. 122.



Billet molding.

BUCRANIA, n. plur. [L. ox-skulls.] Sculptured ornaments representing ox-skulls adorned with wreaths or other ornaments, which were employed to decorate the frieze of the entablature, in the Ionic and Corinthian orders of architecture.

BYZANTINE ARCHITECTURE, n.

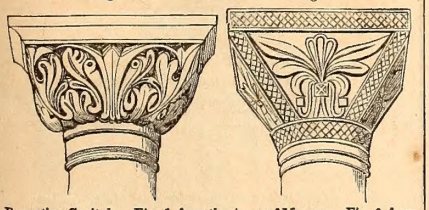
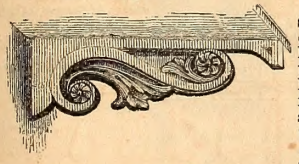
Fig. 1. Fig. 2.



Byzantine Capitals. Fig. 1, from the Apse of Murano. Fig. 2, from the Casa Loredan, Venice. From Ruskin's Stones of Venice.

A style of architecture developed in the Byzantine Empire, about A.D. 300. The leading forms which pervade the Byzantine are the round-arch, the dome, the circle, and the cross. The capitals of the pillars are of endless variety, and full of invention. The mosque of St. Sophia, Constantinople, and the church of St. Mark's, Venice, are prominent examples of Byzantine architecture.

CANTALIVER, p. 170.

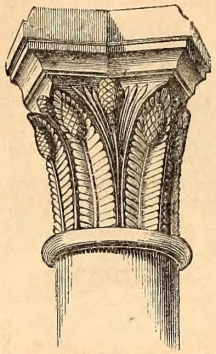


Cantalivers serve the same end as modillions, but while the use of the latter is confined to regular architecture, the former have a general and trivial use.

CAPITAL, p. 172, def. 1.

Composite Capital.

ARCHITECTURE—Continued.

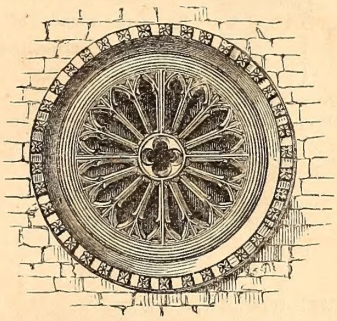


Moorish Capital, Baths at Gerona, Spain.

In classical arch. the different orders have their respective capitals, but in Egyptian, Indian, Norman, and Gothic architecture, they are endlessly diversified.

Gothic Capital, Salisbury Cathedral, Eng.

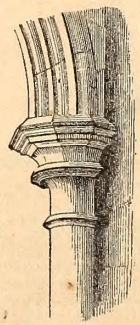
CATHERINE WHEEL WINDOW.



Catherine Wheel Window, St. David's.

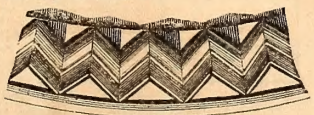
In arch., a large circular ornament in the upper compartment of Gothic windows, fitted with a rosette, or radiating divisions. [See ROSE WINDOW.]

CHAPTREL, p. 192.



The capitals of pillars and pilasters, which support arches, commonly called imposts.

CHEVRON, p. 197, def. 2.

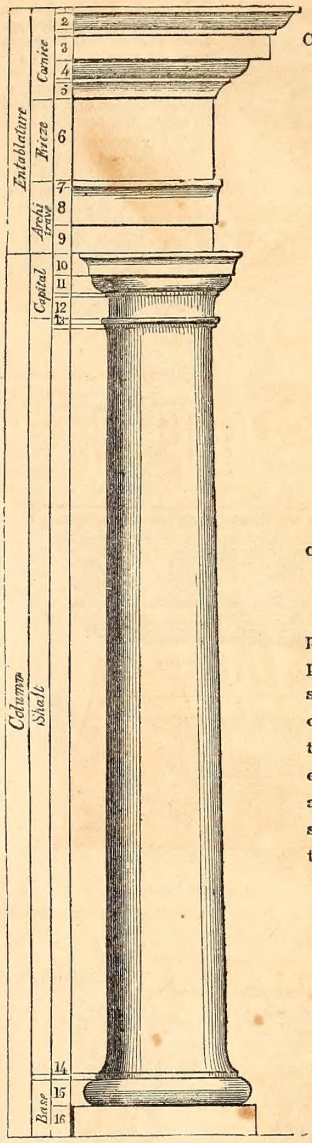


Chevron molding.

Called also the Zigzag and Dancette.

ARCHITECTURE—Continued.

COLUMN, p. 226, def. 1.



Tuscan Column.

1. Fillet. 2. Cyma Recta. 3. Corona. 4. Ovolo. 5. Cavetto. 6. Frieze. 7. Fillet. 8. Upper Fascia. 9. Lower Fascia. 10. Abacus. 11. Ovolo. 12. Colarino or neck. 13. Astragal. 14. Apophyges. 15. Torus. 16. Plinth.

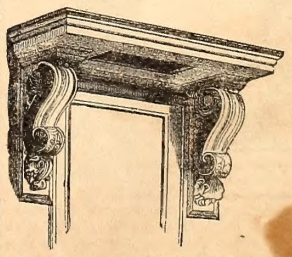
Columns are chiefly used in the construction or adornments of buildings. They are also used, however, singly for various purposes.

CLUSTERED COLUMN.

Clustered Column, Westminster Cathedral, Eng.

In arch., a pier which appears to consist of several columns clustered together; sometimes attached, and sometimes detached.

CONSOLE, p. 254.



Cornice supported by Consoles, A A.

It is frequently used merely as an ornament; as on the keystone of an arch.

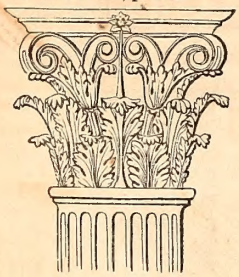
ARCHITECTURE—Continued.

CORBEL, p. 266.

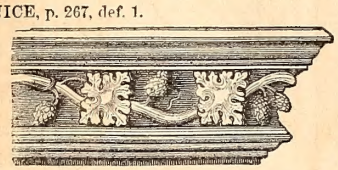
In arch., a piece of stone, wood, or iron, projecting from the vertical face of a wall, to support some superincumbent object. Corbels are of a great variety of forms, and are ornamented in many ways.

Corbel, Stonechurch, Kent, Eng.

CORINTHIAN CAPITAL, p. 267.

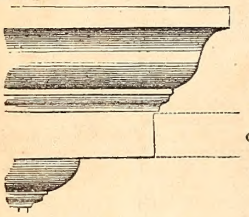


CORNICE, p. 267, def. 1.



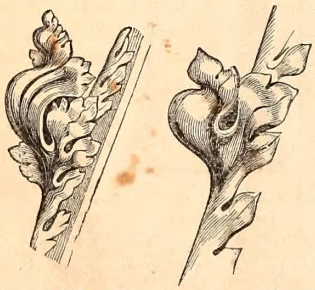
Gothic Cornice.

CORONA, p. 268, def. 1.



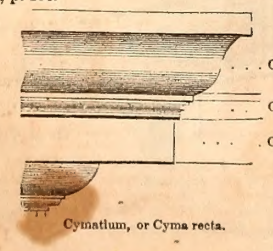
Corona.

CROCKET, p. 285.



In its usual form, the crocket is a foliated band, covering the angle of the member to which it is applied, swelling out at regular intervals into tufts of leaves with considerable projection; to these tufts the term crocket is commonly restricted. Sometimes in place of leaves, crockets assume the forms of animals.

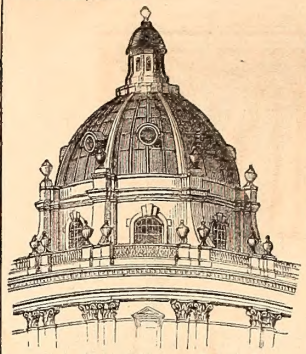
CYME, p. 296.



Cymatium, or Cyma recta.

ARCHITECTURE—Continued.

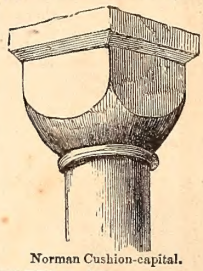
CUPOLA, p. 292.



Cupola, Radclyffe Library, Oxford, Eng.

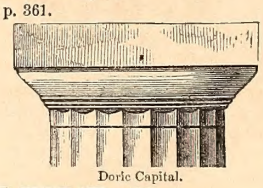
The Italian word signifies a hemispherical roof which covers a circular building like the Pantheon at Rome, or the temple of Vesta at Tivoli. The greater part of modern cupolas are semi-elliptical, cut through their shortest diameter, and constructed of timber; but the ancient cupolas were nearly hemispherical, and constructed of stone. The finest modern cupolas are, that of St. Peter's at Rome; the one on the Bank of England and those of St. Paul's, London; the Hotel des Invalides and the Church of St. Genevieve, Paris; Santa Maria at Florence; and St. Sophia at Constantinople.

CUSHION-CAPITAL, n. In arch., a capital so sculptured as to appear like a cushion pressed upon, very common in Indian buildings; also applied to the Norman capital, consisting of a cube rounded off at its lower extremities.



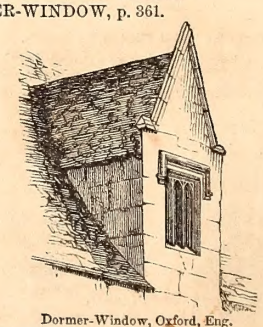
Norman Cushion-capital.

DORIC, p. 361.



Doric Capital.

DORMER-WINDOW, p. 361.



Dormer-Window, Oxford, Eng.

ENTABLATURE, p. 399.

In large buildings, projections similar to entablatures are often carried round the whole edifice, or along the front only. These projections are also termed entablatures. In this sense, the term is applied by engineers to similar parts of the framing of machinery, wherein architectural designs are introduced.

ARCHITECTURE—Continued.

FESTOON, p. 448.

The festoon in architecture is sometimes composed of an imitation of drapery, similarly disposed, and frequently of an assemblage of musical instruments, implements of war or of the chase, and the like, according to the purpose to which the building it ornaments is appropriated.

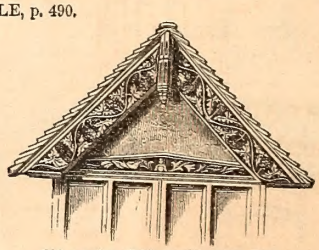
FINIAL, p. 454.

The knot or bunch of foliage, or flower, that forms the upper extremities of pinnacles in Gothic architecture; sometimes, the pinnacle itself.

FOILS.

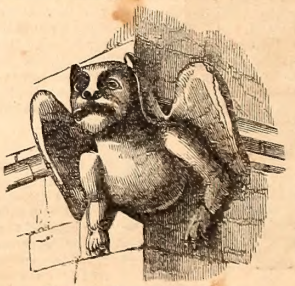
The small arcs in the tracery of Gothic windows, panels, &c., which are said to be trefoiled, quatrefoiled, cinquefoiled, multifoiled, &c., according to the number of arcs, which they contain.

GABLE, p. 490.



Old wooden Gable at Coventry, Eng.

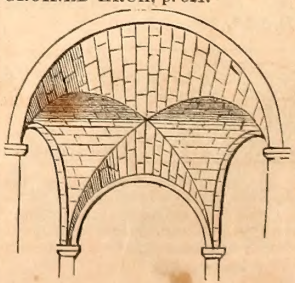
GARGOYLE, p. 494.



Gargoyle, Stony-Stratford, Eng.

In the arch. of the middle ages, the gargoyle assumes a vast variety of forms, often frightful, fantastic, or grotesque.

GROINED ARCH, p. 521.



An arch formed by the intersection of two semicylinders or arches.

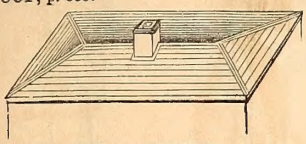
ARCHITECTURE—Continued.

HELIX, p. 545.

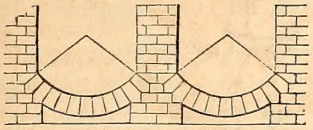
Helices.

In every perfect capital there are sixteen helices, two at each angle, and two meeting under the middle of each face of the abacus.

HIP-ROOF, p. 553.

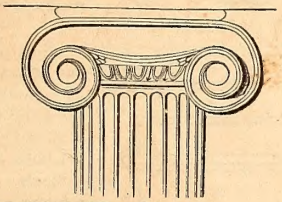


INVERTED ARCH, or INVERT.

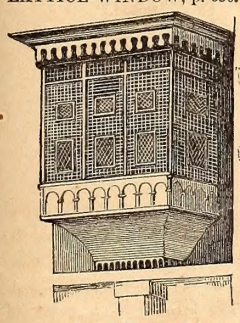


An arch with its intrados below the axis or springing line, and of which therefore the lowest stone is the key-stone. Inverted arches are used in foundations to connect particular points, and distribute their weight or pressure over a greater extent of surface, as in piers and the like.

IONIC CAPITAL, p. 624.



LATTICE-WINDOW, p. 650.



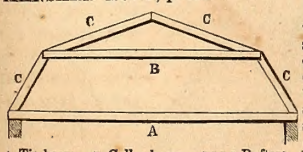
Lattice-Window, Cairo.

A window made of laths or strips of iron which cross one another like net-work, so as to leave open interstices. It is only used when air rather than light is to be admitted.

M ROOF.

In arch., a kind of roof formed by the junction of two common roofs with a valley between them.

MANSARD ROOF, p. 692.

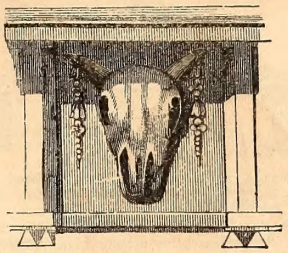


A Tie-beam. B Collar-beam. CCCC Rafters.

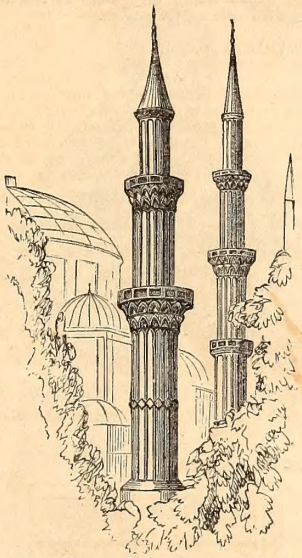
A roof formed with an upper and under set of rafters on each side, the under set less, and the upper set more inclined to the horizon. It is called a mansard roof from the name of its inventor, Francois Mansard, and it is also called a curb roof, from Fr. courber, to bend, descriptive of the double inclination of its sides.

ARCHITECTURE—Continued.

METOPE, p. 711.

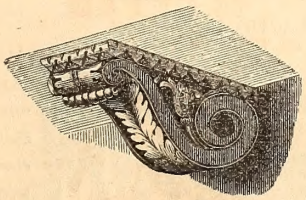


MINARET, p. 715.



Minarets, Mosque of St. Sophia, Constantinople.

MODILLION, p. 723



MULLION, p. 736.

a a Mullions. b b Transom.

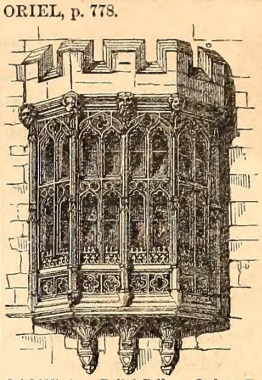
A vertical division between the lights of windows, screens, &c., in Gothic architecture. Mullions are rarely found earlier than the early English style. Their moldings are very various. Sometimes the styles in wainscoating are called mullions.

PEDIMENT, p. 808.

ARCHITECTURE—Continued.

ORIEL, p. 778.



Oriel Window, Baliol College, Oxford, Eng.

A large bay or recessed window in a hall, chapel, or other apartment. It usually projects from the outer face of the wall, either in a semi-octagonal or semi-square plan, and is of various kinds and sizes. When not on the ground-floor it is supported on brackets or corbels.

PENDANT POST, n.

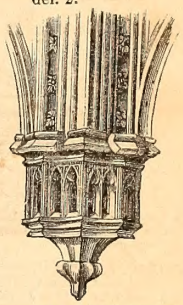
P Pendant Post, 14th century. Raunds Church, Northamptonshire.

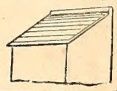
PENDANT, p. 810, def. 2.



Pendant, Crosby Hall, London.

In a medieval principal roof-truss, a short post placed against the wall, having its lower end supported on a corbel or capital, and its upper supporting the tie-beam or hammer-beam.—2. The support of an arch across the angles of a square.

PENT-ROOF, p. 812.



A roof formed like an inclined plane, the slope being all on one side; called also a shed-roof.

PINNACLE, p. 828, def. 1.

Early English Pinnacle, Beverley Minster.

Perpendicular Pinnacle, Trinity Church, Cambridge.

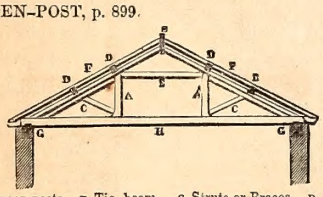
There exists great difference of opinion as to whether the pinnacle comprehended the whole ornament, as above described, or only its crowning spire; the proper name for the whole being supposed to be finial.

ARCHITECTURE—Continued.

PILASTER, p. 826.

A debased pillar; a square pillar projecting from a pier, or from a wall, to the extent of from one-quarter to one-third of its breadth. Pilasters originated in the Grecian antæ. In Roman architecture they were sometimes tapered like columns, and finished with capitals modeled after the order with which they were used.

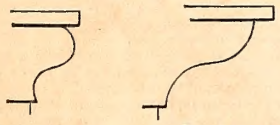
QUEEN-POST, p. 899.



A A, Queen-posts. B, Tie beam. C, Struts or Braces. D, Purlins. E, Collar beams. F, Common rafters. G G, Wall plates. H, Ridge piece.

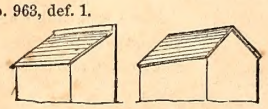
In arch., the suspending posts in the framed principal of a roof, or in a trussed partition, or other truss where there are two. When there is only one post it is called a king-post or crown-post.

QUIRK-MOLDINGS, p. 902.

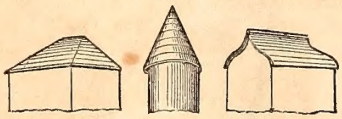


Quirked Ogee. Plain Ogee.

ROOF, p. 963, def. 1.

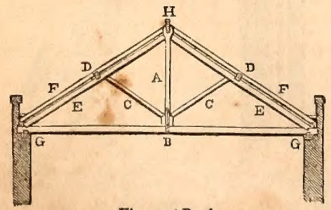


Shed Roof. Gable Roof.



Hip Roof. Conical Roof. Ogee Roof.

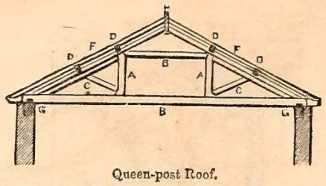
Curb Roof. M Roof.



King-post Roof.

A, King-post. B, Tie beam. C C, Struts or braces. D D, Purlins. E E, Backs or principal rafters. F F, Common rafters. G G, Wall plates. H, Ridge piece.

ARCHITECTURE—Continued.

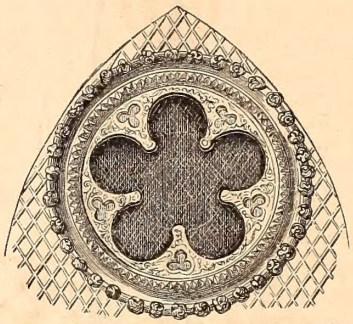


Queen-post Roof.

A A, Queen-posts. B, Tie beam. C C, Struts or braces. D D, Purlins. E, Straining beam. F F, Common rafters. G G, Wall plates. H, Ridge piece.

The mode of framing here exhibited is termed a truss. Sometimes, when the width of the building is not great, common rafters are used alone to support the roof. They are in that case joined together in pairs, nailed where they meet at top, and connected with a tie at the bottom.

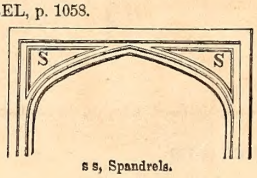
ROSE-WINDOW, p. 964.



Rose-Window, west front, Lincoln Cathedral, Eng.

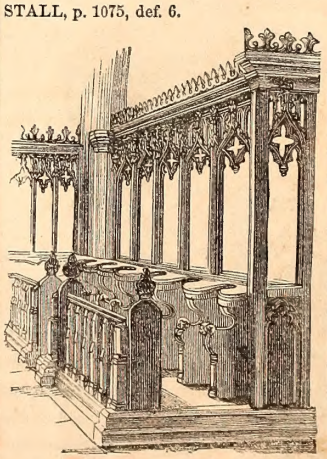
It is called also Catherine Wheel and Mary-gold Window.

SPANDREL, p. 1058.



S S, Spandrels.

STALL, p. 1075, def. 6.



Stalls, Higham Ferrers Church, Northamptonshire, Eng.

In arch., an elevated seat in the choir or chancel of a cathedral, collegiate church, &c., and mostly appropriated to some dignitary of such churches.

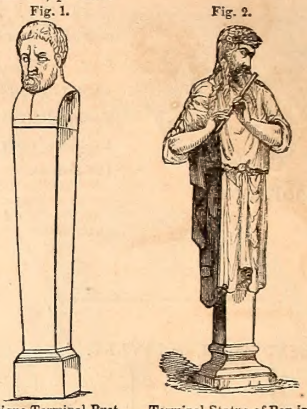
STRAIGHT ARCH.

In arch., the arch over an aperture in which the intrados is straight, or an arch consisting of straight lines and a pointed top, comprising two sides of an equilateral triangle. Its form may be considered as intermediate between that of the semi-circular and of the Gothic arch.

ARCHITECTURE—Continued.

TERMINUS, p. 1139.

Fig. 1. Fig. 2.

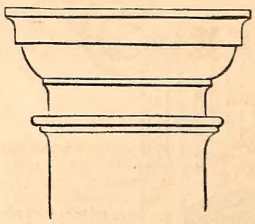


Antique Terminal Bust. Terminal Statue of Pan in the British Museum.

In arch. and sculp., a terminus, or term, is a pillar statue; that is, either a half statue, or bust, not placed upon, but incorporated with, and, as it were, immediately springing out of, the square pillar, which serves as its pedestal.

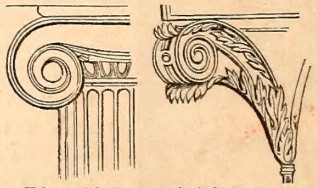
TREFOIL, p. 1172, def. 2.

TUSCAN CAPITAL.



Tuscan order, one of the five orders of architecture, according to Vitruvius and Palladio. It admits of no ornaments, and the columns are never fluted.

VOLUTE, p. 1242, def. 1.



Volutes of the Ionic and Corinthian Capitals.

ARTOCARPUS, n. The bread-fruit, a genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Urticaceæ; sub-order Artocarpeæ. Many species are known, some of which yield valuable timber, in the forests of Bengal and Malabar; but the most important species are the A. incisa, or true bread-fruit, and A. integrifolia, or jack-fruit.

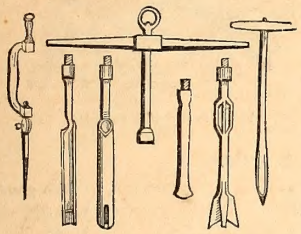
Jack-fruit, (Artocarpus integrifolia.)

ARGONAUTA, p. 67.

Argonauta Argo.

A genus of shells of the class Cephalopoda. The shell consists of one spiral involuted valve. The Argo, with a subdentated carina, is the famous nautilus, which, when it sails, extends two of its arms, spreading a membrane, which serves for a sail, and six other arms are thrown out, for rowing or steering.

AUGERS, p. 85, def. 1.

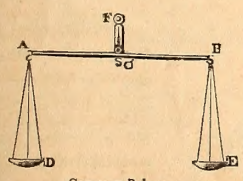


B.

BAGPIPE, p. 93, def. 1.

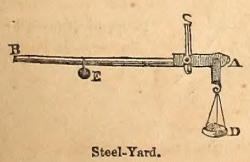
A musical wind instrument, used chiefly in Scotland and Ireland. It consists of a leathern bag, which receives the air by a tube, which is stopped by a valve; and pipes, into which the air is pressed by the performer. The bass-pipe is called the drone, and the tenor or treble is called the chanter. The pipes have eight holes like those of a flute, which the performer stops and opens at pleasure.

BALANCE, p. 94, def. 1.



Common Balance.

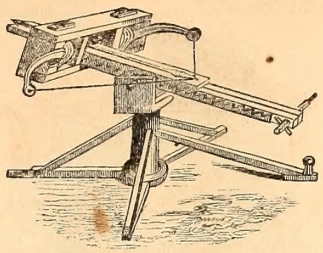
The annexed figure represents the common balance. A B is the beam which rests in a horizontal position, and is capable of turning on the centre of motion C. D and E are the scales which are suspended from the points A and B, the extremities of the beam, called the centers of suspension.



Steel-Yard.

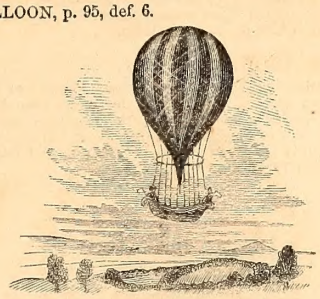
The Roman balance, our steel-yard, consists of a lever, or beam, movable on a centre, and suspended near one of its extremities.

BALLISTA, p. 95.

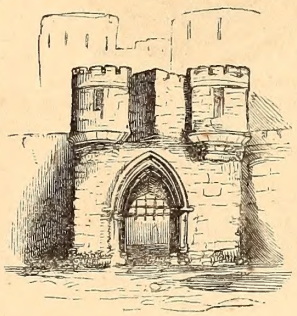


Somewhat resembling our cross-bows, but much larger and stronger.

BALLOON, p. 95, def. 6.



BARBACAN, p. 98, def. 1.

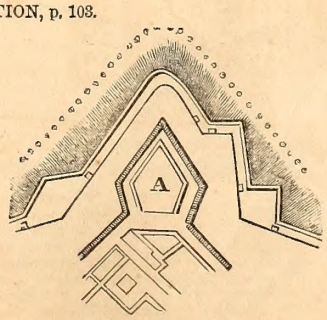


A kind of watch-tower; an advanced work before the gate of a castle, or fortified town; any out-work at a short distance from the main works.

BARBED, p. 99, def. 1.

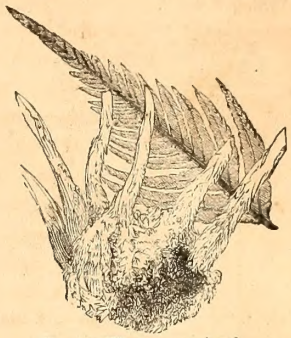
A term applied to the war-horse completely armed.

BASTION, p. 103.



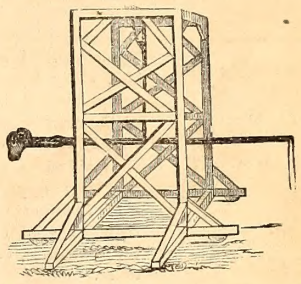
(A) Bastion, Barcelona.

BAROMETZ, p. 100.



Barometz (Cibotium assamicum).

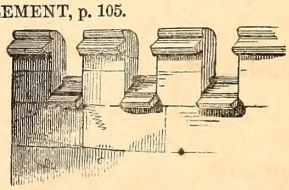
BATTERING-RAM, p. 104.



BATTLE-AX, p. 104.

Norman Warrior with Battle-Ax.

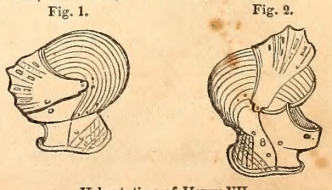
BATTLEMENT, p. 105.



A notched or indented parapet, sometimes paneled or pierced or divided into openings called embrasures. Battlements were originally military, but were afterwards used freely in ecclesiastical work both on parapets, and as an ornament on the transoms of windows, &c.

BEAVER, BEVOR, BEVER, p. 108, def. 3.

Fig. 1. Fig. 2.



Helmet, time of Henry VII.

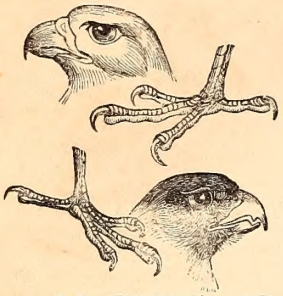
1. Beaver closed. 2. Beaver raised.

BIRDS—ORNITHOLOGY—NAT. HISTORY.

ACCIPITER, p. 9, def. 2.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.



Accipiters. 1. Head and Foot of Gerfalcon. 2. Head and Foot of Orange Legged Falcon.

ADJUTANT, p. 19, last def.

The Ciconia argala of Temminck. A singular bird, easily tamed, and hardy, though a native of the warmer parts of India. It is one of the most voracious carnivorous birds known, and so fond of swallowing bones, that it has been called the bone-eater, or bone-taker.

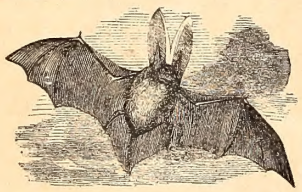
ALIPED, p. 34.



Aliped, Long-eared Bat.

ANSERS, p. 51, def. 1.

Generic character of Ansers. a White fronted Goose (Anser Erythropus). b The Tame Goose (Anas Anser).

In Linnæus' system, the third order of Aves or fowls, whose characteristics are a smooth bill; broadest at the point, covered with a smooth skin, and furnished with teeth. The tongue is fleshy, and the toes are webbed or palmated. It includes all the web-footed water fowls, with legs and feet adapted to swimming.

APTERYX, p. 64.

It uses its long beak sometimes in walking, almost as if it was a third leg. None of the species are much larger than a good-sized fowl. It is a genus of birds that in a few years will be extinct.

Apteryx (Apteryx mantelli).

BIRDS—Continued.

BALŒNICEPS, n.

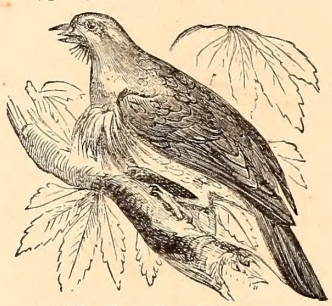
Balœniceps Rex.

A gigantic grallatorial bird, about three feet and a-half in height, with a large beak, somewhat resembling the boat-bill. It has been lately found in the interior of Africa. Its large flat bill must be useful to it in capturing and crushing the lizards and other reptiles on which it feeds.

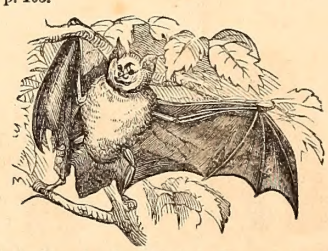
BARBET, p. 99, def. 2.



African Barbet (Pogonias hirsutus).

Are distinguished by their large conical beak, which appears swollen, or, as it were, puffed out at the sides of its base, and by being bearded with five tufts of stiff bristles directed forwards; whence the name.

BAT, p. 103.

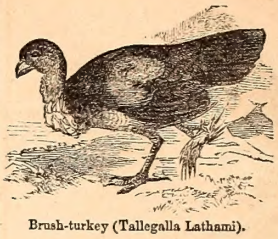


Greater Horseshoe Bat (Rhinolophus Ferrumequinum).

BITTERN, p. 125.

BIRDS—Continued.

BRUSH-TURKEY, n. The name given by the colonists to a large gregarious rasorial bird of Australia, the Tallegalla Lathami. This curious bird was at one time regarded as a vulture. It collects great quantities of sticks and leaves, with which it raises mounds, in which the female deposits her eggs.



Brush-turkey (Tallegalla Lathami).

BULL-FINCH, p. 155.

Bull-finch (Pyrrhula vulgaris.)

BUSTARD, p. 158.

The great bustard (Otis tarda) is an European species; O. nigriceps is an Asiatic species; and O. cœrulescens, an African species.

Great Bustard (Otis tarda).

CASSOWARY, p. 179.

Crested Cassowary.

COCKATOO, p. 219.

Distinguished from all others, and from one another, by their crests, which are composed of a tuft of elegant feathers, and which the bird can raise and depress at pleasure.

Tricolor-crested Cockatoo.

BIRDS—Continued.

CHAFFINCH, p. 189.

Chaffinch (Fringilla cœlebs).

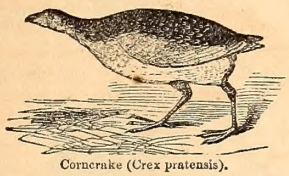
The male is distinguished by his brilliant plumage.

CORMORANT, p. 267, def. 1.

Green Cormorant (Phalacrocorax graculus).

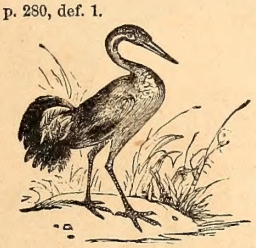
Its nest is composed entirely of a mass of sea-weed, frequently heaped up to the height of two feet, in which are deposited from three to five eggs, of a pale bluish-white, with a rough surface.

CORN-CRAKE, p. 267.



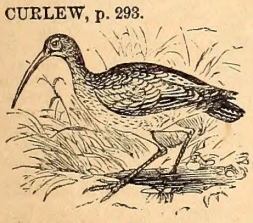
Cornerake (Crex pratensis).

CRANE, p. 280, def. 1.



Common Crane (Ardea grus).

CURLEW, p. 293.



Common Curlew (Numenius arquata).

It has a long bill; its color is diversified with ash and black; and the largest species spread more than three feet of wings. It frequents the seashore in winter, and in summer retires to the mountains.

DIPPER, p. 336, def. 3.

Dipper (Cinclus aquaticus).

It has received the name, dipper, from its usual action of bending down the head, and flirting up the tail at the same time when sitting.

BIRDS—Continued.

CURASSOW, n.

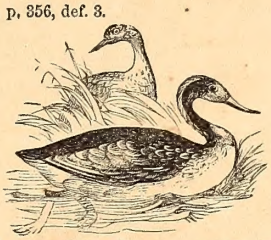
Crested Curassow (Crax alector).

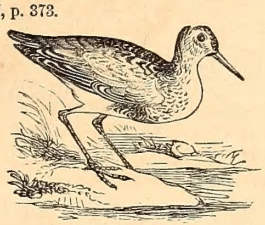
A bird as large as a hen-turkey, and of a deep shining black color. It has a round hard yellow knob on the upper mandible of the bill between the nostrils, and on the head a crest of long black feathers projecting forward at the point. The crested curassow is the Craxæ alector, a native of Guiana, Mexico, and Brazil.

DIVER, p. 356, def. 3.



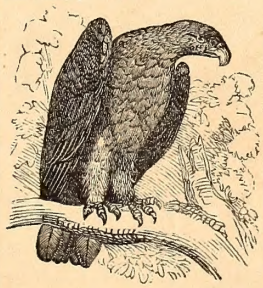
Red-throated Diver (Colymbus septentrionalis).

DUNLIN, p. 373.



Dunlin (Tringa variabilis).

EAGLE, p. 375, def. 1.



Golden Eagle.

The eagle is one of the largest species of fowls, has a keen sight, and preys on small animals, fish, &c. He lives to a great age; and it is said that one died at Vienna after a confinement of a hundred and four years. On account of the elevation and rapidity of his flight, and of his great strength, he is called the king of birds. Hence the figure of an eagle was made the standard of the Romans, and a spread eagle is a principal figure in the arms of the United States of America. Hence also, in heraldry, it is one of the most noble bearings in armory.

EIDER-DUCK, p. 382.

Eider-duck (Anas mollissima).

It is about twice the size of the common duck, and frequents solitary rocky shores and islands. In Greenland and Iceland these birds occur in great numbers. The down of the eider-duck is much valued, from its superior warmth, lightness, and elasticity.

BIRDS—Continued.

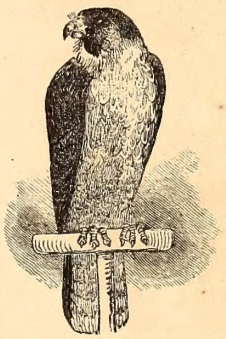
EGRET, p. 382, def. 1.

Little Egret (Ardea garzetta).

EMU, p. 392.

Emu (Dromaius Novæ Hollandiæ).

FALCON, p. 434, def. 1.



Falcon (F. peregrinus).

It is said that this name is, by sportsmen, given to the female alone; for the male is smaller, weaker, and less courageous, and is therefore called tircelet or tarsel.

FALLOW-FINCH, p. 436.

It is one of the earliest among those birds which seek to pass the season of reproduction far to the north of their winter quarters. In summer it is found all over Britain. The male sings prettily, though not loudly. Food mostly worms and insects. Length of the adult bird, six and a half inches.

FRATERCULA, n.

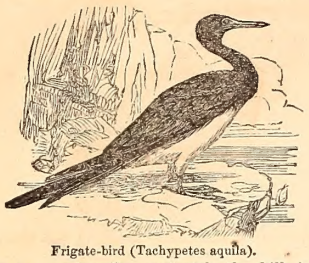
Common Puffin (Fratercula arctica).

The Puffin; a genus of web-footed birds belonging to Cuvier's division of Brachypteres, or short-winged birds; and generally, though improperly, included in the genus Alca, the penguin. They are all inhabitants of the colder seas of the northern hemisphere; they are bad walkers, but skim along the surface of the sea with considerable swiftness.

BIRDS—Continued.

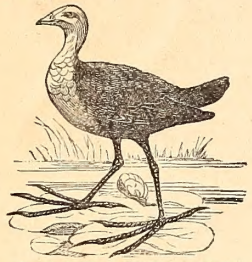
FRIGATE-BIRD, p. 482.



Frigate-bird (Tachypetes aquila).

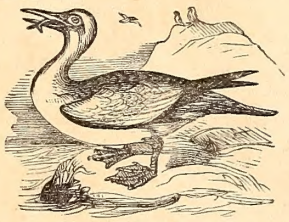
They are eminently raptorial, the bill is long, robust, and strong. Their immense extent of wing and dashing habits, have obtained for them the name of the swiftest sailing ships of war. The best known species is the T. aquila, very common in the intertropical American coasts, and in the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, but always within reach of land.

GALLINULE, p. 492.



Purple Gallinule (Fullica porphyrio).

GANNET, p. 493.



Gannet (Pelecanus bassanus).

GOLDEN PHEASANT, n. [Phasianus pictus.]

Golden Pheasant (Phasianus pictus).

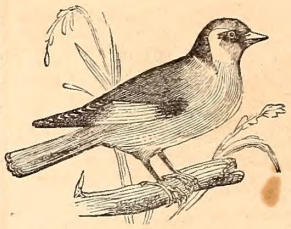
This bird is a native of China and is esteemed the most beautiful of its genus, from the richness and multiplicity of the tints of its plumage, which contrast admirably with each other.

GOSHAWK, p. 513.

Goshawk attired.

BIRDS—Continued.

GOLDFINCH, p. 511.



Goldfinch (Fringilla carduelis).

A well-known and gayly plumaged songster.

GRALLATORES.

Grallatores. a, Head and foot of Bittern; b, do. of Crane; c, do. of Stork.

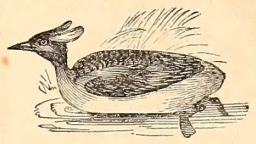
They are long-legged waders, and hold an intermediate station between the gallinaceous birds, which are restricted to the land, and the natatorial groups, which are confined to the water. The order includes the cranes, herons, plovers, snipes, rails, coots, &c., &c.

GREBE, p. 519.



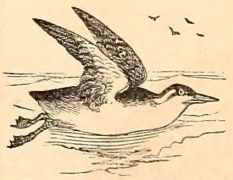
Horned Grebe (Podiceps cornutus).

The grebes are the inhabitants of the smaller lakes and ponds; the bill is more or less conic; the feet with toes partly webbed, and partly pinnated; and the tarsus compressed.

GROUSE, p. 523.

Red Grouse (Tetrao Scoticus).

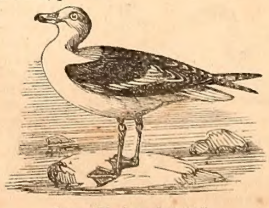
GUILLEMOT, p. 525.



Common Guillemot (Uria troile).

The guillemots are thick and clumsy birds, and form, as it were, a link between those birds which may be said to be equally fitted for the air and the water, and those others in which the aquatic habit predominates.

GULL, p. 525.

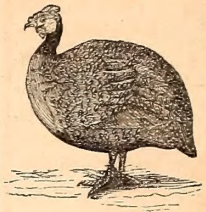


Lesser Black-backed Gull.

They are exceedingly numerous, much on the wing, and particularly noisy. They are found on the shores of all latitudes.

BIRDS—Continued.

GUINEA-HEN, p. 525.



HANGNEST, p. 553.

Hangnest (Baltimore Oriole).

HARPY-EAGLE, n. The Harpyia destructor of Linn., or Thrasætus harpyia of modern zoologists, an accipitrine bird of Mexico and South America, celebrated for the enormous development of its legs and beak, and for the strength and power it evinces in mastering its prey.

Harpy-eagle (Thrasætus harpyia).

HERON, p. 549.

Common Heron (Ardea cinerea).

HORNBILL, p. 561.

Hornbill (Buceros rhinosceros).

Their most remarkable character is the bill, which is not only of very large size in itself, but is studded with excrescences, which sometimes equal in size the bill itself, and which are always of considerable extent above. They are about the size of a turkey, but have a much slenderer body. The color is black, with the tail white, crossed by a black bar. They are natives of Africa, India, &c.

HUMMING-BIRD, p. 566.

Humming-bird (Ornismaya ornata).

These beautiful birds, which may be termed the gems of animated nature, are peculiar to America, and almost exclusively tropical.

BIRDS—Continued.

IBIS, p. 572.

Ibis religiosa.

This is found throughout Africa. It was reared in the temples of ancient Egypt, with a degree of respect bordering on adoration. Ibis rubra, another species, is found in all the hot parts of America.

ICTORIA.

Chattering Fly-catcher (Ictoria viridis).

A genus of birds belonging to the family Merulidæ. I. viridis, chattering fly-catcher, abounds in most parts of North America during the summer-months. It has the faculty of mimicking almost any noise that it hears, which it will repeat during the whole night if the weather be fine.

JACANA. A genus of grallatores or wading birds, having long toes, the nails of which are very long and pointed, from which peculiarity they have received their vulgar name of Surgeons. They are noisy and quarrelsome birds, inhabiting marshes in hot climates.

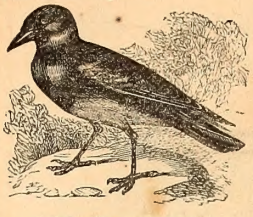
Long-tailed Jacana (Parra sinensis).

JER-FALCON. The Falco gyrfalco, the boldest and most beautiful of the falcon tribe, approaching in size nearly to that of the osprey. It is a native of the cold and dreary regions of the North. Next to the eagle it is the most formidable, active, and intrepid of all rapacious birds, and the most esteemed for falconry.

Jer-falcon (Falco gyrfalco).

BIRDS—Continued.

JACKDAW, p. 628.



Jackdaw (Corvus monedula).

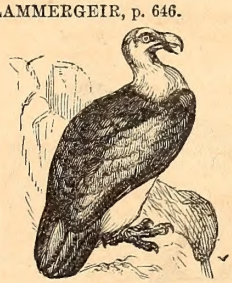
The jackdaws frequent church-steeples, deserted chimneys, old towers, and ruins, in flocks, where they build their nests. The daw may be readily tamed, and taught to imitate the sounds of words.

KINGFISHER, p. 640.

Kingfisher (Ispida gigantea).

They occur in all parts of the world, especially in warm climates, there being only one species in Europe.

LAMMERGEIR, p. 646.



Lammergeir or Bearded Vulture.

Measuring upward of four feet from beak to tail, and nine or ten in the expanse of its wings.

LESTRIS. A genus of palmipede birds, distinguished from the true gulls by their membraneous nostrils being larger, and opening nearer to the point and edge of the beak; the tail is also pointed. The L. parasiticus is the arctic gull, and the L. cataractes, the Skua gull; the most formidable of all the gull kind. They both force gulls and other sea-birds to give up their prey; hence their name, lestris meaning a robber.

Head of Skua gull (Lestris cataractes).

LOVE-BIRDS.

Swindern's Love-bird (Psittacula swinderiana).

Psittacula, a group of birds belonging to the Psittacidæ. They are a beautiful group, consisting of very diminutive species; they are found in both continents, and are remarkable for having no furcula, and receive their name from the great attachment shown to each other by the male and female birds.

BIRDS—Continued.

LONGIROSTERS, p. 675.

Longirosters. a, Black-tailed Godwit. b, Stilt Plover. c, Glossy Ibis.

LORY, p. 677.

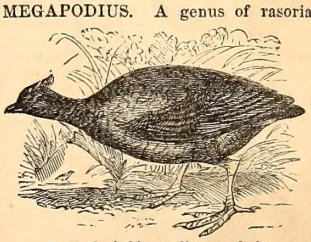
Purple-capped Lory (Lorius domicellus).

MAGPIE, p. 685.

Magpie (Pica caudata).

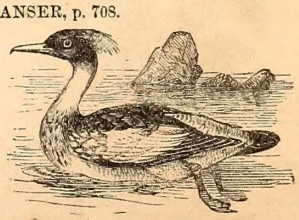
The magpies continue in pairs throughout the year, and prey on a variety of food, chiefly animal. They are celebrated for their crafty instincts, their power of imitating words, and their propensity to purloin and secrete glittering articles.

MEGAPODIUS. A genus of rasorial birds, with large feet. The jungle-fowl, or M. tumulus of Gould, is a large bird of Australia, of singular habits, so called from erecting considerable mounds, instead of nests, for incubation.



Jungle-fowl (Megapodius tumulus).

MERGANSER, p. 708.



Red-breasted Merganser (Mergus serrator).

BIRDS—Continued.

MELIPHAGA. The honey-eaters, a genus of tenuirostral birds, the type of the family Meliphagidæ. The species abound in Australia, and live chiefly on the juices and nectar of flowers.

Honey-eater (Meliphaga carunculata).

MENURA, or MÆNURA. A singular genus of birds inhabiting New South Wales, and belonging to the family Megapodinæ, or Great-foots, Swainson. The only species known is the Lyre-tail, M. superba lyra, or paradisea. Its size is a little less than that of a common pheasant. The tail of the male is remarkable for the three sorts of feathers that compose it, and notwithstanding the somber hues of this bird, the magnificence and peculiar structure of the tail, which imitates the form of an ancient Grecian lyre, give it a superb appearance.

Menura superba lyra.

MOCKING-BIRD, p. 722.

It is much sought for on account of its wonderful faculty of imitating the tone of every inhabitant of the woods, from the twitter of the humming-bird to the scream of the eagle.

Mocking-bird (Turdus Polyglottus).

NUMIDIAN CRANE.

Numidian Crane (Anthropoides virgo).

A grallatorial bird, of the genus Anthropoides, the A. virgo. It is a native of many parts of Asia and Africa, and is remarkable for the grace and symmetry of its form, and the elegance of its deportment. It is also termed the demoiselle.

BIRDS—Continued.

MOORCOCK, p. 728.

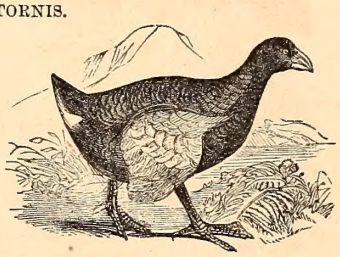
Moorfowl, or Red Grouse (Tetrao Scoticus).

NIGHTINGALE, p. 752, def. 1.

Nightingale (Philomela luscinia).

It is about six inches in length. It is a bird of passage, appearing in Europe about the beginning of April, and leaving it early in autumn. It is solitary in its habits; never associating in flocks like most of the smaller birds.

NOTORNIS.



A genus of grallatorial birds, allied to Porphyrio, originally described from some fossil bones brought from New Zealand. Subsequently, however, a species of the bird was obtained, and the skin was sent to London.

NUT-HATCH, p. 760.

Nut-hatch (Sitta Europæa).

It is a scansorial bird, of shy and solitary habits, frequenting woods and feeding on insects chiefly. It also eats the kernel of the hazel-nut, breaking the shell with great dexterity. The female lays her eggs in holes of trees, and hisses like a snake when disturbed.

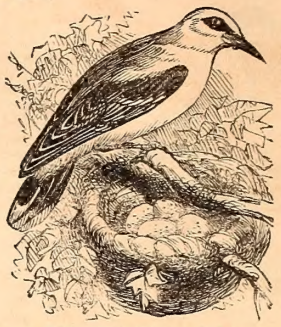
OSTRICH, p. 781.

Ostrich (Struthio-camelus).

The female lays from ten to twelve eggs in the sand, and although she does not incubate them continually, no bird has a stronger affection for its offspring, or watches its nest with greater assiduity, always brooding over her eggs at night, and only leaving them during the hottest parts of the day.

BIRDS—Continued.

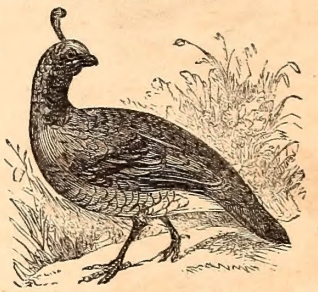
ORIOLE, p. 779.



Golden Oriole (Oriolus galbula).

These birds are found in Asia, Africa, the islands of the Indian Archipelago, and southern and eastern Europe. They live in pairs in woods and thickets, congregating, however, for autumnal migration. Their nests are very artificially framed, and constructed at the extremities of the branches of high trees. The prevailing color of the males is yellow, and this character is constant in the greater number of species known.

ORTYX. [Gr. ορτυξ, a quail.]



Californian Quail (Ortyx Californica).

A genus of gallinaceous birds, which may be regarded as the partridges and quails of America, but differing from those of the eastern hemisphere in some striking features. They have a shorter and stouter beak, more convex above, and some have remarkable recurved top-knots.

OWL, p. 788.

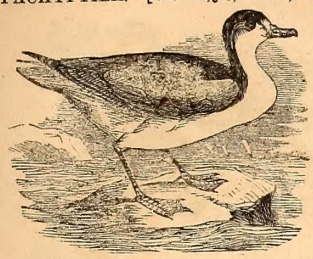
Barn Owl (Strix flammea).

Horned Owl (Strix otus).

These birds are found in every country, but their head-quarters may be said to be in northerly and cold climates. They feed, for the most part, upon small mammalia, little birds, and insects. The head is large, the eyes very large, directed to the front, and covered by a circular concha or shell of feathers. The irides expand to a great size during the night, which enables the owl to see better during the night than diurnal birds. During the day the irides are contracted to a very small size. The voice of the owl is harsh and screeching. The most common species is the barn owl (Strix flammea), which frequents barns, towers, churches, old ruins, etc. Other species are, the horned owl, long-eared and short-eared owls, scops-eared owl, snowy owl, tawny owl, and little owl.

BIRDS—Continued.

PACHYPTILA. [Gr. παχυς, thick, and πτιλον, a soft feather.] The whale-bird, a genus of web-footed birds, allied to the petrels. There are two species, which occur frequently in the seas of the southern hemisphere.



Blue Petrel (Pachyptila cœrulea).

PALAMEDEA. A Linnæan genus of birds, placed by M. Vigors among the grallatores. The P. cornuta, or horned screamer, is a South American bird larger than a common goose, having a long spear-shaped horn projecting from the forehead. It lives in marshy or inundated places, which it makes to resound with its wild and loud cry.

Horned Screamer (Palamedea cornuta).

PALMIPED, p. 793.

Palmipeds. a White fronted Goose (Anser Erythropus). b The Tame Goose (Anas Anser).

The goose and duck are familiar examples.

PARROT, p. 799.

Parrot (Psittacus eximius).

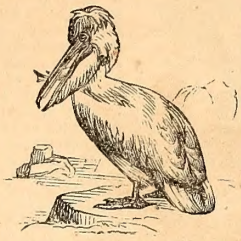
These fowls are found almost every where in tropical climates. They breed in hollow trees, and subsist on fruits and seeds. They are also remarkable for the faculty of making indistinct articulations of words in imitation of the human voice.

PARTRIDGE, p. 801.

Red-legged Partridge (P. rufus).

BIRDS—Continued.

PELICAN, p. 809, def. 1.



Crested Pelican (Pelicanus crispus).

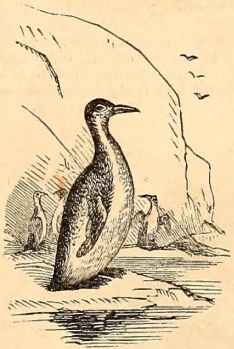
The pelican has a peculiar tenderness for its young, and feeds them with fish that have been macerated for some time in her pouch; hence has arisen the fabulous story of this bird feeding her young by drawing blood from the parent breast. Pelicans are to a certain extent gregarious, very fond of fish, which they capture with great adroitness, generally in shallow inlets. The species are found in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, though not numerous.

PENELOPE.

Crested Guan (Penelope cristata).

A genus of gallinaceous birds inhabiting the New World. P. cristata is found in a wild state in Guiana and Brazil, and resembles the curassows both in appearance and manners. They are called guans, and from being variable in plumage, the species are difficult to define.

PENGUIN, p. 810, def. 1.



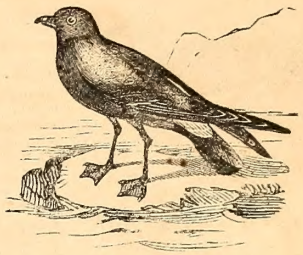
Penguins seldom go on shore except in the season of breeding, when they burrow like rabbits. On land they stand erect; they are tame, and may be driven like a flock of sheep. In water they swim with rapidity, being assisted by their wings.

PHEASANT, p. 821.

Silver Pheasant.

BIRDS—Continued.

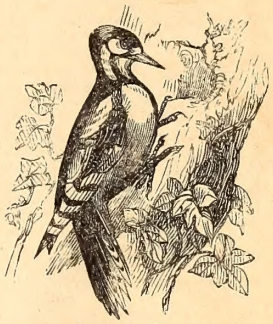
PETREL, p. 820.



Stormy Petrel.

Well known to seamen by the name of Mother Carey's chickens. Their name, Petrel, is an abridgment of the Italian word Petrello, or Little Peter; from their appearing to walk on the water, and occasionally sinking into it, in their eager quest of prey. They are found in every part of the world, on the ocean at great distances from land, generally at twilight or in stormy weather. They fly rapidly, and generally close to the water. The appearance of these birds is considered by seamen to presage a storm. There are four species, very closely allied to each other.

PICUS. The woodpecker; an extensive and well-defined genus of zygodactylic or yoke-footed birds, distributed over most parts of the globe. They are characterized by their long, straight, angular beak, the end of which is compressed into a wedge, and fitted for splitting the bark of trees; by their slender tongue armed near the tip with spines that curve backwards, and by their tail composed of ten quills, with stiff and elastic stems, which acts as a prop in supporting them while climbing.



Picus major.

PIGEON, p. 826.

Fan-tail Pigeon (Columba var. tremula laticauda).

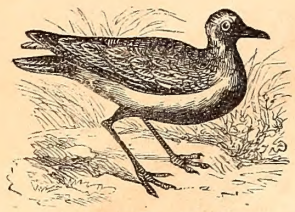
Passenger Pigeon (Columba migratoria).

They may be considered as among the greatest consumers of the fruits of the earth. They are all exclusively, or nearly so, vegetable feeders, and very voracious.

BIRDS—Continued.

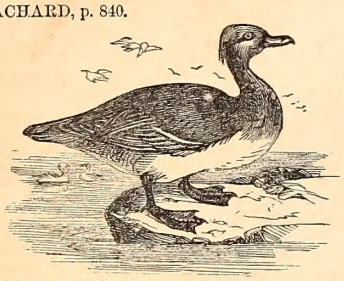
PLOVER, p. 838.



Golden Plover (Charadrius pluvialis).

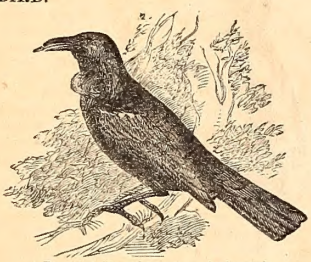
They inhabit all parts of the world, traversing temperate climates in the spring and autumn. They are gregarious, and are generally seen in meadows, on the banks of rivers, or on the sea shore.

POACHARD, p. 840.



Tufted Pochard (Fuligula cristata).

POE-BIRD.



Poe-bird (Prosthemadera cincinnata).

The Prosthemadera cincinnata, a New Zealand bird, belonging to the family of the honey-eaters. It is greatly valued by the natives of the southern islands, on account of its glossy plumage, which contributes to the ornaments of the feathered mantles worn by their chiefs.

POWTER, or POUTER, p. 853.

Powter Pigeon (Columba var. Gutturosa subrubicunda).

A variety of the common domestic pigeon, with an inflated breast.

PRESSIROSTERS, p. 864.

Pressirosters. a, Plover. b, Lapwing. c, Ring Dottrel.

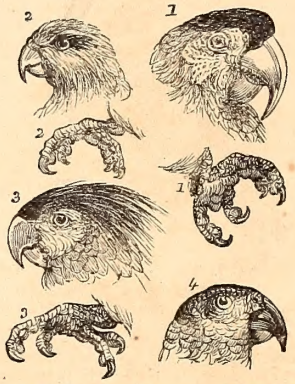
A tribe of wading birds in Cuvier's arrangement, the second family of the Grallæ, including those which have a flattened or compressed beak, as the bustard, plover, and lapwing.

BIRDS—Continued.

PROMEROPS. A genus of insessorial birds, many of which are remarkable for the beauty of their plumage and its singular arrangement. They have a longish bill, an extensible tongue, and feed upon insects, soft fruits, and the saccharine juices of plants. One species (P. superba) is a native of New Guinea.

Promerops superba.

PSITTACIDÆ.



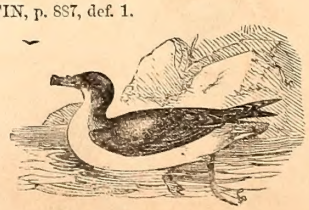
Psittacidæ. 1. Head and foot of Aracanga. 2. Do. of blue-bellied Lorikeet. 3. Do. of Goliath Aratoo. 4. Head of ash-colored Gray Parrot.

The parrot tribe, a family of scansorial birds, of which the genus Psittacus (parrots) is the type. Besides the true parrots it contains the maccaws, parrakeets, cockatoos, lories, and several other species. These birds are remarkable for their beautiful colors, their powerful bill, their fleshy tongue, and their power of imitating the human voice.

PTARMIGAN, p. 886.

Ptarmigan (Tetrao lagopus).

PUFFIN, p. 887, def. 1.

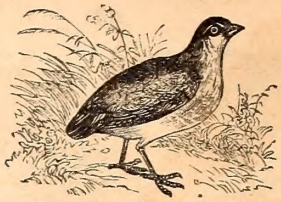


Puffin (Manx Shearwater).

These birds breed in immense numbers on the northern coast of Scotland and in the neighboring islands, whose inhabitants salt them for their winter provision.

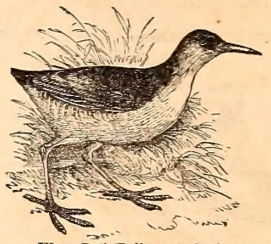
BIRDS—Continued.

QUAIL, p. 896.



Common Quail (Coturnix vulgaris).

RAIL, p. 905.



Water Rail (Rallus aquaticus).

RAMPHASTOS. [Gr. ῥαμφος, a beak.] The Toucans, a genus of scansorial birds, and type of the family Ramphastidæ. They are distinguished by their enormous beak, in some species nearly as thick and as long as the whole body. The birds do not appear to be incommoded by the apparently unwieldy size of the powerful beak, in the use of which they are very expert. Their plumage is brilliant. They are natives of tropical America, living chiefly in small companies in the deep forests; and are omnivorous, but delight especially in eggs and young birds.

Ramphastos maximus.

RASORIALS, p. 910.

Rasores. 1. Head and foot of Gallus Bankiva. 2. Do. of Common Pheasant. 3. Do. of Wild Turkey. 4. Do. of Common Grouse.

Gallinaceous birds or scratchers. The name of an order of birds, including those which have strong feet, provided with strong claws for scratching up grains, etc., and the upper mandible vaulted, with the nostrils pierced in a membraneous space at its base, and covered by a cartilaginous scale.

BIRDS—Continued.

RAVEN, p. 912.

It flies high, scents carrion at a distance of several miles, and feeds also on fruit and small animals. It is found in every part of the globe.

Raven (Corvus corax).

RAZOR-BILL, p. 912.

Razor-bill Auk (Alca torda).

REDTAIL, p. 924.

Also known by the names of red warbler or red robin.

Redstart (Sylvia phœnicurus).

REGENT-BIRD. The Sericulus chrysocephalus, a very beautiful bird of Australia, belonging to the Meliphagidæ, or honey-eaters. The color of the plumage is golden yellow, and deep velvety black. It was discovered during the regency of George IV., and was named in compliment to him.

Regent-bird (Sericulus chrysocephalus).

RICE-BUNTING, p. 954.

One of the names of the paddy bird or Java sparrow, the Loxia Oryzivora, Linn. In Java and other parts of Asia where it is found, it commits great ravages in the rice fields with its sharp and powerful bill. It is admired for its elegant shape and coloring.

Rice-bird (Loxia oryzivora).

BIRDS—Continued.

ROLLER, p. 962, def. 3.

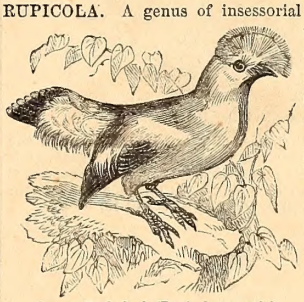
The rollers are allied to the crows and jays, but more wild and intractable than either.

Roller (Coracias garrula).

RUFF, p. 968, def. 4.

Ruff (Machetes pugnax).

RUPICOLA. A genus of insessorial birds termed rock manikins or cocks of the rock. Two species, R. aurantia and R. peruviana, inhabit South America. The adult males are of a most splendid orange color.



Orange Rock Cock (Rupicola aurantia).

SCANSORES, p. 985.

Scansores. a, Head and foot of Cuckoo. b, Do. of Green Woodpecker. c, Do. of Great Jacamar.

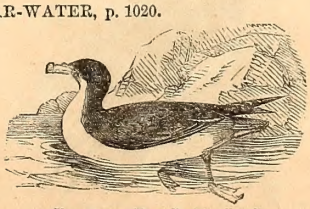
SHEAR-WATER, p. 1020.



Shear-water (Procellaria puffinus).

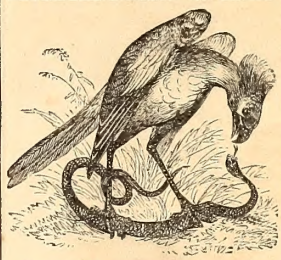
BIRDS—Continued.

SCISSOR-TAIL.

Scissor-tail (Milvulus forficatus).

A South American bird, the Milvulus forficatus, and belonging to the family of butcher birds. It has a forked tail, terminated by two long feathers. When on the wing, it has the power of turning in the air very quickly, and in so doing opens and shuts its tail just like a pair of scissors.

SECRETARY-BIRD. An African bird of prey, of the genus Gypogeranus, the G. serpentarius, called also the snake-eater. It is about three feet in length; the legs are long, so as to resemble those of a heron; the beak is hooked, and the eyelids projecting. It has an occipital crest of feathers, which can be raised or depressed at pleasure.



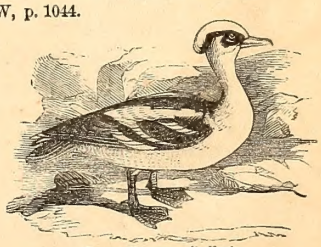
Secretary (Gypogeranus serpentarius).

SHRIKE, p. 1027.

They have been called butcher-birds from their habit of suspending their prey, after depriving it of life, upon thorns.

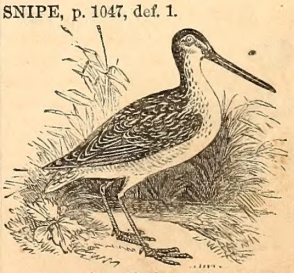
Forked-tailed Crested Shrike (Lanius forficatus).

SMEW, p. 1044.



Smew (Mergus albellus).

SNIPE, p. 1047, def. 1.



It is remarkable for the length of its bill, its peculiar cry, and the drumming-like noise it makes in summer.

Common Snipe (Scolopax gallinago).

BIRDS—Continued.

SPARROW-HAWK, p. 1059.

Sparrow-Hawk (Falco nisus).

It is colored like the gos-hawk, but its legs are longer, and it is a third less in size.

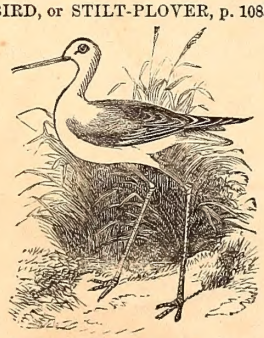
SPOONBILL, p. 1067.

European Spoonbill (Platalea leucorodia).

STARLING, p. 1078, def. 1.

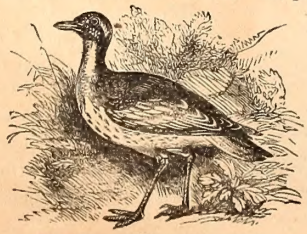
Starling (Sturnus vulgaris).

STILT-BIRD, or STILT-PLOVER, p. 1085.



Stilt-Plover (Himantopus melanopterus).

STONE-CURLEW, or STONE-PLOVER, p. 1088.



Stone-Plover (Œdicnemus crepitans).

BIRDS—Continued.

STORK, p. 1089.

White Stork (Ciconia alba).

They are tall and stately birds, and easily distinguished from the herons by their small mouth, the beak being moderately cleft, and destitute of the nasal furrow. Most of them inhabit Europe. Their food consists of fish, reptiles, small quadrupeds, worms, and insects.

SULTANA.

Sultana-bird (Porphyrio martinica).

A magnificent species of marsh-bird, found in the West Indies and the southern United States; it is the Porphyrio martinica. Like its congeners, it has long toes, which support it on the aquatic herbage which often covers the places of its resort.

SUN-BIRDS.

Sun-birds (Cynniris afra), Male and Female.

Cinnyridæ, a family of birds found principally in the tropical parts of Africa and Asia, and in the adjacent islands. They live on the juices of flowers; their nature is gay, and their song agreeable. They hold the same place in the old world that humming birds do in the new.

SWALLOW, p. 1116.

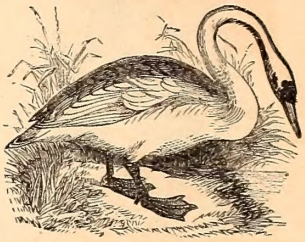
Chimney Swallow (Hirundo rustica).

BIRDS—Continued.

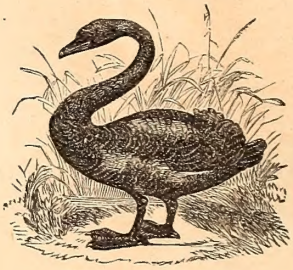
SWALLOW.

House Martin (Hirundo urbica).

SWAN, p. 1116.

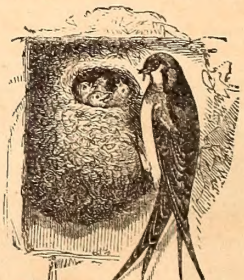


Wild Swan or Hooper (Cygnus ferus).



Black Swan (Cygnus atratus).

SWIFT, p. 1119, def. 3.



Swift (Cypselus murarius).

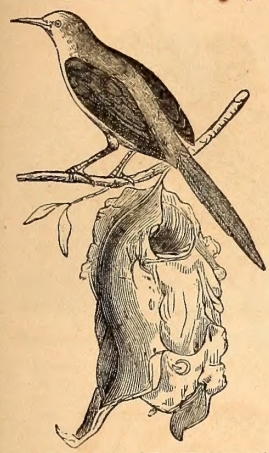
TANAGER, p. 1128.

Tanager (Tanagra cyanocephala).

There are several species, all resembling the finches in their habits. They are remarkable for their bright colors.

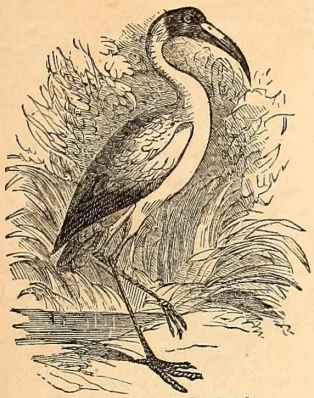
BIRDS—Continued.

TAILOR-BIRD. A name applied to several of the soft-billed Indian birds, allied to the warblers, as the Sylvia sutoria, the Orthotomus Bennettii. These birds construct their nests by stitching together the leaves of plants; hence the name.



Indian Tailor-bird and Nest (Orthotomus longicauda).

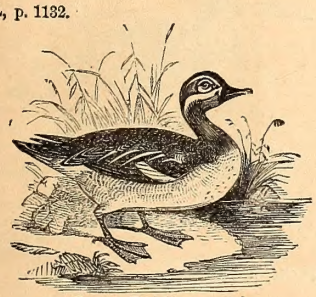
TANTALUS.



Wood-ibis (Tantalus loculator).

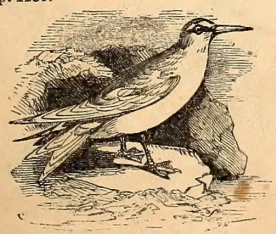
A genus of wading birds, the type of the family Tantalidæ. The species are known by the name of wood-ibis. T. loculator is the wood-ibis of America, which frequents extensive swamps, where it feeds on serpents, young alligators, frogs, and other reptiles.

TEAL, p. 1132.



Common Teal (Anas crecca).

TERN, p. 1139.



Lesser Tern (Sterna minuta).

BIRDS—Continued.

TENUIROSTERS, p. 1138.

Heads of Tenuirosters. a, Sun-bird (Nectarinea afra). b, Humming-bird (Trochilus recurvirostris). c, Fork-tailed blue-vented Bee-Eater (Merops cæruleo-cephalus). d, European Nuthatch (Sitta Europea). e, Rufous-vented Kingfisher (Alcedo rufiventor).

TIGRISOMA.

Tiger-bittern (Tigrosoma tigrinia).

The tiger-bittern, a subgenus of bitterns found in South America, and so named from their color being dark reddish brown, barred and marked with black, somewhat like a tiger.

TINAMON, or TINAMUS. They are remarkable for a long slender neck, covered with feathers, the tips of the barbs being slender and slightly curled. They vary in size from that of a pheasant down to that of a quail, and even smaller.

Great Tinamon (T. Braziliensis).

TOUCAN, p. 1162.

Red-billed Toucan (Ramphastos erythorynchus).

BIRDS—Continued.

TITMOUSE, p. 1157.

Blue Titmouse, Male and Female (Parus cæruleus).

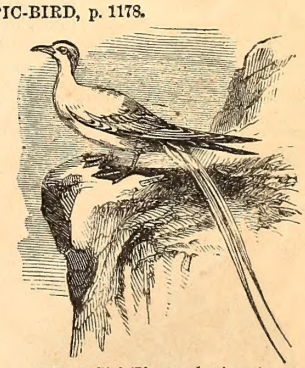
TOURACO. A genus of birds (Corythaix), natives of Africa, allied to the Scansores. The most elegant species is the C. erythrolophus of Swainson. Its crest is red, and it is erected when the bird is excited, giving the head the appearance of being helmeted.

Touraco (Corythaix erythrolophus).

TROGON, or CURUCUI. A genus of scansorial birds, and type of the family Trogonidæ. There are numerous species, all of them possessing most brilliantly colored plumage, only second in splendor to the humming-birds.

Trogon pavoninus.

TROPIC-BIRD, p. 1178.



Tropic-Bird (Phaeton phœnicurus).

The wings are long and the feet slender; their flight is swift and graceful. They are to be seen disporting in the air far at sea, and when they perceive a ship they never fail to sail round it. They generally return every evening to land, to roost in the midst of the rocks. Their food appears to consist entirely of fish.

BIRDS—Continued.

TRUMPETER, p. 1179, def. 3.

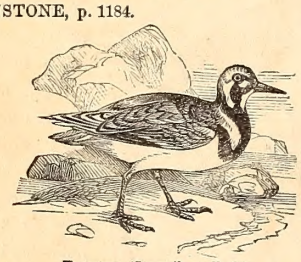
Trumpeter (Peophia crepitans).

TURKEY, p. 1183.

The size of this noble bird, and the delicious quality of its flesh and eggs, have rendered it extremely common.

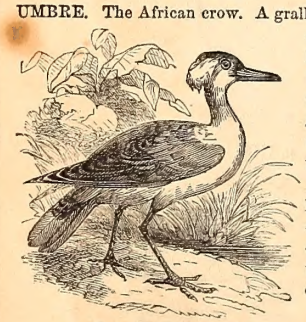
American Wild Turkey (Meleagris gallo-pavo).

TURNSTONE, p. 1184.



Turnstone (Strepsilas collaris).

UMBRE. The African crow. A grallatorial bird, the only species known being the crested or tufted umbre, Scopus umbretta. It is diffused throughout all Africa, is as large as a crow, of an umber color, and has a tuft on its crown.



Umbre (Scopus umbretta).

VAMPYRE, p. 1225, def. 2.

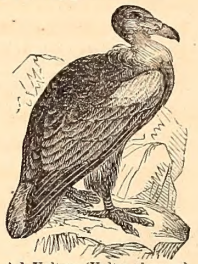
Vampyre (Phyllostoma spectrum).

BIRDS—Continued.

UPUPA. The hoopoe, a genus of insessorial or perching birds, distinguished by an ornament on the head, formed of a double range of long feathers, which they can erect at will. U. epops, or common hoopoe, is supposed to be an inhabitant of the whole of North Africa.

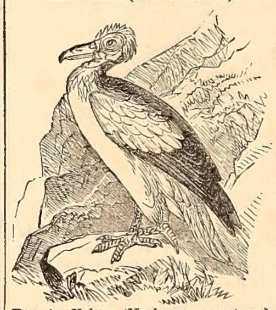
Hoopoe (Upupa epops).

VULTURE, p. 1243.



Ash Vulture (Vultur cinereus).

The strength of their talons does not correspond with their size, and they make more use of their claws. In general, the birds belonging to this genus are of a cowardly nature, living chiefly on dead carcasses and offal. Their geographical distribution is confined chiefly to warm countries, where they act as scavengers to purify the earth from the putrid carcasses with which it would otherwise be encumbered.

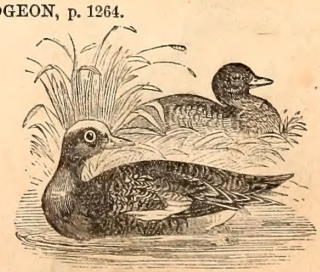


Egyptian Vulture (Nephron percnopterus).

WHIP-PO-WILL, p. 1261.

Whip-po-will (Caprimulgus vociferus).

WIDGEON, p. 1264.



Common Widgeon (Anas penelope).

BIRDS—Continued.

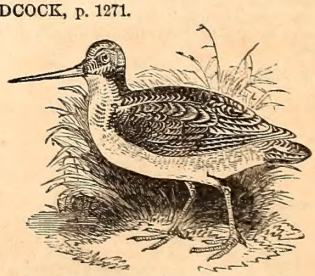
WALL-CREEPER, p. 1246.

Wall-creeper (Certhia muraria).

WEAVERS, p. 1255, def. 2.

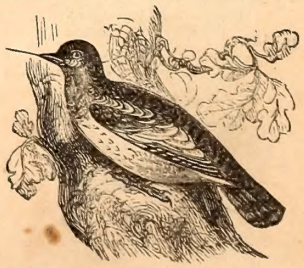
Yellow-crowned Weaver and Nest (Ploceus icterocephalus).

WOODCOCK, p. 1271.



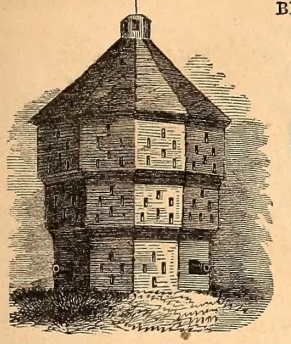
Woodcock (Scolopax rusticola).

WRYNECK, p. 1276, def. 3.



Wryneck (Yunx torquilla).

BLOCK-HOUSE, p. 130.



Block-house erected in 1780 near the Mohawk River.

Block-houses are supplied with loop-holes for musketry and with embrasures for cannon, and when of several stories, the upper ones are made to overhang those below, and are furnished with machicolations or loop-holes in the overhung floor, so that a perpendicular fire can be directed against the enemy in close attack. When a block-house stands alone, it constitutes an independent fort, and is of great advantage in mountainous countries; when it is formed in the interior of a field-work, it becomes a retrenchment or redoubt. Stockades are sometimes called block-houses.

BIVALVE, p. 125.

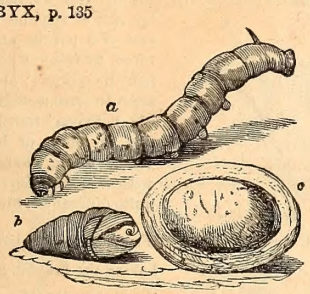
BOMBYX, p. 135



A Linnæan genus of Lepidopterous insects, now the type of a family (Bombycidæ) including many genera of nocturnal and post meridian moths. The Bombyx Mori is a caterpillar well known by the name of silk-worm. It feeds on the leaves of the mulberry, and spins an oval cocoon of a close tissue, with very fine silk, usually of a yellow color, and sometimes white. The silk-worm undergoes a variety of changes during the short period of its life. When hatched, it appears as a black worm; after it has finished its cocoon, it becomes a chrysalis, and finally a perfect insect with four wings. The annexed figures represent the worm, a, in its last stage, the chrysalis, b, and the cocoon, c.

BOTANY.

ACEROSE, p. 12, def. 2.

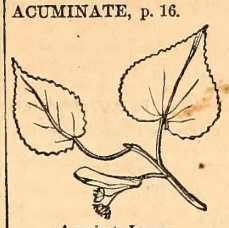
Acerose Leaves (Yew).

ACINACIFORM, p 13.

Acinaciform Leaf.

BOTANY—Continued.

ACUMINATE, p. 16.



Acuminate Leaves.

ACUTE, p. 16, def. 7.

Acute Leaves.

ADELPHIA, [αδελφος, a brother.] A collection of stamens into a bundle; a term employed by Linnæus, for those plants in which the stamens, instead of growing singly, combine into one or more parcels, or brotherhoods.

AGGREGATE. Aggregate flowers, in botany, are such as are composed of florets united by means of the receptacle, or calyx.

Aggregate Flower.

AIR-CELLS, p. 30.

AMPLEXICAUL, p. 44.

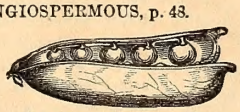
Amplexicaul Leaf.

ALTERNATE, p. 39, def. 2.

Alternate Leaves.

In botany, branches and leaves are alternate, when they rise higher on opposite sides alternately, come out singly, and follow in gradual order.

ANGIOSPERMOUS, p. 48.



Pod of an Angiospermous Plant.

As the pea, bean, rose, apple, etc.

ANTHER, p. 53.

Anthers. a, Ovary. b, Style. c, Stigma. d d, Filaments. e e, Anthers.

BINATE, p. 123.

Binate Leaves.

A binate leaf has a simple petiole, connecting two leaflets on the top; a species of digitate leaf.

BOTANY—Continued.

BIPINNATE, p. 123.

Double pinnate, applied to a compound leaf, having a common petiole, which produces two partial ones, upon which the leaflets are inserted.

BULB, p. 154.

a, Scaly Bulb. b, Coated Bulb.

Examples of bulbs are the onion, lily, tulip, etc. Turnips and beets have also been erroneously called bulbs; but these not being formed of concentric layers are not bulbs but tubers.

CALYX, p. 166.

c c, Calyx.

In general, it signifies the lowest whorl of the flower, and when not green, it receives the name of perianth, or perigone.

CAPSULE, p. 173, def. 1.

CILIATED, p. 204.

CLAVATED, p. 210.

Applied to leaves, corollæ, petals, etc.

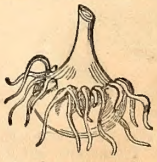
CORDATE, p. 266.

Cordate Leaf.

CONNATE, p. 250, def. 2.

Connate Leaves.

CORMUS, p. 267, def. 2.



As the crocus, etc.

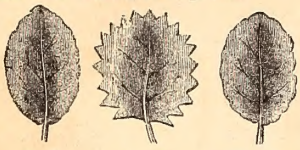
COROL, or COROLLA, p. 268.

BOTANY—Continued.

CRATERIFORM, p. 280.

Having the form of a crater; shaped like a goblet.

CRENATE, or CRENATED, p. 282.



Doubly. Acutely. Obtusely.

DECOMPOUND, p. 308, def. 2.

Decompound Leaf.

CUNEATE, p. 291.

Cuneate Leaf.

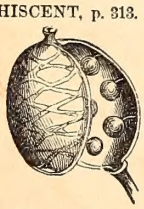
DECURRENT, p. 308.

Decurrent Leaf.

DELTOID, p. 315, def. 2.

Deltoid Leaf.

DEHISCENT, p. 313.



Dehiscent silicula.

DENTATE, p. 318.

Dentate Leaf.

DIADELPHIA, p. 329.

Diadelphia.

Diadelphia is the name given by Linnæus to his seventeenth class of plants. It consists chiefly of leguminous genera, and it is customary to place in it all the papilionaceous plants which have united stamens, whether in one parcel or two.

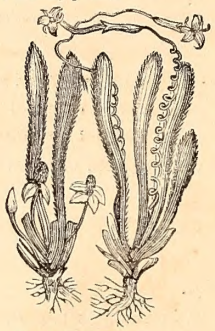
BOTANY—Continued.

DIDYNAMIA, p. 331.

Didynamia (Digitalis purpurea).

It is divided into two orders, gymnospermia and angiospermia.

DIŒCIA, p. 336.



Diœcia (Vallisneria spiralis).

The twenty-second class of plants in the artificial system of Linnæus. It comprehends such genera as have male or stamen-bearing flowers on one plant, and female or pistil-bearing flowers on another, as willows.

EMARGINATE, p. 387, def. 1.

Emarginate Leaf.

ENSIFORM, p. 399.

Ensiform Leaf.

EPIPHYTE, p. 403.

Plants growing upon other vegetables, adhering to their bark, and rooting among the scanty soil that occupies their surface, as mosses, lichens, ferns, etc., but which do not, like the parasites, derive any nourishment from the plants to which they attach themselves. Many orchidaceous plants are epiphytes and subsist chiefly upon air.

EPIPHYLLOSPERMOUS, p. 403.

EROSE, p. 407.

Erose Leaf.

BOTANY—Continued.

FROND, p. 483.

FOLLICLE, p. 467.

GALEATE, p. 491, def. 2.

Galeated (Corolla of Aconitum variegatum).

GLUME, p. 507.

INFUNDIBULIFORM, p. 604.

HYPOCRATERIFORM, p. 571.

Infundibulifom corolla (Stramonium).

INTRAPETIOLAR. In botany, a term applied when the pair of stipules at the base of a petiole unite by those margins which are next the petiole; and thus seem to form a single stipule between the petiole and the stem or branch. It is often confounded with interpetiolar, but is quite different in meaning.

KIDNEY-SHAPED LEAF. A reniform leaf; one having the breadth greater than the length, and a wide sinus at the base, as in ground ivy.

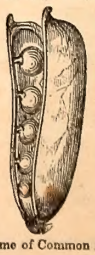
LABIATE, p. 643.

Labiate Corolla.

LANCEOLATE, p. 646.

Lanceolate Leaf.

LEGUME, p. 657, def. 1.



Legume of Common Pea.

BOTANY—Continued.

MONANDRIA, p. 725.

Monandria (Epidendrum pallidiflorum).

LYRATE, p. 683.

Lyrate Leaves.

MONADELPHIA, p. 725.

The name of the 16th class in Linnæus' sexual system, consisting of plants with hermaphrodite flowers, in which all the stamens are united below into one body or cylinder, through which passes the pistil, as in the marsh and common mallows.

MONILIFORM, p. 726.

Moniliform Root.

Like a necklace. Applied to the vessels of plants when they consist of a series of cells united like beads, and to the roots of plants when they are formed of series of united tuberosities.

MONOPETALOUS, p. 727.

Where several petals are united together so as to form a corolla.

MONOSEPALOUS, p. 727.

In botany, a term applied to the calyx of a flower, when the sepals which compose it are united by their edges: the pink, convolvulus, etc., are examples.

OPPOSITE.

Opposite Leaves.

Opposite leaves, those which come off in pairs, one opposite to the other, as in mint and sage. Opposite petals, those which are opposite to the sepals, as in barberry.

BOTANY—Continued.

PALMATIPARTITE, p. 792, def. 1.

A palmate leaf, in which the lobes are divided beyond the middle, and the parenchyma is not interrupted.

PALMATISECTED. [Palmate, and L. sectus.] A palmate leaf, in which the lobes are divided down to the midrib, and the parenchyma is interrupted.

PANDURIFORM, p. 793.

Literally, fiddle-shaped; applied by botanists to the leaves of some plants that are oblong and contracted in the middle.

PAPILIONACEOUS, p. 795.

Papilionaceous Corolla.

PEDICEL, p. 808, def. 1.

a a, Pedicels.

PELTATE, p. 809.

Peltate Leaf.

In botany, having the shape of a target or round shield, with the style inserted near the middle of the under surface; as, a peltate stigma; having the petiole inserted into the under surface of the lamina, not far from the center; as, a peltate leaf.

PERICARP, p. 814.

Pericarp. a, Capsule of Aristolochia. b, c, Capsule of Poppy. d, Nut-filbert. e, Strobilus of Pine. f, g, Drupe-peach.

In practice, the term is also applied to those seed-vessels whose sides are formed of the floral envelopes or stamens in a state of adhesion to the carpel, as in the apple, gourd, etc. When the pericarp separates into distinct layers as in the plum, the external skin is called the epicarp, the pulp or flesh the sarcocarp, and the stone the endocarp.

BOTANY—Continued.

PERFOLIATE, p. 814.

Perfoliate Leaf.

A perfoliate leaf is one that has the base entirely surrounding the stem transversely, so that it appears as if the stem ran through it; as in Bupleurum rotundifolium.

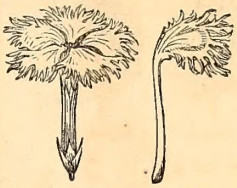
PETAL, p. 819.



Petal Dianthus or Pink.

PETIOLE, p. 820.

a, Petiole.

PINNATE, p. 828.

Pinnate Leaf.

POLYADELPHIA, p. 844.

PISTIL, p. 829.

The central organ of a female phanerogamous flower which contains the ovules, and in connection with which they become impregnated, and are matured into perfect seeds. It always consists of an ovary a, in which is either one or more ovules, and a stigma c, which receives the pollen from the anther, and often also of a style b, which stands upon the ovary, and supports the stigma.

RADICLE, p. 905.

Germination of a Dicotyledonous Seed. c, Envelope of the Seed. r, Radicle of the Embryo. s, Stem.

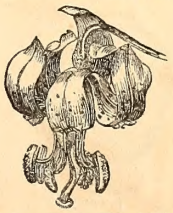
The conical body which forms one extremity of the embryo, and which when germination takes place, becomes the descending axis or root of the plant.

REFLECTED PETALS.



Reflected Petals (Tiger Lily).

Reflected petal, one that is curved backwards.—Reflected stamen, one that is bent outwards.

REPAND, p. 937.

Repand Leaf.

A leaf having a margin undulated and unequally dilated; as in Inula dysenterica.

BOTANY—Continued.

RHIZOMA, p. 953.

SPADIX, p. 1058.

a, Spathe, and b, Spadix of Arum maculatum.

SPATULATE, p. 1060.

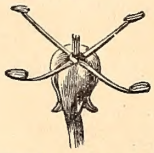
Spatulate Leaf.

SPATHA, or SPATHE, p. 1059.

Spathe, Flower of Cocoa Palm.

It is seen in the greatest perfection in the palms and arums, and is supposed to perform the office of the ordinary floral envelopes. It is also applied to the calyx of some flowers that have no spadix; as the narcissus, crocus, iris, etc.

STAMEN, p. 1075, def. 3.



The stamens and pistils constitute the sexual or reproductive organs of plants. Generally they both exist in the same flower, which is thus said to be hermaphrodite or perfect.

STIGMA, p. 1085, def. 3.

Section of Flower; s, Stigma.

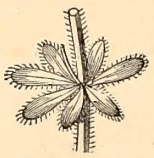
STELLATE, p. 1082, def. 2.



Stellate Leaves.

STIPULA, p. 1086.

Leaf with Stipulas, s s.

STYLE, p. 1098, def. 11.

a, Ovary. b, Style. c, Stigma.

TESTICULATE, p. 1140.

Testiculate Root (Orchis morio).

STROBILE, p. 1095.

Section of Strobile.

BUOY, p. 156.

A close empty cask, or a block of wood, or cork, fastened by a rope to an anchor, and floating on the water, to show where the anchor is situated.

BOTTLE, p. 139, def. 1.

Bottle (Oriental Water Carrier).

The Oriental nations use skins or leather for the conveyance of liquors; and of this kind are the bottles mentioned in Scripture: "Put new wine into new bottles." In Europe and America, glass is used for liquors of all kinds; and farmers use small cags or hollow vessels of wood, which are called bottles. The small kinds of glass bottles are called vials or phials.

KING-POST, p. 640.

King-post Roof. a, The King-post.

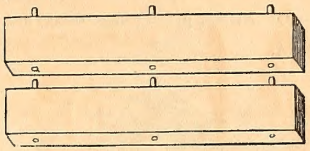
When two side posts, one at each side of the center, are used to support the roof, instead of one in the centre, they are called queen-posts.

CARPENTRY—Continued.

DOWEL, p. 863.



Doweling.

MORTISE, p. 731.

Mortise Joint. a a, Mortise. b b, Tenon.

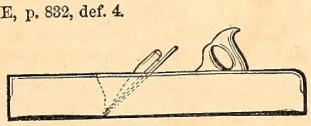
The sides of the mortise are four planes gen'ra'y at right angles to each other, and to the surface where the cavity is made. The junction of two pieces in this manner is termed a mortise joint. The word is sometimes written mortice, or mortice and tenon.

PLANE, p. 832, def. 4.



Jack-Plane.

There are various sorts of planes; as, the jack-plane, used for taking off the roughest and most prominent parts of the stuff; the trying-plane, which is used after the jack-plane; the long-plane, used when a piece of stuff is to be planed very straight; the jointer, still longer than the former, which is used for obtaining very straight edges; the smoothing-plane and block-plane, chiefly used for cleaning off finished work, and giving the utmost degree of smoothness to the surface of the wood; the compass-plane, which is similar to the smoothing-plane, but has its under surface convex, its use being to form a concave cylindrical surface. The foregoing are technically called bench-planes. There is also a species of planes called rebate-planes.

PLANTED. In joinery, a projecting member wrought on a separate piece of stuff, and afterwards fixed in its place, is said to be planted: as, a planted molding.

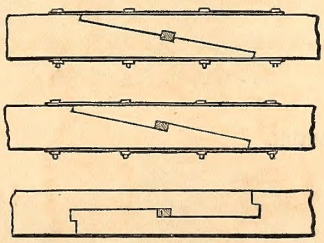
Panel with Planted Moldings.

REBATE, p. 916, def. 2.

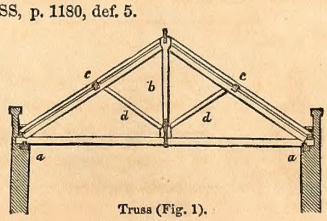
In joinery, a joint formed by making rebates or longitudinal recesses in the opposite edges of the boards to be joined.

SCARF, p. 986.



Various modes of Scarfing.

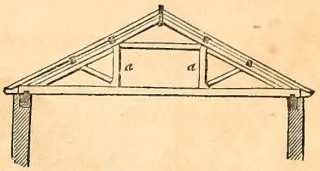
TRUSS, p. 1180, def. 5.



Truss (Fig. 1).

CARPENTRY—Continued.

TRUSS.



Truss (Fig. 2).

It is so named because it is trussed or tied together. The simplest exemplar of a truss is the principal or main couple of a roof, in which a a, the tie-beam, is suspended in the middle by the king-post, b, to the apex of the angle formed by the meeting of the rafters, c c. The feet of the rafters being tied together by the beam a, and being thus incapable of yielding in the direction of their length, their apex becomes a fixed point, to which the beam a is trussed or tied up, to prevent its sagging, and to prevent the rafters from sagging there are inserted the struts, d d.

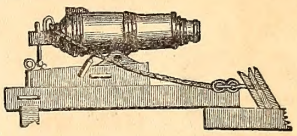
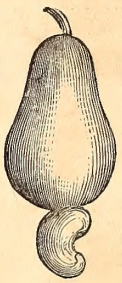
CARRONADE, p. 177.



CASHEW-NUT, p. 178.



It has two shells, an outer and an inner, and between these there is a thick inflammable oil which is very caustic, and has been applied as a cure for ringworm, cancerous ulcers, and corns. The kernel abounds with a sweet, milky juice, and forms an ingredient in puddings, &c.

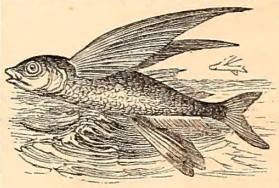
EXOCŒTUS. The flying-fish; a genus of fishes belonging to the order of abdominales. The body is whitish, and the belly is angular. The pectoral fins are the instruments of flight, and accordingly are very large. It can raise itself from the water and fly in the air to a considerable distance, which it does to escape from the attacks of other fishes. It is most common between the tropics. There are two species.



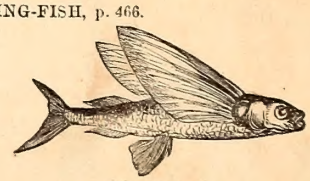
Common Flying-fish (Exocœtus volitans).

FISTULARIA.

Fistularia tabacaria.

Tobacco-pipe fish; a genus of acanthopterygious fishes, characterized by a long fistula or tube in the forepart of the cranium, at the extremity of which is the mouth.

FLYING-FISH, p. 466.



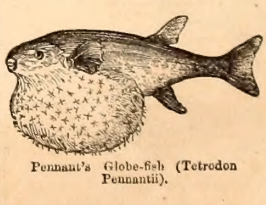
Oriental Flying-fish.

GAR-FISH, p. 494.

Gar-fish (Esox belone).

This fish is known under the name of sea-needle, and makes its appearance on the English coast in summer, a short time previous to the arrival of the mackerel.

GLOBE-FISH, p. 506.

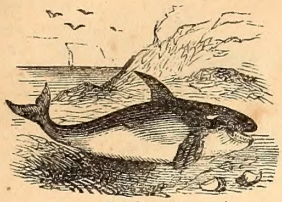


Pennant's Globe-fish (Tetrodon Pennantii).

A singular looking fish of the order Plectognathi, remarkable for possessing the power of suddenly assuming a globular form by swallowing air, which passing into a crop or first stomach, blows up the whole animal like a balloon.

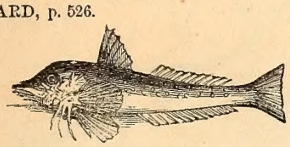
FISHES—Continued.

GRAMPUS, p. 516.



Grampus (Delphinus grampus).

GURNARD, p. 526.



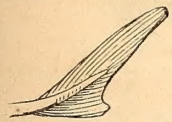
GYMNOTUS, p. 527.

Gymnotus electricus.

HALIBUT, p. 530.

Halibut, or Holibut-fish.

HETEROCERCAL, p. 550.



Tail of a Shark.

A term applied to all the palæozoic fishes, in which the vertebral column runs to a point above the tail, which is placed below like a triangular rudder; a structure still seen in the sharks and sturgeons.

HIPPOCAMP, p. 553.

A genus of pipe-fishes of singular construction and peculiar habits; the upper parts have some resemblance to the head and neck of a horse in miniature, which has suggested the English name sea-horse. When swimming they maintain a vertical position.

HOMOCERCAL. [Gr. ὁμος, and κερκος, the tail of a beast.] A term applied to those fishes which have tails with rays regularly diverging from the back-bone, as in the herring and trout.

Tail of a Herring.

LAMPREY, p. 646.

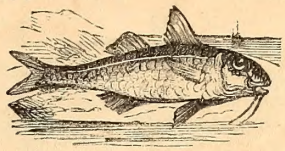
Lamprey (Petromyzon marinus).

MACKEREL, p. 684.

Mackerel (Scomber scomber).

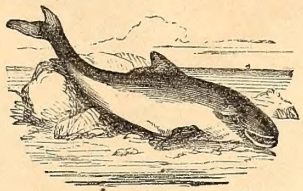
FISHES—Continued.

MULLET, p. 736, def. 1.



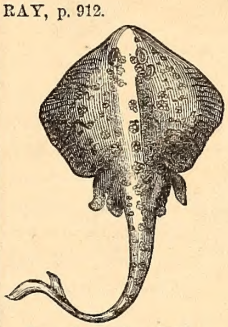
Plain red Mullet (Mullus barbatus).

PORPOISE, p. 847.



Porpoise (Phocæna communis).

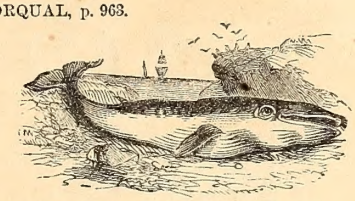
RAY, p. 912.



Starry Ray (Raia radiata).

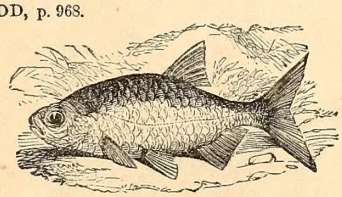
Recognized by the horizontally flattened body, which resembles a disk, from its union with the extremely broad and fleshy pectorals, which are joined to each other before or to the snout, and which extend behind the two sides of the abdomen, as far as the base of the ventrals, resembling the rays of a fan.

RORQUAL, p. 963.



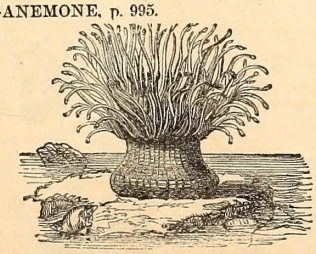
Great Northern Rorqual (Rorqualis Borealis).

RUDD, p. 968.



Rudd (Cyprinus erythrophthalmus).

SEA-ANEMONE, p. 995.

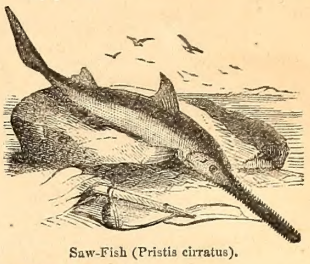


Sea Anemone (Actinia viridis).

The power of reproduction of these animals is scarcely inferior to that of the Hydræ; parts that have been amputated shoot out again, and the animal may be multiplied by division. Many of the species are used as food in tropical countries.

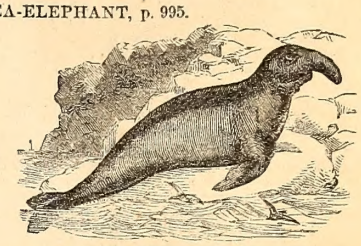
FISHES—Continued.

SAW-FISH, p. 983.



Saw-Fish (Pristis cirratus).

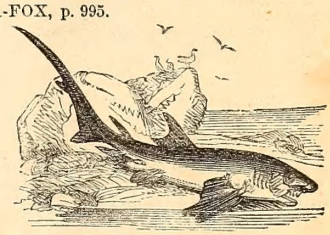
SEA-ELEPHANT, p. 995.



Sea Elephant (Macrorhinus proboscideus).

This animal becomes so fat, that when crawling, the whole body trembles as if it were a bag of jelly. The tongue is reckoned savory food; the skin is used extensively for carriage and horse harness. The oil yielded by this animal is clear, inodorous, and not liable to become rancid; one individual produces so much as from 1400 to 1500 lbs. It is employed chiefly in the manufacture of cloth.

SEA-FOX, p. 995.



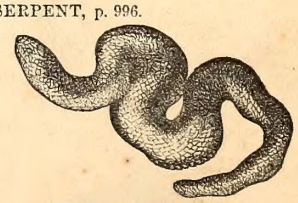
Fox Shark (Squalus vulpes).

SEA-LION, p. 995.

Sea-Lion of Forster (Phoca jubata).

It has a thick skin, and reddish yellow, or dark brown hair, and a mane on the neck of the male reaching to the shoulders.

SEA-SERPENT, p. 996.

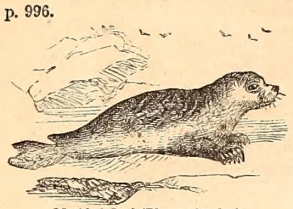


Sea-Serpent (Hydrus Stokesii).

These animals frequent the seas of warm latitudes. They are found off the coast of Africa, and are very plentiful in the Mindoro and Sooloo seas. Some are exceedingly venomous, others innocuous. The Hydrus Stokesii, here depicted, inhabits the Australian seas, and is as thick as a man's thigh.

FISHES—Continued.

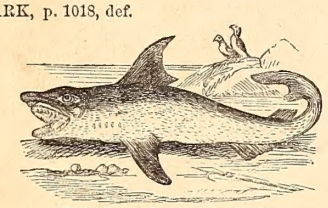
SEAL, p. 996.



Marbled Seal (Phoca discolor).

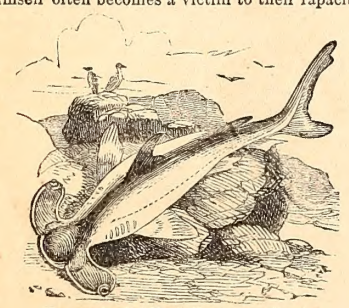
These animals are amphibious, most of them inhabiting the sea coasts, particularly in the higher latitudes. They have six or four incisors above, four or two below. Their hind feet are placed at the extremity of the body, in the same direction with it, and serve the purpose of a caudal fin; the fore feet are also adapted for swimming, and furnished with five claws; the external ears are either very small or wanting. The head of a seal bears a resemblance to that of a dog, whose intelligence and soft expressive look it also possesses. It is easily tamed, and soon becomes attached to its keeper, or those who feed it. The seal not only furnishes food for the Esquimaux table, oil for his lamp, and clothing for his person; but even the bones and skin supply materials for his boats and his summer tents. Seals are principally hunted for their oil and skins. The skin, when tanned, is extensively employed in the making of shoes, and, when dressed with the hair on, serves for the covering of trunks, etc.

SHARK, p. 1018, def.



White Shark (Carcharias vulgaris).

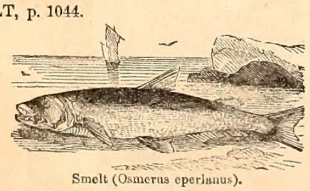
They are the most formidable and voracious of all fishes, pursue other marine animals, and seem to care little whether their prey be living or dead. They often follow vessels for the sake of picking up any offal which may be thrown overboard, and man himself often becomes a victim to their rapacity.



Hammer-headed Shark (Zygænus malleus).

The hammer-headed sharks are very voracious, and often attack man.

SMELT, p. 1044.



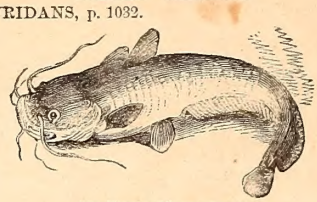
Smelt (Osmerus eperlanus).

SOLE, p. 1051, def. 4.

Sole (Pleuronectes solea).

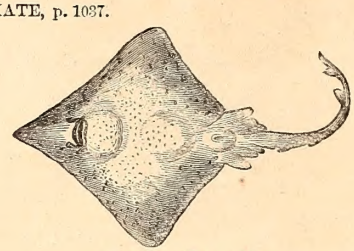
FISHES—Continued.

SILURIDANS, p. 1032.



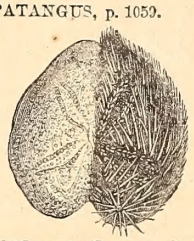
Sly Silurus (Silurus glanis).

SKATE, p. 1037.



Gray Skate (Raia batis).

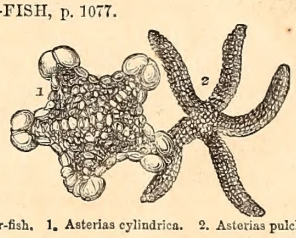
SPATANGUS, p. 1059.



Violet Spatangus (S. purpureus). One half shown with its spines removed.

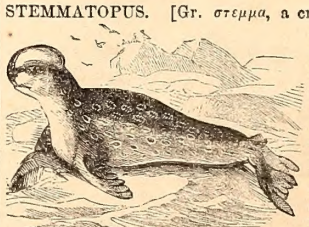
A genus of Echinidæ, or sea-urchins. The species are numerous. They are generally of an oval or cordate form, with very slender spines.

STAR-FISH, p. 1077.



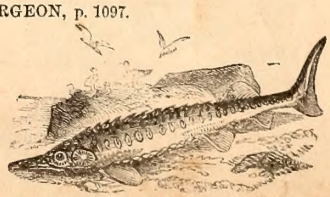
Star-fish. 1. Asterias cylindrica. 2. Asterias pulchella.

STEMMATOPUS. [Gr. στεμμα, a crown, or garland, and ὠψ, the eye.] Cuvier's name for a genus of seals. Such is the hooded seal (Phoca cristata, Gmelin) from the Arctic ocean. It is seven or eight feet long, and has a piece of loose inflatable skin on the head. This piece of skin is drawn over the eyes when the animal is menaced, at which time the nostrils are inflated like bladders.



Hooded Seal (Phoca cristata).

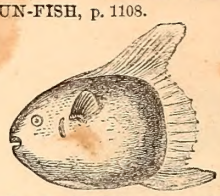
STURGEON, p. 1097.



Sturgeon (Acipenser sturio).

FISHES—Continued.

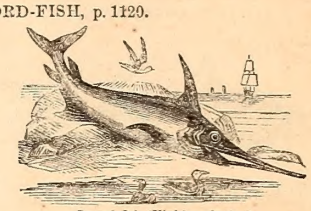
SUN-FISH, p. 1108.



Short Sun-fish (Orthagoriscus mola).

While swimming it turns upon itself like a wheel. It grows to a large size, often attaining a diameter of four feet, and sometimes even that of twelve feet.

SWORD-FISH, p. 1120.

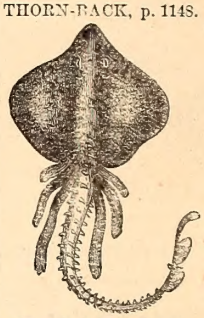


Sword-fish (Xiphias gladius).

The sword-fish is said to attack the whale with its beak, and it sometimes perforates the planks of ships with the same powerful weapon. The young fish is said to be excellent eating.

THORN-BACK, p. 1148.

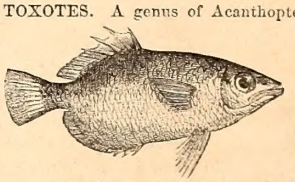
TORPEDO, p. 1161, def. 1.



Thorn-back (Raia clavata).

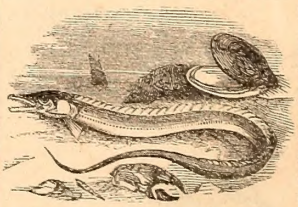
Spotted Torpedo (T. narke).

TOXOTES. A genus of Acanthopterygious fishes. The only species established, T. jaculator, is remarkable for having the power of spouting out drops of water on insects which alight or feed on the aquatic plants, thereby causing them to fall into the water and become its prey. It shoots the drops sometimes three or four feet high, and seldom misses its aim.



Archer-fish (Toxotes jaculator).

TRICHIURUS. [Gr. θριξ, hair, and οὐρα, a tail.] A genus of Acanthopterygious fishes, belonging to the family Tænioides, Cuv. They are called in English hair-tails, from the elongated hair-like filament that terminates the tail. They resemble beautiful silver ribbons. T. lepturus, or silvery hair-tail, has been found on the British coast.



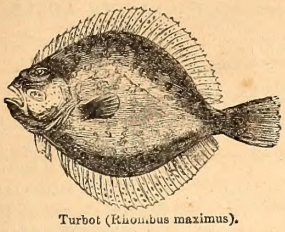
Silvery Hair-tail (Trichiurus lepturus).

TUNNY, p. 1183.

Tunny (Thynnus vulgaris).

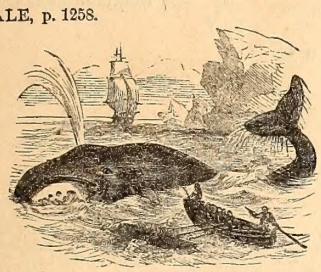
FISHES—Continued.

TURBOT, p. 1183.

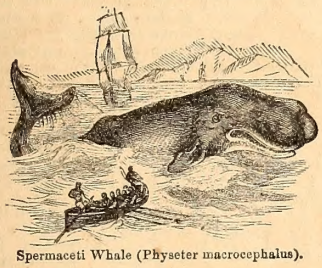


Turbot (Rhombus maximus).

WHALE, p. 1258.

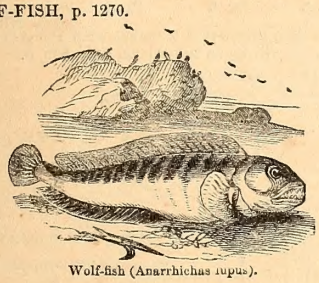


Greenland Whale (Balæna mysticetus).



Spermaceti Whale (Physeter macrocephalus).

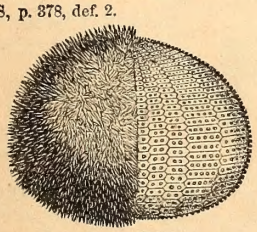
WOLF-FISH, p. 1270.



Wolf-fish (Anarrhichas lupus).

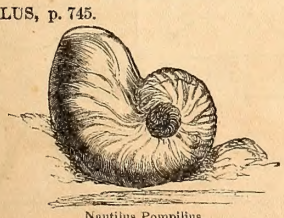
Shell-fish.

ECHINUS, p. 378, def. 2.



Sea-Urchin (Echinus).

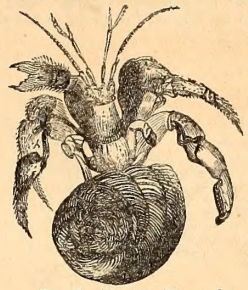
NAUTILUS, p. 745.



Nautilus Pompilius.

FISHES—Continued.

PAGURIANS. A tribe of macrurous decapod crustaceans, of which the genus Pagurus, or hermit crabs, is the type. Most of the species of this family inhabit, parasitically, the deserted shells of univalves.

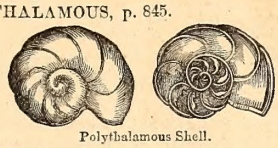


Pagurian (Cenobita Diogenes).

PEARL-OYSTER, p. 807.

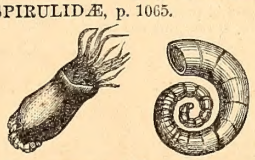
The pearl-oyster is fished in various parts of the world, particularly on the west coast of Ceylon, the Persian Gulf, at the Sooloo islands off the coast of Algiers, Pearl islands in the West Indies, and in the Bay of Panama. Pearls have sometimes been found on the Scotch coast, and in various other places. In the pearl-fishing, the shells are collected by divers, who have generally to descend from eight to twelve fathoms before they can reach the shells.

POLYTHALAMOUS, p. 845.



Polythalamous Shell.

SPIRULIDÆ, p. 1065.



Some of the species of spirula inhabit tropical seas, where they float on the surface of the ocean; others are only found fossil.

1. Spirula Australis. 2. The shell shown separately.

STROMBUS, p. 1095.

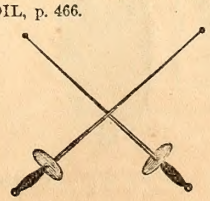
Winged Strombus (S. tricornis).

TRUMPET-SHELL, p. 1179.

Found on the coasts of the West Indies, of Asia, and of the South Sea Islands. It is used by the natives of the last named localities as a trumpet, to call warriors and herds of cattle together. It is said to answer the purpose tolerably well, producing a very sonorous blast.

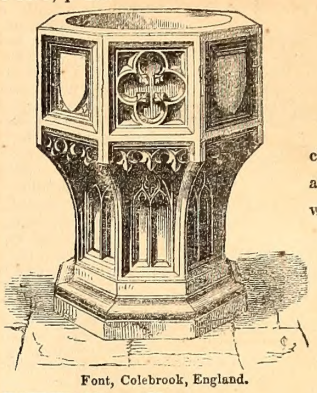
Trumpet-shell (Triton variegatus).

FOIL, p. 466.



A blunt sword, or one that has a button at the end, covered with leather; used in fencing.

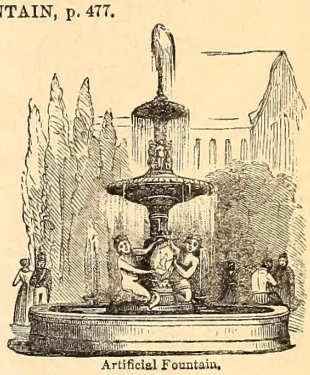
FONT, p. 468.



Font, Colebrook, England.

In Catholic churches used also for holy water.

FOUNTAIN, p. 477.



Artificial Fountain.

FURBELOW, p. 488.

A piece of stuff plaited and puckered, on a gown or petticoat; a flounce; the plaited border of a petticoat or gown.

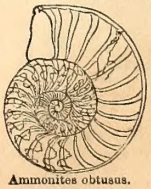
GAUNTLET, p. 496.

GABION, p. 490.

GEOLOGY.

AMMONITE, p. 43.

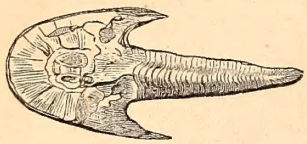


Ammonites obtusus.

Ammonites varians.

GEOLOGY—Continued.

CEPHALASPIS. A genus of fishes now found only in a fossil state in the old red sandstone. The head is very large, and is formed of a large buckler, which is prolonged behind into two points.

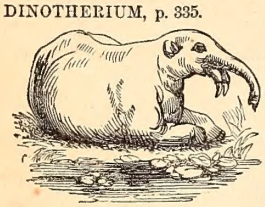


Cephalaspis Lyellii.

DINORNIS, or DEINORNIS. [Gr. δεινος, terrible, and ορνις, bird.] A genus of extinct birds, of a gigantic size, which formerly inhabited New Zealand. The species (of which five have been recognized) resembled in some respects the ostrich, but were of a much larger size. The largest must have stood at least ten feet and a half in hight, and probably more; several of its bones are at least twice the size of those of the ostrich; but the body seems to have been more bulky in proportion, and the tarsus was shorter and stouter, in order to sustain its weight. By the natives of New Zealand they are called moa.

Dinornis restored.

DINOTHERIUM, p. 835.



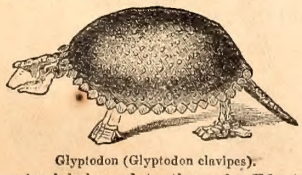
Dinotherium restored.

The remains have been found most abundantly at Eppleshein in Hesse Darmstadt, but fragments occur also in several parts of France, Bavaria, and Austria. The largest species hitherto discovered (D. giganteum) is calculated to have attained the length of eighteen feet. It had a proboscis and two tusks placed at the anterior extremity of the lower jaw, and curved downwards somewhat after the manner of those in the upper jaw of the walrus. It seems to have been destined to live in water, its tusks having been used as instruments for raking and grubbing up large aquatic vegetables from the bottom.

ENCRINITE, p. 394.

A genus (Encrinus) of petrified crinoideans, known by the name of stone-lilies, or lily-shaped animals, and supposed to have been among the earliest inhabitants of the deep. The animal possessed a column formed of numerous round depressed joints, adhering by a radiating grooved surface, and becoming pentangular near the pelvis, which is composed of five pieces, giving a lateral insertion to the first series of costal plates, to which the second series and scapulæ succeed, whence the tentaculated arms or fingers proceed, formed by double series of joints. The petrified bones of encrinites compose vast strata of entrochal marble. The term encrinites is frequently applied to the crinoidea generally, both recent and fossil.

GLYPTODON, p. 508.

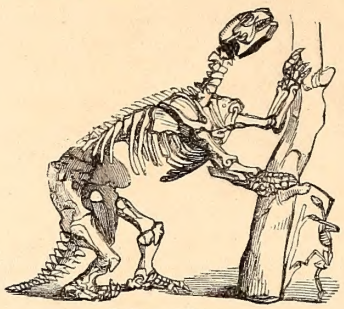


Glyptodon (Glyptodon clavipes).

This animal belonged to the order Edentata, and was closely allied to the armadillas. It was covered with a coat of mail formed of polygonal osseous plates united by sutures. It was found in South America, in the United Provinces of Rio-de-la-Plata.

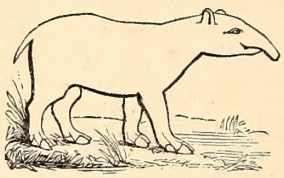
GEOLOGY—Continued.

MYLODON, p. 740.



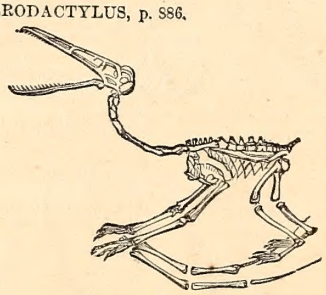
Skeleton of Mylodon.

PALÆOTHERIUM. [Gr. παλαιος, ancient, and θηριον, beast.] The name of a genus of extinct Pachyderms, characterized by having twenty-eight complex molar teeth, four canines, and twelve incisors, four in each jaw. It possessed three toes to each foot, and had a short fleshy proboscis. About twelve species are already known. The palæotherium holds a place intermediate between the rhinoceros, the horse, and the tapir.



Palæotherium restored.

PTERODACTYLUS, p. 886.



Skeleton of Pterodactylus.

The pterodactylus is found in the Jura limestone formation, in the lias at Lyme-Regis, and in the oolite slate of Stonefield. It had a short tail, an extremely long neck, and a very large head; the jaws armed with equal and pointed teeth; but its chief character consisted in the excessive elongation of the second toe of the forefoot, which was more than double the length of the trunk, and most probably served to support some membrane which enabled the animal to fly. It appears also to have been capable of either standing firmly on the ground, or of suspending itself, by means of its small anterior fingers, from the branches of trees. Several species have been discovered.

TRILOBITE, p. 1175.

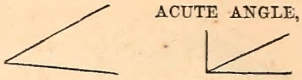
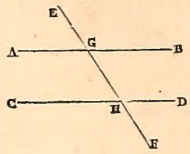
ANGLE, p. 48.

ACUTE ANGLE, p. 16.



ALTERNATE ANGLES, p. 39.



If the parallels A B, C D, be cut by the line E F, the angles A G H, G H D, as also the angles B H G, and G H C, are called alternate angles.

ARC, p. 65.

CONIC SECTIONS, p. 249.

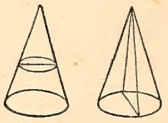


Fig. 1. Fig. 2.

When the cutting plane passes through the apex of the cone, and coincides with the axis, or passes through the apex or any part of the base, the section is a triangle, as in Fig. 1. When the plane cuts the axis at right angles, the section is a circle as in Fig. 2. When the plane cuts the axis obliquely, and passes through both sides of the cone, the section is an ellipse or oval, as in Fig. 3. When the plane cuts the axis in a line parallel to one side of the cone, the section is a parabola, as in Fig. 4. And lastly, if the section be made parallel to the axis, or so as to make a greater angle with the base than that which it makes with the side of the cone, it will be an hyperbola, as in Fig. 5.

PERPENDICULAR, p. 816, def. 1.

In geometry, a line falling at right angles on another line, or making equal angles with it on each side. Thus if the straight line A D, falling on the straight line BC, make the angles B A D, D A C, equal to one another, A D is called a perpendicular to B C.

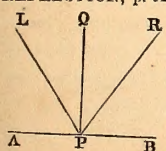
REFLECTION, p. 926.



In the annexed figure let A B represent a smooth polished surface, or mirror, and suppose a ray of light proceeding in the direction L P to impinge on the surface at P, and to be reflected from it in the direction P R. From P draw P Q perpendicular to A B, then the angle L P Q is called the angle of incidence, and Q P R the angle of reflection.

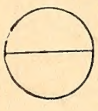
A C B contained within the radii C A, C B, and the arc A B, is a sector of the circle of which the arc A B is a portion.

SEGMENT, p. 1002, def. 1.

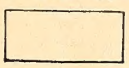
The segment of a circle is a part of the area contained by an arc and its chord, as A C B. The chord is sometimes called the base of the segment.

SEMI-CIRCLE, p. 1005.

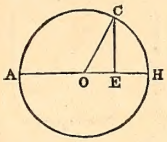


SQUARE, p. 1071.

SUPERFICIES, p. 1109.

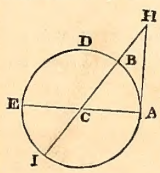


SINE, p. 1034.



In the circle A C H, let A O H be a diameter, and let C E be perpendicular thereto; then shall C E be the sine of the arc C H, or of the angle C O H, and of its supplement C O A. The sine of a quadrant, or of a right angle, is equal to the radius. The sine of any arc is half the chord of twice that arc.

TANGENT, p. 1129.



Thus, in the figure let A H be a straight line drawn touching the circle A D E at A, one extremity of the arc A B, and meeting the diameter I B produced, which passes through the other extremity B in the point H; then A H is the tangent of the arc A B, or of the angle A C B, of which A B is the measure.

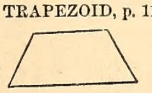
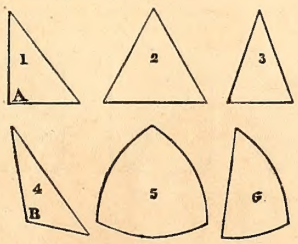
TRAPEZOID, p. 1170.



TRIANGLES, p. 1173.



If the three lines or sides of a triangle are all right, it is a plane or rectilinear triangle; as, in Figs. 1, 2, 3, 4. If all the three sides are equal, it is an equilateral triangle; Fig. 2. If two of the sides only are equal, it is an isosceles or equicrural triangle; Fig. 3. If all the three sides are unequal, it is a scalene or scalenous triangle; Fig. 4. If one of the angles is a right angle, the triangle is right-angled; as, Fig. 1, having the right angle A. If one of the angles is obtuse, the triangle is called obtuse-angled or amblygonous; as Fig. 4, having the obtuse angle B. If all the angles are acute, the triangle is acute-angled or oxygonous; Fig. 2, 3. If the three lines of a triangle are all curves the triangle is said to be curvilinear; Fig. 5. If some of the sides are right, and others curve, the triangle is said to be mixtilinear; Fig. 6. If the sides are all arcs of great circles of the sphere, or arcs of the same circle, the triangle is said to be spherical; Fig. 5.

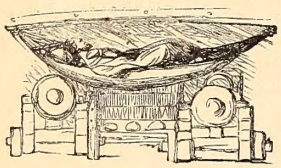
It was a kind of combination of a spear and a battle-axe, with a variously formed head, and a shaft about six feet long. It is now rarely to be seen in use, except in Scotland in the hands of town officers (counterparts of English javelin-men), when attending the magistrates of a borough.

HAMMOCK, p. 531.



HARP, p. 536, def. 1.

The chords are stretched in parallel directions from the upper part to one of the sides. The harp is very ancient. It was known to the Egyptians, and frequent mention is made of it in Scripture. The ancient Irish, Scots, and Welsh, made great use of this instrument, and the harp figures conspicuously in the arms of Ireland.

INCRESCENT.

A term employed to denote the moon in her increase, which is represented with the horns toward the dexter.

INESCUTCHEON.

A small escutcheon borne within the shield in the middle of the coat, or in chief to hold the arms of Ulster for the distinction of baronet, but much smaller than what is termed an escutcheon of pretense.

ISSUANT. Issuing or coming up. It is used to express a charge or bearing rising or coming out of another charge or bearing, and also to express a lion or any other beast rising from the bottom line of a chief. Issuant and revertant, terms used to express a lion, etc., as if he were issuing or coming into the field in the base part, and going out again in the chief part.

JESSANT.

A term which expresses shooting forth, as vegetables spring or shoot out; it is applicable to lions, or any other beasts, rising or issuing from the middle of a fesse.

STATANT.

A term for beasts when borne in a standing position, with all four legs upon the ground; as, a lion statant.

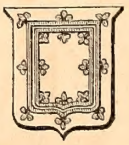
SUPPORTERS, p. 1111, def. 10.

Arms of the City of Glasgow.

In the arms of the city of Glasgow, salmon are the supporters.

SURMOUNTED, p. 1113, def. 3.

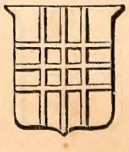
TRESSURE, p. 1173.



TORQUED.

Wreathed, said of a dolphin haurient, which forms a figure nearly resembling the letter S. The term, torgant or targant, is used to signify the same thing.

CROSS TRIPARTED.



Parted into three pieces; applicable to the field as well as to ordinaries and charges; as, tripartied in pale; a cross tripartied.

HERALDRY—Continued.

TRIPPING.

Tripping, or trippant, is a term used to express a buck, antelope, hart, hind, etc., when represented with the right foot lifted up, and the other three feet, as it were, upon the ground; as if the animals were trotting. — Counter-trippant, is when two animals are borne trippant contrary ways, as if passing each other out of the field.

HUBBLE-BUBBLE.

In the East Indies, a name given by the Anglo-Indians to the form of tobacco-pipe most commonly used by the natives. It is generally formed of the shell of a cocoa-nut, with a tobacco-bowl inserted at one part, and a reed for a mouth-piece at another. The shell is partially filled with water, and the smoke drawn through it. In use it produces a gurgling noise; hence the name.

INSECTS.

BRUCHUS. n. A genus of coleopterous insects of the group Rhynchophora, the females of which deposit their eggs in the germ of the bean, pea, and other leguminous plants. The seed becoming matured is devoured by the larva, and the holes so often observed in pease, are those made by the perfect insect to effect its escape. The genus is divided into several subgenera, constituting a family named Bruchidæ.

DEATH-WATCH, p. 304.

These insects abound in old houses, where they get into the wood. Their ticking is only a call to each other, to which if no answer be returned, the animal repeats it in another place. The general number of distinct strokes in succession, is from seven to nine or eleven. To produce the sound, the animal raises itself upon its hind legs, with the body somewhat inclined, and beats its head with a great force and agility upon the plane of position; and its strokes are so powerful as to make a considerable impression, if they fall upon any substance softer than wood.

DERMAPTERA, or DERMAPTERANS. [Gr. δερμα, skin, and πτερον, wing.] An order of insects, restricted by Kirby to the earwigs, comprising those genera which have their anterior pair of wings coriaceous, not employed in flight; their posterior wings membranous and folded like a fan, only partially covered by the elytra, and the tail armed with a forceps. The name Dermaptera was at first applied to that order now called Orthoptera; those authors who regard "the inflexible law of priority" give the name Euplexoptera to the order containing the earwigs.

Earwig (Forficula auricularia).

GAD-FLY, p. 490.

Gadfly (Œstrus bovis).

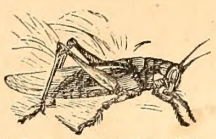
An insect of the genus Œstrus, which stings cattle, and deposits its eggs in their skin.

PUPA, p. 889.

Pupa and Caterpillar of Peacock Butterfly (Vanessa Io).

INSECTS—Continued.

LOCUST, p. 673.



Locust (Gryllus migratorius).

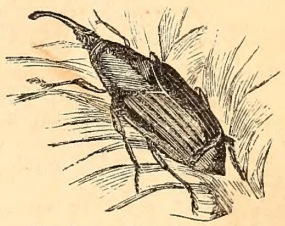
Having a grasshopper-like body, and large vari-colored wings, with a power of sustaining long and high occasional flights, though their ordinary movements are desultory. Under the generic name locust, are included by several modern entomologists the devouring locusts and the common grasshoppers.

RHINOLOPHINÆ. [Gr. ῥὶν, the nose, and λοφος, a crest]. A family of the insectivorous cheiroptera, including the greater and lesser horse-shoe-bats of this country. The species of this family have the nose furnished with a crested membrane, which is sometimes very complicated, and has more or less the appearance of a horse-shoe. [Wrongly classified.]

Head of Rhinolophus unifer.

RHYNCHOPHORA.

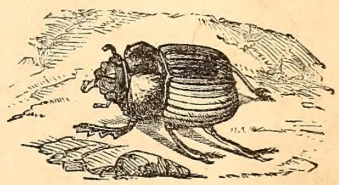
Rhynchophores (Curculio imperialis).



Rhynchophores (Curculio palmarum).

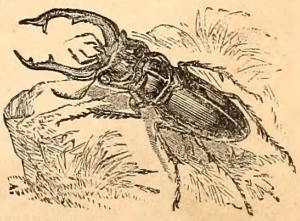
A family of coleopterous insects, comprehending those which have the head prolonged in the form of a snout or proboscis.

SCARAB, or SCARABEE, p. 986.



Scarabæus sacer.

STAG-BEETLE, p. 1073.



Stag-Beetle (Lucanus Cervus).

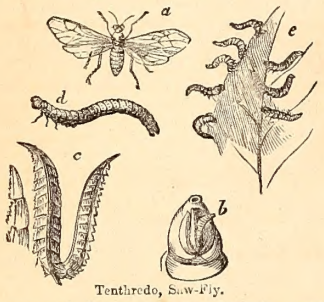
Is often two inches long, of a black color. It flies at night in the heat of summer.

INSECTS—Continued.

SHEEP-TICK. The Melophagus ovinus, a well-known insect belonging to the family Hippoboscidæ, extremely common in pasture-grounds, about the commencement of summer. The pupæ laid by the female are shining oval bodies, like the pips of small apples, which are to be seen attached by the pointed end to the wool of the sheep. From these issue the tick, which is horny, bristly, and of a rusty ocher-color, and destitute of wings. It fixes its head in the skin of the sheep, and extracts the blood, leaving a large round tumor.

Sheep-Tick, natural size and magnified.

TENTHREDO.



Tenthredo, Saw-Fly.

A genus of hymenopterous insects, popularly known by the name of saw-fly, because the female uses her ovipositor, which is serrated like a saw, to cut out spaces in the bark of trees, for the purpose of depositing her eggs, as the T. rosæ, upon the leaves of the rose bush. In the accompanying figure, a is the saw-fly of the turnip, Athalia spinarum; b, ovipositor of saw-fly magnified; c, the same still more magnified to show the saw; d, the caterpillar of the saw-fly of the rose, Tenthredo rosæ; e, e, caterpillars of the saw-fly of the willow, Nematus caprææ.

TRAP-DOOR SPIDERS. A name given to spiders of the genus Mygale, or rather the subgenus Cteniza, remarkable for forming in the ground a habitation consisting of a long cylindrical tube, protected at the top by a circular door, which is connected to the tube by a hinge.

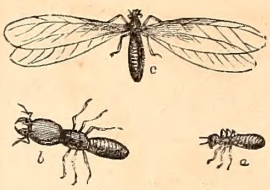
TERMITES, p. 1139.



Termes bellicosus.

a, Larva or worker; } Natural size.
b, Pupa or soldier; }
c, Perfect winged insect reduced in size.

These insects have little affinity with the true ants, although they resemble them in their mode of life. They are chiefly confined to the tropics; and are found very plentifully in western Africa. The white ants build their dwellings in the ground, in the form of pyramids or cones, ten or twelve feet high, resembling native villages in extent, and for which indeed they may readily be mistaken. These dwellings, which are so firmly cemented as to be capable of bearing the weight of three or four men, are divided off into several apartments as magazines, chambers, galleries, &c. When assaulted, the ants make their attack and defense with system and desperate courage. On emerging from the egg, the insects, in their larva state, are furnished with a great hard head and strong toothed jaws, but destitute of eyes. These are the laborers, a, who, although not more than a quarter of an inch long, build their edifices, procure provisions for the community and take care of the eggs. On changing to the pupa state, b, they become larger and more powerful.

WALKING-STICKS. The various species of insects of the orthopterous family Phasmidæ are so called, from the resemblance of most of them to pieces of stick. The gigantic Diura Titan of New South Wales, a species of the family, is very solitary in its habits, and is locally named walking-straw, or animated stick.

Walking Straw (Diura Titan).

WHEAT-FLY, p. 1259.

Wheat-Fly (Cecidomia tritici). a, Insect natural size; b, Insect magnified; c, Larva nat. size; d, Larva magnified.

It is a two-winged gnat, about the tenth of an inch long, and appears about the end of June. The females lay their eggs in clusters of from two to fifteen, among the chaffy flowers of the wheat, where they are hatched in about eight or ten days, producing little footless maggots, whose ravages destroy the flowers of the plant, and render it shriveled and worthless.

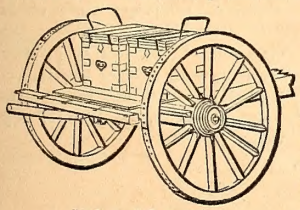
Bell Rock Light-House.

The mode of lighting these houses, now generally adopted, is that of placing an argand burner in the focus of a parabolic reflector. The number and the arrangement of reflectors in each house depend upon the light being fixed or revolving, and upon other circumstances connected with the situation and importance of the light-house.

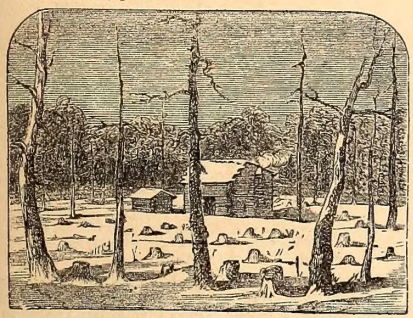
LIMBER, or LIMBERS, p. 666, def. 1



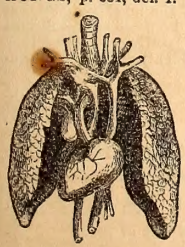
Limbers of Gun-carriage.

In action, the field-piece is attached to the limbers by a carriage-pole. To limber and unlimber (attach and detach) a cannon with despatch, forms an important part of artillery practice.

LOG-CABIN, p. 673.



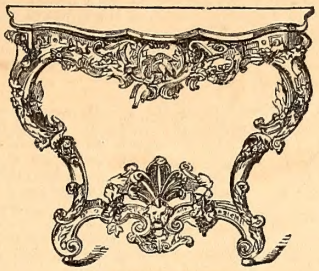
LUNGS, p. 681, def. 1.



Human Lungs.

The lungs are the organs of respiration in man and many other animals. There are two of these organs, each of which occupies its cavity in the thorax. They alternately inhale and expel the air, by means of which the necessary function of respiration is carried on.

LOUIS-QUATORZE.



Louis-Quatorze Ornament.

A meretricious style of ornament and ornamental decoration developed in France during the reign of Louis XIV. The classical ornaments, and all the elements of the Cinque-cento, from which the Louis-Quatorze or Louis XIV. proceeded, are admitted under peculiar treatment, or as accessories; the panels are formed by chains of scrolls, the concave and convex alternately; some clothed with an acanthus foliation, others plain.

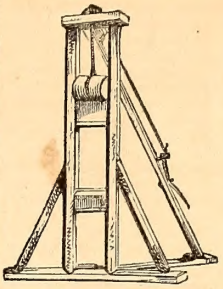
A square figure, formed by a series of numbers in mathematical proportion, so disposed in parallel and equal ranks, as that the sums of each row or line taken perpendicularly, horizontally, or diagonally, are equal.

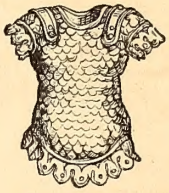
MAIDEN, p. 686, def. 2.



Maiden, Museum of the Society of Antiquaries, Edinburgh.

It is the prototype of the French guillotine. It consisted of a loaded piece of iron, with a sharp edge, which moved in grooves in a frame ten feet high. This piece being raised to the top of the frame, and let loose, descended and severed the criminal's head from his body.

MAIL, p. 686, def. 1.



Roman Scale Mail.

A defensive covering for warriors, and sometimes their steeds. A suit of armor comprehended a coat of mail, &c. This coat was merely the pre-existing buff jerkin, covered with steel mailles, or mails, overlapping each other: hence called scale armor. To this succeeded chain armor, and then plate armor, the term mail being common to all three.

MAMALUKE, p. 689.

MANDARIN, p. 690.

The general name given by visitants of China, of the European races, to native titled and governing men.

"The whole body of Chinese mandarins consists of 27 ranks...The constitution recognizes the following steps of titular or privileged status, in descending gradation: 1. imperial blood; 2. long service; 3. illustrious deeds; 4. talent and wisdom; 5. great abilities; 6. zeal and assiduity; 7. nobility; 8. birth. In this scale, we see that their estimations are nearly in the inverse order of ours."—Gutzlaff.

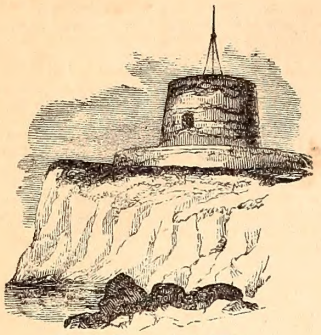
MARLINE-SPIKE, p. 695.

A small iron like a large spike, used to open the bolt-rope when the sail is to be sewed to it, &c.

MARTELLO TOWER, p. 696.

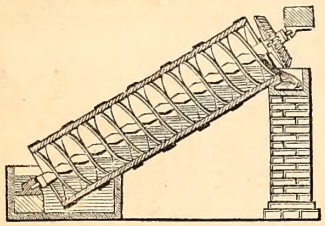


Martello Tower, coast of Kent.

A small circular-shaped fort, chiefly meant to defend the seaboard. It is built in two stages; the basement story containing store-rooms; the upper serving as a casemate for the defenders. The roofs are vaulted, the highest being shell-proof; entrance to all high up. The edifice is usually begirt with a ditch and glacis. Some have only one cannon, others more.

MECHANICS, MACHINERY.

ARCHIMEDES' SCREW, or WATER SCREW.



Named from its reputed inventor Archimedes. It is formed by winding a flexible tube round a cylinder in the form of a screw. When the screw is placed in an inclined position, as in the accompanying wood-cut, and the lower end immersed in water, by causing the screw to revolve, the water is raised to the upper end.

AXIS, p. 90.

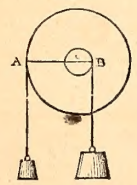

Fig. 2.

By reference to figs. 1, 2, it will be seen that this power resolves itself into a lever of the first order, in which the weight and power are at the ends, and the fulcrum between them. C is the center, or fulcrum; A C and C B are the semi-diameters of the wheel and the axle; and on the principle of the lever the power is to the weight as A C is to C B. The wheel is grooved and carries a coil of rope; another rope is secured to the axis; and when the power is in motion, every revolution of the wheel raises the weight to a height equal to the circumference of the axis or cylinder. There is a modification of the wheel and axle, called the double axis machine, in which the power can be increased with more safety. This is shown in fig. 3, where b and c are two cylinders of different diameters, firmly fixed on the axis carrying the crank a. The rope is coiled round the smaller cylinder, carried through a pulley supporting the weight, and then attached to the larger cylinder in a contrary direction. When in motion, every turn of the crank lifts the weight to a height equal to half the difference between the circumferences of the two axes; and the power is therefore to the weight, as this half difference is to the circumference of the power, or the circle described by the crank a.

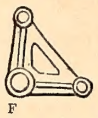
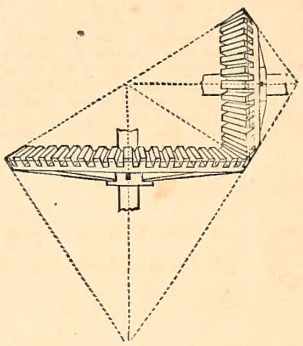
BELL-CRANK. In mech., a rectangular lever by which the direction of motion is changed through an angle of ninety degrees, and by which its velocity ratio and range may be altered at pleasure, by making the arms of different lengths. It is so named from its being the form of crank employed in changing the direction of the bell-wires of house-bells. F is the fixed center of motion, about which the arms oscillate.



BEVEL-GEAR, p. 119.



The wheels in this species of gearing, are not unfrequently called conical wheels, as their form resembles that of the frustrums of fluted cones.

BLOCKS, p. 130, def. 7.

a, Double block; b, treble block; c, clew line block; d, long tackle block; e, snatch block.

They are single, double, treble, or fourfold, according as the number of sheaves is one, two, three, or four. A running block is attached to the object to be raised or moved; a standing block is fixed to some permanent support.

BRAKE, p. 143.

In the figure, a is the frame of an engine-tender; b b the wheels; c c the brake-blocks of hard-wood, acted on by levers worked by the screw d, turned by the hand-wheel e.

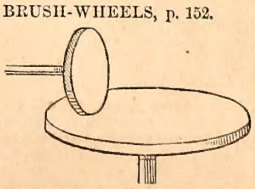
BRUSH-WHEELS, p. 152.



Sometimes wheels are made to turn each other by friction only. The surfaces brought into contact are then formed of the end grain of wood, or covered with hempen or buff leather belts, and the wheels are pressed together to increase the friction.

BREASTWHEEL, p. 146.

In mill-work, a kind of water-wheel, in which the water is delivered to the float board at a point somewhere between the bottom and top, generally a little below the level of the axis. In this kind of wheel the water acts partly by impulse, and partly by its weight.

BUFFER, p. 154.

Under-Frame of Railway-Carriage. a, Buffing-Springs acted on at the ends by rods from the Buffing-Blocks b b.

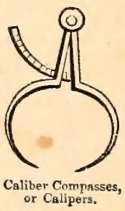
CALIBER, or CALIPERS, p. 164.



Caliber Compasses, or Calipers.

Caliber-Compasses, Calibers, or Calipers, compasses made either with arched legs to measure the diameters of cylinders or globular bodies, or with straight legs and retracted points, to measure the interior, diameter, or bore of any thing.

CAM, p. 167.

Fig. 1. Fig. 2. Fig. 3.

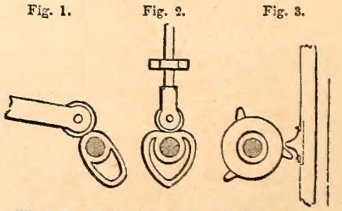


Fig. 1. The Elliptical Cam, used for giving motion to the levers of punching and shearing machines. Fig. 2. The Heart Cam, or Heart Wheel, much used in cotton machinery, to produce a regular ascent and descent of the rail, on which the spindles are situated. Fig. 3. The Cam-Ring Bag, much used in iron works, for setting in motion the tilt-hammers.

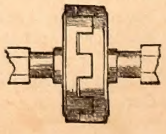
In machinery, a simple contrivance for converting a rotatory into a reciprocating motion. The most common form of the cam is that better known as the eccentric, which consists of a circular disc, fixed to a revolving part of the machinery, so that the center of the axis shall be more or less distant from that of the disc. The rectilinear motion thus generated is regular, and identical with that produced by a crank.

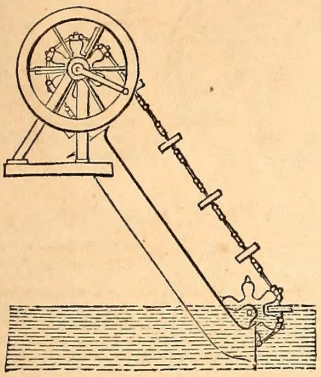
COUPLING-BOX, p. 276.



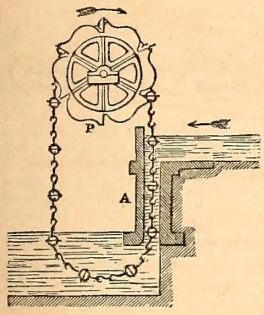
A strong piece of hollow iron to connect shafts, and throw machinery in and out of gear.

MECHANICS—Continued.

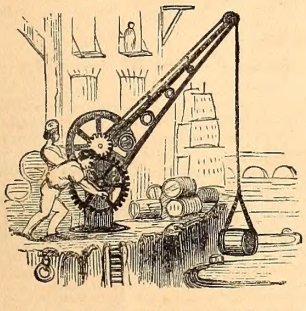
CHAIN-PUMP, p. 189.



CHAIN-WHEEL. An inversion of the chain-pump, by which it is converted into a recipient of water-power. It consists of a bucket-chain, which passes over a pulley P, and through a pipe A, of such a size that the buckets very nearly fill its section. The water flows into the pipe at the upper end, and descending, carries the buckets with it, thus setting the whole chain, and therefore the pulley in motion. It is said to realize from 71 to 72 per cent. of the power of the water.



CRANE, p. 280, def. 2.



A machine for raising great weights, and depositing them at some distance from their original place; for example, raising bales from the hold of a ship, and depositing them on the quay. Cranes are generally constructed on the principle of the wheel and axle, cog-wheel, or wheel and pinion. A very efficient wheel and pinion crane, much used on quays, is represented in the annexed figure. It consists of a jib or transverse beam, inclined to the vertical in an angle of 40° or 50°, which, by means of a collar, turns on a vertical arbor. The upper end of the jib carries a fixed pulley, and the lower end a cylinder, which is put in motion by a wheel and pinion. The weight is made fast to a rope which passes over the pulley, and is wound round the cylinder. On turning the cylinder, the weight is raised as far as necessary; the jib is then turned on its arbor till the weight is brought immediately over the spot where it is to be deposited; when, by withdrawing the moving power, it is allowed to descend by its own gravity. Cranes may be constructed of immense power; they are generally turned by human force; sometimes, however, by a steam-engine.

MECHANICS—Continued.

CRANK, p. 280, def. 1.

1. Single-crank, fixed to the end of an axis. 2. Double-crank, used in the middle of an axis. 3. Bell-crank, employed for converting a reciprocating horizontal, into a reciprocating vertical motion, and vice versa.

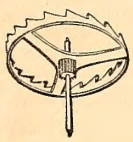
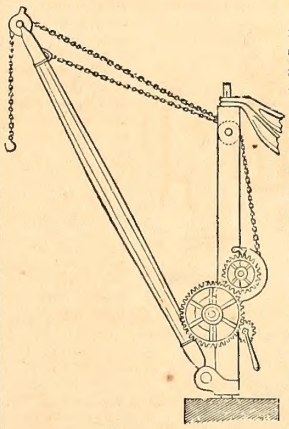
The common crank affords one of the simplest and most effectual methods of converting a reciprocating into a rotatory motion, and vice versa. The single crank can only be used on the end of an axis, fig. 1. The double-crank, fig. 2, is employed, when it is necessary that the axis should be extended on both sides of the point at which the reciprocating motion is applied. An exemplification of this arrangement is afforded, by the machinery of steam-boats. The bell-crank, fig. 3 (so called from its being much used in bell-hanging), is for a totally different purpose to the others, being used merely to change the direction of a reciprocating motion, as from a horizontal to a vertical line.

CROWN-WHEEL, p. 287, def. 1.



A wheel with cogs or teeth, set at right angles with its plane.

DERRICK, p. 323.



Derrick-Crane.

Derrick-crane, a kind of crane combining the advantages of the common derrick and those of the ordinary crane. The jib of this crane is fitted with a joint at the foot, and has a chain instead of a tension-bar attached to it at the top, so that the inclination, and consequently the sweep of the crane, can be altered at pleasure.

DIFFERENTIAL COUPLING.

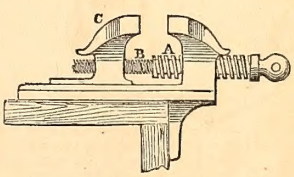
In machinery, a form of slip-coupling applied in light machinery for the purpose of regulating the velocity of the connected shaft at pleasure. It consists of an epicyclic train, such as that represented by the annexed figure. The shaft A, through which the motive power is conveyed, is continuous, and the wheel a a is fast upon it, whereas those marked b and c are loose. The two pinions d d (only one of which is necessary) have their bearings in the wheel c c, and gear with the two wheels a a and b. Motion being given to the shaft A, the wheel b, which is loose, revolves in a direction contrary to the wheel a a, which is fixed, and the wheel c c remains at rest; but the motion of the wheel b being opposed by means of the friction-gland e, which can be tightened at pleasure by the screw f, the teeth of that wheel become fulcra to the carrier-pinions d d, and these carry round the wheel c c, which gearing with the wheel h on the second shaft, communicates motion to it of any degree of velocity not greater than half that of the driving-shaft.

MECHANICS—Continued.

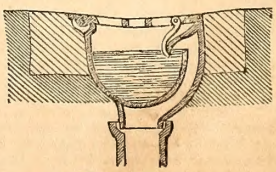
DIFFERENTIAL GEAR. In mech., a combination of toothed wheels by which a differential motion is produced—as exemplified in the annexed cut. The wheels a and b, slightly different in diameter, being fast on the same axis, and in gear with the wheels c and d on separate axes, when motion is communicated to the system, the velocities of the axes of c and d differ proportionally to the difference to the diameters of the respective wheels upon them, or to their numbers of teeth. This combination is extensively employed in lathes and boring-machines.

DIFFERENTIAL MOTION. In mech., an adjustment by which a single combination is made to produce such a velocity-ratio, as by ordinary arrangements would require a considerable train of mechanism practically to reduce the velocity. The two cylinders A and B, are a little different in diameter, having a common axis, and the cord winding from the one upon the other when the axis is made to revolve, by which means a vertical motion is communicated to the pulley C equal to half the difference of the horizontal velocities of the two cylinders A and B; or equal to the velocity that would be obtained if the center of the pulley C were suspended by a cord wrapped round a single barrel, whose radius is half the difference of the radii of the cylinders A and B.

DIFFERENTIAL SCREW. In mech., a compound screw, whereby a differential motion is produced—as exemplified by the annexed figure. The pitch of the threads at A and B being different, when motion is communicated to the screw, the piece C (prevented from revolving) is made to slide parallel to the axis, by a quantity equal to the difference of the pitches of the two parts A and B in each revolution.



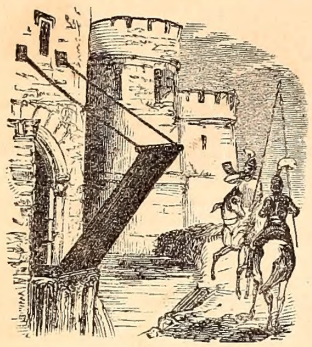
DRAIN-TRAPS. Contrivances to prevent the escape of foul air from drains, but to allow the passage of water into them.



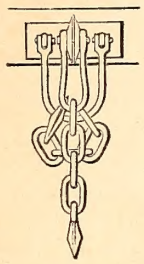
Section of Drain-Trap.

MECHANICS—Continued.

DRAW-BRIDGE, p. 366.

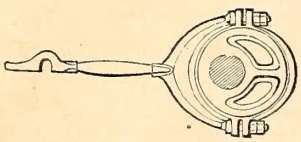


DRAW-LINK.



A contrivance in railway-carriages, for securing the several carriages of a train together.

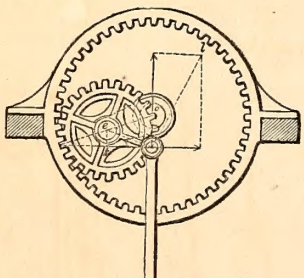
ECCENTRIC, p. 378.



Eccentric of steam-engine.

In mech., the name is applied to any revolving motion, the axis of which is not placed in the center. The valves of most steam-engines which work with a fly wheel, are moved by an eccentric.

EPICYCLOIDAL WHEEL.



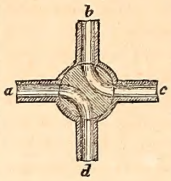
ESCAPEMENT, p. 408.

Anchor Escapement.

The leading requisite of a good escapement is that the impulse communicated to the pendulum shall be invariable, notwithstanding any irregularity or foulness in the train of wheels. Various kinds of escapements have been contrived; such as the crown escapement, used in common watches; the anchor escapement, used in common clocks—both these are also termed recoiling escapements—the dead-beat escapement, used in the finer kind of clocks; the detached escapement, and the lever escapement. Both these last are applied to the finer kind of watches.

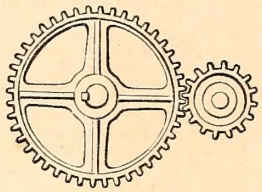
MECHANICS—Continued.

FOUR-WAY-COCK, or FOUR-WAY-VALVE.

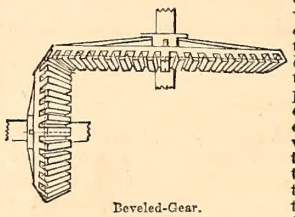


A description of valve occasionally used in steam-engines for passing the steam alternately to the upper and lower ends of the cylinder and to the condenser. It is shown in section in the figure. a is the communication with the steam-pipe; b the passage to the upper end of the cylinder; c to the condenser; and d to the lower end of the cylinder. By turning the center a quarter of a revolution, the action is reversed, and the steam, instead of entering the cylinder, at the lower end by d, will enter at the upper end through b.

GEARING, p. 496, def. 2.



Spur-Gear.



Beveled-Gear.

There are two sorts of gearing, viz., spur-gear, and beveled-gear. In the former, the teeth are arranged round either the concave or convex surface of a cylindrical wheel in the direction of radii from the center of the wheel, and are of equal depth throughout. In beveled-gear, the teeth are placed upon the exterior periphery of a conical wheel in a direction converging to the apex of the cone, and the depth of the tooth gradually diminishes from the base. Gearing and its compounds are sometimes spelt geering, spur-geer, beveled-geer, etc.

GOVERNOR, p. 514, def. 6.

A common form of the steam-engine governor is shown in the annexed figure. It represents a spindle kept in motion by the engine. A and B are two centrifugal balls, C A and C B the rods which suspend the balls. These rods cross one another and pass through the spindle at C, where the whole are connected by a round pin put through the spindle and the rods which serves as the point of suspension for centrifugal balls or revolving pendulums. A piece of brass M is made to slide up and down upon the upper part of the spindle, and to this piece the end of the lever NO, whose fulcrum is at P, is attached. This piece of brass is also connected with the ball-rods by two short pieces, and joints DE, FG. When the engine goes too fast, the balls fly farther asunder and depress the end N of the lever, which partly shuts a throttle-valve connected with the end O, and thus diminishes the quantity of steam admitted into the cylinder; and, on the other hand, when the engine goes too slow, the balls fall down towards the spindle and elevate the end N of the lever, which partly opens the throttle-valve and increases the quantity of steam admitted into the cylinder.

GUDGEON, p. 524, def. 4.

a, Wooden Shaft; b, Gudgeon.

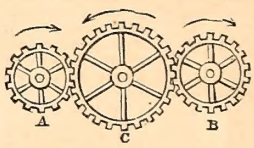
MECHANICS—Continued.

HEART-WHEEL, p. 541.

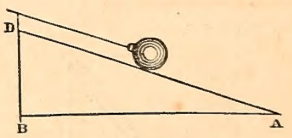
In machinery, a wheel having the form of a heart, contrived for converting a uniform circular motion into an alternating rectilinear motion. It is much employed in the machinery of the cotton and flax manufacture.

HINDLEY'S SCREW. A screw cut on a solid whose sides are arcs of the pitch circle of a wheel into which the screw is intended to work. It is so named from its having been first employed by Mr. Hindley of York.

IDLE-WHEEL. In mech., a carrier-wheel; a wheel, C, placed between two others, A and B, for the purpose simply of transferring the motion from one axis to the other without change of direction. If A and B were in contact, they would revolve in opposite directions; but in consequence of the intermediate axis of C, they revolve in the same direction, and without any change of the velocity-ratio of the pair.

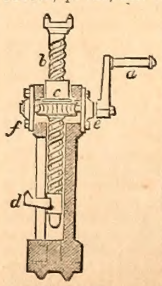


INCLINED PLANE, p. 590.



The figure ABD represents an inclined plane, AD is the plane properly so called; DB the height of the plane, BA its base, and BAD the angle of inclination or elevation. The power necessary to sustain any weight on an inclined plane, is to the weight as the height of the plane to its length; or as DB to DA. Hence, the less the height of the plane in proportion to its length, or the less the angle of inclination, the greater the mechanical effect.

JACK, p. 628, def. 14.



Lifting Jack.

A section of this machine in its most approved form is given in the annexed figure. By turning the handle a, the screw b, the upper end of which is brought into contact with the mass to be raised, is made to ascend. This is effected by means of an endless screw working into the worm-wheel c, which forms the nut of the screw. On the lower end of the screw is fixed the claw d passing through a groove in the stock; this claw serves at once to prevent the screw b from turning and to raise bodies which lie near the ground. The axis of the endless screw is supported by two malleable iron plates e, f, bolted to the upper side of the wooden stock or frame-work in which the whole is inclosed.

MECHANICS—Continued.

JOINT-UNIVERSAL.

Fig. 2.

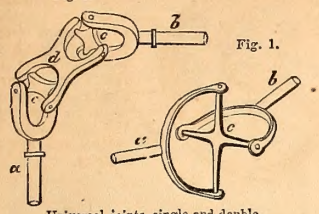


Fig. 1.

Universal joints, single and double.

In mech., an arrangement by which one part of a machine may be made to move freely in all directions in relation to another. In Fig. 1, the ends of the shafts a and b are each formed into a semicircular arc, and connected by means of a cross c. This joint ceases to act when the angle between the shafts is less than 140°, and the motion transmitted is variable in proportion as the angle diminishes. These disadvantages are corrected by using the double joint, Fig. 2, in which two crosses are employed, and connected by a separate link d.

LANTERN-WHEEL. In mech., a kind of pinion, having instead of leaves, cylindrical teeth or bars called trundles, or spindles on which the teeth of the main-wheel act. The ends of the trundles being fixed in two parallel circular boards or the form of a box plates, the lantern-wheel has or lantern; whence the name.

Spur and Lantern Wheels.

LEVER, p. 660.

Fig. 1.

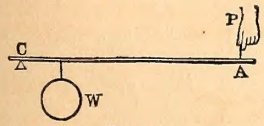

Fig. 3.

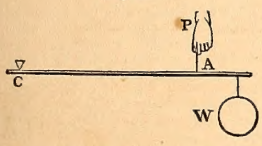

Fig. 1 represents a lever of the first kind, the power acting at A, the weight or resistance at W, C being the fulcrum or prop. Fig. 2 is a lever of the second kind, fig. 3, a lever of the third kind. In all levers the power and weight are inversely proportional to the perpendicular lines drawn from the fulcrum to the directions in which the two forces act. The lever is the most simple of the mechanic powers, and is extensively used in the construction of almost every mechanical contrivance; indeed, in one or other of its forms no machine is entirely without it; in its most simple form it is used for raising heavy weights to small heights.

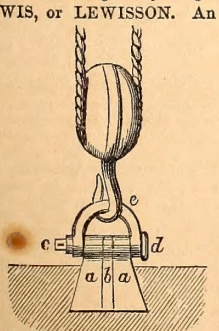
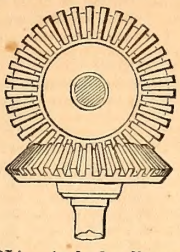
LEWIS, or LEWISSON. An instrument of iron, used in raising large stones to the upper part of a building. It operates by the dovetailing of one of its ends into an opening in the stone, so formed that no vertical force can detach it.



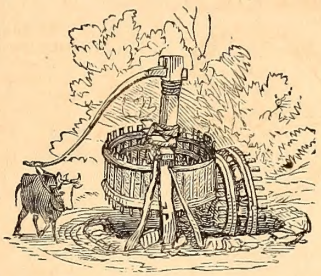
a a, two movable parts, perforated at their heads to admit the pin or bolt c d. These are inserted, by hand, into the cavity formed in the stone; and between them the part b is introduced, which pushes their points out to the sides of the stone, thus filling the cavity; c, a half-ring bolt, with a perforation at each end; to this the tackle above is attached by a hook. The fastening pin passes horizontally through all the holes, entering at the right side, d, and forelocking on the other end, c.

MECHANICS—Continued.

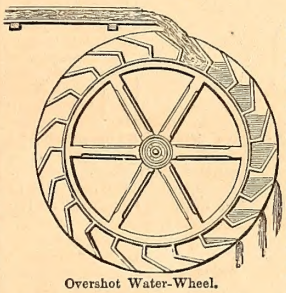
MITER-WHEELS. In mech., a pair of bevel-wheels of equal diameter, working into each other, and employed for conveying the motion of one shaft to another at right angles to the first, and without changing the velocity.



NORIA. An hydraulic machine, used in Spain, consisting of a water-wheel with revolving buckets or earthen pitchers, like the Persian wheel. It is used for throwing up water for purposes of irrigation.



OVERSHOT-WHEEL, p. 786.



Overshot Water-Wheel.

The circumference of the wheel is furnished with buckets, so fashioned and disposed as to receive the water at the top of the wheel, and retain it, until they reach, as nearly as possible, the lowest point. An overshot wheel is moved by less water than an undershot wheel. The water acts by its weight, and the velocity of the buckets should be about three feet per second.

PALLET, p. 792, def. 5.

Anchor-Escapement. p p Pallets.

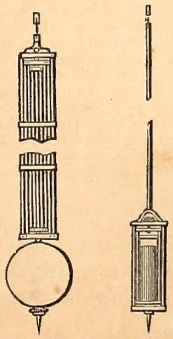
They are of various forms and constructions, according to the kind of escapement employed.

PENDULUM, p. 810.



Gridiron Pendulum. Mercurial Pendulum.

The gridiron pendulum is composed of any odd number of rods, so connected that the expansion or contraction of the one set of them is counteracted by that of the other. The mercurial pendulum consists of one rod with a vessel containing mercury at the lower end, so adjusted in quantity that whatever alterations take place in the length of the pendulum, the center of oscillation remains the same, the mercury ascending when the rod descends, and vice versa.

MECHANICS—Continued.

PAWL. In mech., the click or detent which falls into the teeth of a ratchet-wheel to prevent its motion backward.

Ratchet-Wheel and Pawl. d, the Pawl.

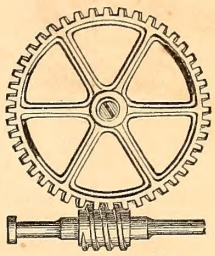
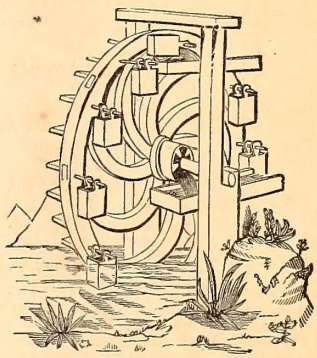
PERPETUAL SCREW, p. 816.



Perpetual Screw and Wheel.

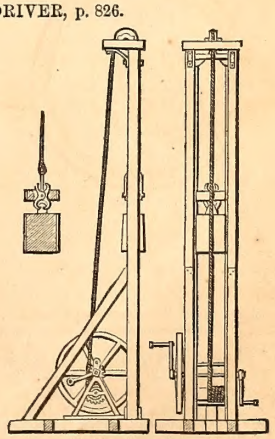
Perpetual screw; a screw that acts against the teeth of a wheel and continues its action without end.

PERSIAN WHEEL, p. 817.



An engine contrived for raising water to irrigate lands which lie on the borders or banks of rivers. It consists of a large wheel with a series of buckets fixed to its circumference, which raise the water.

PILE-DRIVER, p. 826.



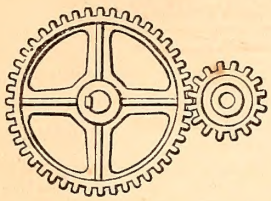
An engine for driving down piles. It consists of a large ram or block of iron, which slides between two guide-posts. Being drawn up to the top, and then let fall from a considerable height, it comes down on the head of the pile with a violent blow. It may be worked by men or horses, or a steam-engine.

MECHANICS—Continued.

PILLOW-BLOCK, or PLUMBER-BLOCK.

In machinery, a cast iron standard for supporting the end of a shaft. It is adapted for being bolted to the frame or foundation of a machine, and is usually furnished with brass bearings for diminishing the friction of the shaft, and a movable cover secured by bolts for tightening the bearings as they wear.

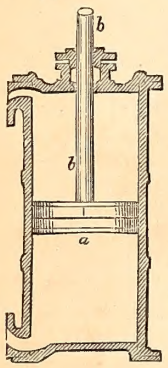
PINION, p. 828, def. 4.



Pinion (Spur-Wheel and Pinion).

A small wheel which plays in the teeth of a larger, or sometimes only an arbor or spindle, having notches or leaves, which are caught successively by the teeth of the wheel, and the motion thereby communicated.

PISTON, p. 830.



Section of Steam-Cylinder and Piston.
a, Piston; b, b, Piston-Rod.

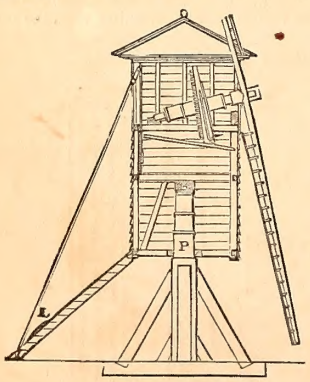
A short cylinder of metal or other solid substance, used in pumps and other engines or machines for various purposes. It is fitted exactly to the bore of another body so as to prevent the entrance or escape of air or other fluid, and is usually applied to the purpose of forcing some fluid into or out of the canal or tube which it fills, as in pumps, fire-engines, steam-engines, and the like.

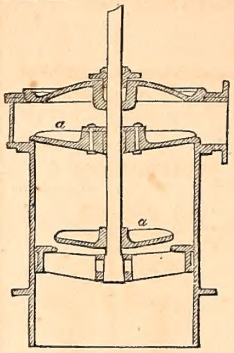
POST-MILL.



A form of wind-mill so constructed that the whole fabric rests on a vertical axis, and can be turned by means of a lever, according as the direction of the wind varies. In the figure, the post P, firmly fixed by a strong framing sunk into the ground, has, at its upper end, a pivot working into a socket fixed in one of the strongest floor-beams, and on this pivot the whole weight of the erection is sustained. The ladder L, serves as a lever for turning the mill, and by dropping it on the ground, and placing a weight on its lower extremity, it also serves to keep the mill steady when the right position is attained.

MECHANICS—Continued.

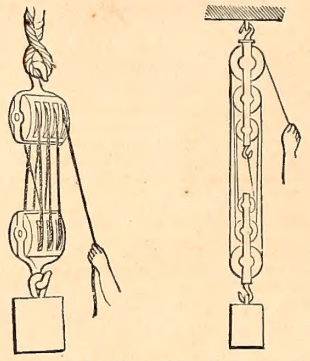
POT-LID VALVE. A kind of bucket valve, consisting of a circular plate having an eye bored in its center, through which the piston-rod passes freely. On pressing down the piston, the resistance of the water prevents the plate descending with it, and on the raising of the piston, the plate falls by its own gravity to its place on the bucket, and prevents the return of the water.



Air-Pump of Steam-Engine, with Pot-Lid Valves, a.

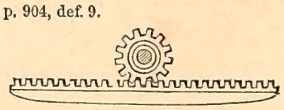
PULLEY, p. 888.

Fig. 1. Fig. 2.



In a system of pulleys, Figs. 1, 2, in which the same string passes round any number of pulleys, and the parts of it between the pulleys are parallel, there is an equilibrium when the power is to the weight as 1 to the number of strings at the lower block.

RACK, p. 904, def. 9.



Rack and Pinion.

RATCHET-WHEEL, p. 910.

a, is the ratchet-wheel; b, the reciprocating lever, to the end of which is jointed a small ratchet, c, furnished with a catch of the same form as the teeth of the wheel, and which, when the lever is moved in one direction, slides over the teeth, but in returning draws the wheel with it. The other ratchet, d, which may either be used separately or in combination with the first, permits of the motion of the wheel in the direction of the arrow, but opposes its return in the opposite direction.

SHOULDER-BLOCK.

Among ship-carpenters, a large single block left almost square at the upper end, and cut sloping in the direction of the sheave.

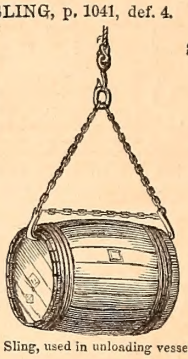
MECHANICS—Continued.

SCREEN, p. 992, def. 4.

Builder's Screen.

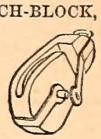
It consists of a rectangular wooden frame with metal wires traversing it longitudinally at regular intervals. It is propped up in nearly a vertical position, and the materials to be sifted or screened are thrown against it, when the finer particles pass through and the coarser remain. A similar apparatus is used for separating lump coal from the small coal and dross.

SLING, p. 1041, def. 4.



Sling, used in unloading vessels.

SNATCH-BLOCK, p. 1046.



It is chiefly used for heavy purchases, where a warp or hawser is brought to the capstan. It is also called a rouse-about-block.

SPIRAL-WHEELS. In mill-work, a species of gearing much used in the textile manufactures. Spiral-wheels serve the same purpose as bevel-wheels, and are better adapted for light machinery. The teeth are formed upon the circumference of cylinders of the required diameter, at an angle of 45° with their respective axes, when the direction of the motion is to be changed from the horizontal to the vertical. By this construction the teeth become in fact small portions of screws or spirals winding round the cylinders, whence the name.

SPUR-WHEELS. In machinery, wheels in which the teeth are perpendicular to the axis, and in the direction of radii. Such wheels are also called Spur-Gear.

STEAM-GAUGE. An instrument for indicating the pressure within a steam-boiler, by means of a bent tube partially filled with mercury, one end of which springs from the boiler, while the other is exposed to the air; so that the steam, by its pressure, raises the mercury in the straight limb of the tube to a height above the common level, proportioned to that pressure. An iron float and index are usually added for the convenience of observation, as shown in the annexed figure.

STEAM-ENGINE, p. 1081.

Portable Condensing Steam-Engine. a, the Steam-Cylinder; b, the Piston; c, the Upper Steam-Port or Passage; d, the Lower Steam-Port; e, e, the Parallel Motion; f, f, the Beam; g, the Connecting Rod; h, the Crank; i, i, the Fly-Wheel; k, k, the Eccentric and its Rod for working the Steam-Valve; l, the Steam-Valve and Valve-Casing; m, the Throttle-Valve; n, the Condenser; o, the Injection-Cock; p, the Air-Pump; q, the Hot-Well; r, the Shifting-Valve, for creating a vacuum in the condenser, previous to starting the engine; s, the Feed-Pump for supplying the boilers; t, the Cold Water-Pump for supplying the condenser cistern; u, the Governor.

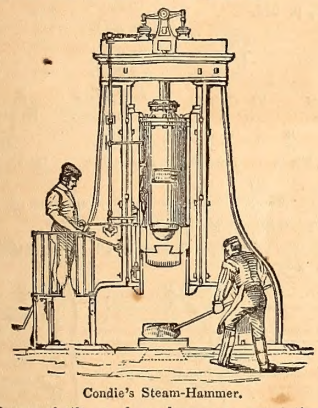
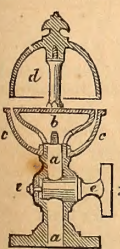
STEAM-TILT, or STEAM-HAMMER.



Condie's Steam-Hammer.

A form of tilt or forge-hammer, consisting of a steam-cylinder and piston, placed vertically over the anvil. There are two varieties; in one, the cylinder is fixed, and the hammer is attached to the piston-rod; in the other, the piston is fixed, and the hammer is attached to the lower end of the cylinder. The former is known as Nasmyth's, and the latter as Condie's hammer.

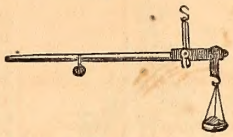
STEAM-WHISTLE, p. 1081.



The annexed figure represents a section of a steam-whistle; a, a, is a tube fixed to the top of the boiler, and opening into its interior; it is commanded by a stop-cock, e; the tube is surmounted by a hollow piece, b, perforated with holes, and surrounded by a thin brass cup, c, c; the respective diameters of the piece b, and cup c, being so adjusted as to leave a very narrow orifice all round. Another thin brass cup d, is fixed in an inverted position at a short distance above the upper surface of the parts b and c, so as to present a sharp edge exactly opposite the orifice above mentioned. On opening the stop-cock, e, the steam, rushing with great violence through the circular orifice, encounters the edge of the cup, c, and thereby produces a loud and shrill sound which may be heard at the distance of several miles.

MECHANICS—Continued.

STEEL-YARD, p. 1081.



STUFFING-BOX.

Part of Steam-Engine Cylinder. s, s, Stuffing-Box.

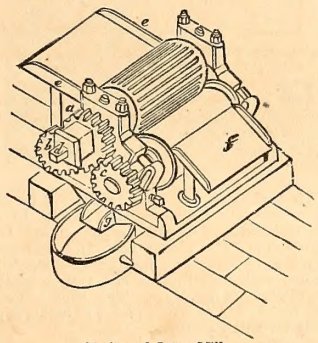
In mech., a contrivance for securing a steam, air, or water-tight joint, when it is required to pass a movable rod out of a vessel or into it. It consists of a close box cast round the hole through which the rod passes, in which is laid, around the rod and in contact with it, a quantity of hemp-packing. This packing is lubricated with oily matter, and a ring, as shown in the annexed figure, is then placed on the top of it and pressed down by screws, so as to squeeze the packing into every crevice.

SUGAR-MILL, p. 1105.



Horizontal Sugar-Mill.

A machine for pressing out the juice of the sugar-cane. It consists of three rollers placed vertically or horizontally, and parallel to each other. These are driven by a steam-engine, by water, or by animal power. The canes are made to pass between the rollers, by which means they are crushed, and the juice expressed from them.

SUN AND PLANET-WHEELS.

In mech., an ingenious contrivance for converting the reciprocating motion of the beam into a rotatory motion. In the annexed figure the sun-wheel a, is a toothed wheel fixed fast to the axis of the fly-wheel, and the planet-wheel b, is a similar wheel bolted to the lower end of the connecting rod c; it is retained in its orbit by a link at the back of both wheels. By the reciprocating motion of the connecting rod, the wheel b is compelled to circulate round the wheel a, and in so doing carries the latter along with it, communicating to the fly-wheel a velocity double of its own.

MECHANICS—Continued.

SWITCH, p. 1119, def. 2.

In the annexed cut, a, a, is the straight, and b, b, the diverging line of rails; the switch, bedded in the ordinary manner, is movable horizontally at the butt end by a lever with a balance weight, and handle, inclosed in the switch-box d; the open or closed position of the switch determines the direction of the train along the main line a, or on the siding b.

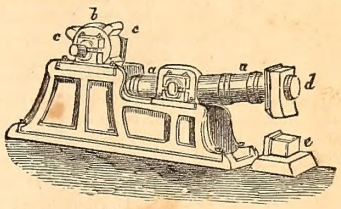
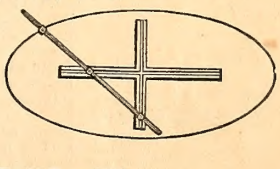
TILT-HAMMER, p. 1154.

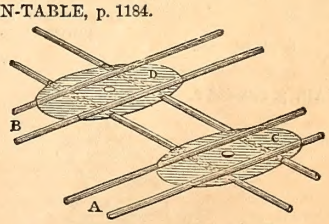


a is the shank or helve, usually formed of timber, and sometimes of wrought iron; it is hung upon an axis at about one-third of its length, and is worked by a series of revolving cams or tappets, c, c, fixed into the circumference of the cam-ring, b, mounted upon the shaft of a steam-engine, or water-wheel. These cams act successively by depressing the shorter limb of the shank, a, until by the continued revolution, it is disengaged, and the opposite extremity, armed with a heavy cast-iron hammer, d, descends with considerable force upon the anvil, e. Thus a repetition of blows is kept up as long as may be required.

TRAMMELS, p. 1166, def. 4.



TURN-TABLE, p. 1184.



If A and B be supposed to represent two tracks parallel to each other, and C a turn-table connected with the track A, and D another connected with the track B, then a carriage to be transferred from A to B is rolled on the turn-table C, and this, with the carriage on it, is turned a quarter round. The carriage is then rolled on the table D, which being turned a quarter round, puts the carriage in a right position for running on the track B.

MECHANICS—Continued.

TYMPAN, p. 1186.

t, Tympan; f, Frisket.

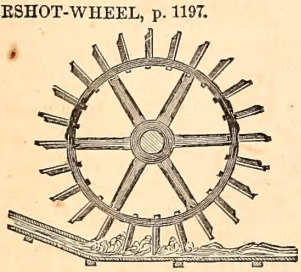
UNDERSHOT-WHEEL, p. 1197.



In this wheel the water acts entirely by its momentum, and therefore the effect depends on the quantity of water in the mill course, and the velocity with which it strikes the float-boards.

WHEEL AND AXLE, p. 1259. [See AXIS.]

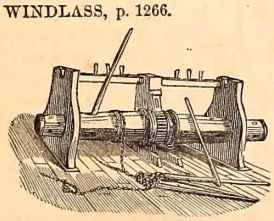
The axis in peritrochio, the Latin name of the wheel and axle, is one of the six mechanic powers, consisting of a wheel fixed upon an axle, so as to turn along with the axle.

Axis in Peritrochio.

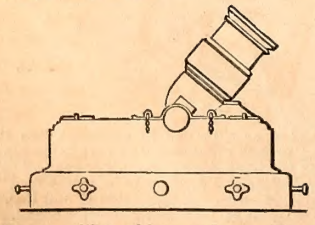
WINDLASS, p. 1266.



This large axle is pierced with holes directed toward its center, in which long levers or handspikes are inserted, for turning it round when the anchor is to be weighed or any purchase is required.

Ship's Windlass.

MORTAR, p. 730, def. 2.



Mortars are either of iron or brass. The calibers of mortars in the British service are 4⅖, 5½, 8, 10, and 13 inches.

MONSTRANCE, p. 727.

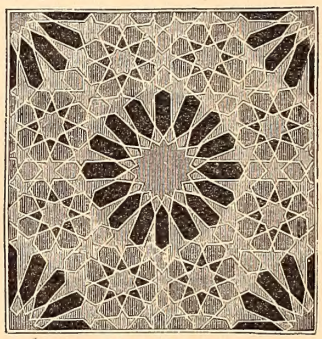
In the Roman Catholic Church, the receptacle for the eucharistic wafer, being a hollow-headed utensil, raised on a stand, narrow in the middle, so as easily to be grasped when shown to the people from the altar, or in processions. It is usually made of silver, with gilt ornaments, sometimes entirely of gold; and forms a handsome addition to altar-equipment.

MORION, p. 729.

A kind of helmet copied by the Spaniards from the Moors, and introduced into England about the beginning of the 16th century.

Morion of the time of Queen Elizabeth.

MOSAIC, p. 731.



Mosaic Pavement.

This kind of work was used in ancient times both for pavements and ornamenting walls. In recent times, two kinds of mosaic are particularly famous, the Roman and the Florentine. In the former, the pictures are formed by joining very small pieces of stone, which facilitates the representation of large historical paintings. The Florentine style, which makes use of larger pieces of stone, is adapted only for small pictures.

MUSIC.

The following are the principal musical characters used in the department of RHYTHMICS, including such characters as are employed to indicate the divisions of time and the comparative length of tones.

BARS, p. 98, def. 11, and MEASURES, p. 702, def. 11.

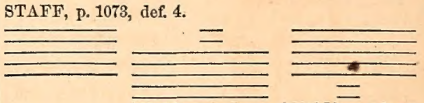
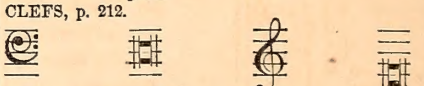
STAFF, p. 1073, def. 4.



CLEFS, p. 212.

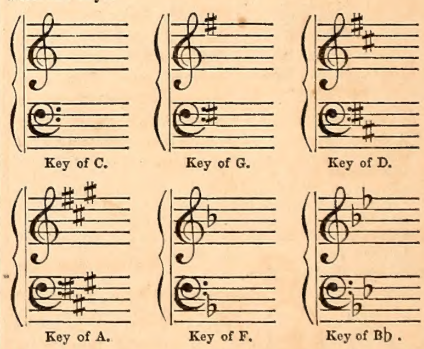


Flat. Sharp. Natural. Double Flat. Double Sharp.

Turn. Trill or Shake.

SIGNATURES, p. 1030, def. 7.

Signatures with the G and F Clefs indicating the different keys.



In the department of DYNAMICS, including such characters as are employed to indicate the relative force of tones.

DYNAMIC DEGREES (Directory Terms).

Pianissimo, or PP	Very soft.
Piano, or P	Soft.
Mezzo, or M	Medium.
Forte, or F	Loud.
Fortissimo, or FF	Very loud.

DYNAMIC FORMS (Characters indicating forms of tones).

Organ Tone. Crescendo, or Cres. Diminuendo, or Dim.

Swell, or Swelling Tone. Pressure Tone.

Sforzando, Forzando, Fz., Sf., or Expulsive Tone.

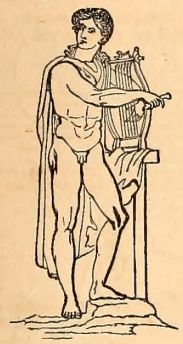
MYTHOLOGY, IDOLS, ETC.

ANUBIS, p. 56.

Anubis, from an Egyptian painting.

An Egyptian deity, the conductor of departed spirits, and represented by a human figure with the head of a dog, fox, or jackal.

APOLLO, p. 58.



The god of poetry, music, and prophecy; the patron of physicians, shepherds, and founders of cities. He invented the harp or lyre; and was the father of Æsculapius.

BACCHANTE, p. 92.

The figure represents a bacchante with a thyrsus, which consisted of a spear or staff wrapped round with ivy and vine-branches, or of a lance having the iron part thrust into a cone of pine. The Bacchanals carried thyrsi in their hands when they celebrated the orgies of Bacchus.

BACCHUS, p. 92.

We find him represented with the round, soft, and graceful form of a maiden, rather than with that of a young man. He is usually naked, and his hair is knitted behind in a knot, and wreathed with sprigs of ivy and vine leaves. He is said to have been the inventor of wine, and other liquors.

MYTHOLOGY—Continued.

BOODH, p. 136.

Buddha, from Moore's Hindoo Pantheon.

In Indian myth., the generic name of several deified sages of the Buddhist sect; the most celebrated of whom is generally understood to have lived about 1000 B.C. It also signifies, 1. The supreme being, the creator, identical with Brahma, and named Ade-Buddha. 2. A deity emanated from the trimurti or Indian trinity. 3. The priests of that deity and his religion.

BRAHMA, p. 143.

Brahma, from Coleman's Hindoo Mythology.

He is termed the Creator, or the grandfather of gods and men; his brothers Vishnu and Siva being respectively the preserver and the destroyer. Brahma is usually represented as a red or golden-colored figure with four heads. He has likewise four arms, in one of which he holds a spoon, in a second a string of beads, in the third a water-jug, and in the fourth the Veda, or sacred writings of the Hindoos; and he is frequently attended by his vehicle, the goose or swan.

CALLIOPE, p. 165.

CENTAUR, p. 186, def. 1.

MYTHOLOGY—Continued.

CERES, p. 187, def. 1.

In mythol., the inventor or goddess of corn, or rather the name of corn deified.

CLIO, p. 214.

Clio, from an antique statue.

She is usually represented with a scroll in her hand, and also sometimes with a scrinium to keep MSS. in, by her side. She is also sometimes represented with a lyre by her side.

CUPID, p. 292.

Cupid bending his bow.

He is generally represented as a beautiful child with wings, blind, and carrying a bow and quiver of arrows, with which he transpierced the hearts of lovers, inflaming them with desire.

DAGON. In myth., one of the principal divinities of the ancient Phœnicians. He was represented as half-man and half-fish. "Behold Dagon was fallen upon his face to the earth before the ark of the Lord." (1 Sam. v. 3.)

Dagon, from Calmet.

MYTHOLOGY—Continued.

DIANA. In myth., the Latin name of the goddess known to the Greeks by the name of Artemis (Αρτεμις), the daughter of Jupiter and Latona, and sister of Apollo. She was the virgin goddess of the chase, and also presided over health.

DOORGA, or DURGA. A Hindoo divinity, one of the names given to Parvati, the consort of Siva. She is the Amazonian champion and protectress of the gods, and has been compared to the Olympian Juno, and the Pallas or armed Minerva of the Greeks. She is represented with ten arms. In one hand she holds a spear, with which she is piercing the giant Muhisha; in another, a sword; in a third, the hair of the giant, and the tail of the serpent turned round him; and in others, the trident, discus, ax, club, and shield.

Doorga, from Coleman's Hindoo Mythology.

ERATO. [Gr. εραω, I love.] One of the muses, whose name signifies loving, or lovely. She has much in common with Terpsichore — the same attributes, the same dress, and frequently a lyre and plectrum. She presides over the songs of lovers.

HIPPOCAMPUS.

In myth., the name given to sea-horses with two feet, which drew the car of Neptune and other deities.

MYTHOLOGY—Continued.

EUTERPE, p. 413.

She is usually represented as a virgin crowned with flowers, having a flute in her hand, or with various instruments about her. As her name denotes, she is the inspirer of pleasure.

FAUN, p. 442.

The form of the fauns was principally human, but with a short goat's tail; pointed ears, and projecting horns. The figure is taken from an antique statue in the Florentine museum, and represents a young faun as a flute-player.

Dancing Faun.

HYGEIA. In myth., the goddess of health, daughter of Esculapius. She is represented as a slender maid with a bowl in her hand, out of which a serpent is eating.

JUNO, p. 635, def. 1.

The highest and most powerful divinity of the Greeks and Romans, next to Jupiter, of whom she was the sister and wife. She was the goddess of kingdoms and riches. She also presided over marriage, and protected married women, and was styled the Queen of Heaven.

MYTHOLOGY—Continued.

JUPITER, p. 635, def. 1.

He is usually represented as seated on an ivory throne with a scepter in his left hand and a thunderbolt in his right. The eagle, his favorite bird, is generally placed by the side of the throne.

MARS, p. 696, def. 1.

MELPOMENE, p. 706.

The muse who presides over tragedy. She is usuall represented with a mask in one hand, a club or dagger in the other, and with buskins on her feet.

MINERVA, p. 715.

She was fabled to have sprung in full armor from the forehead of her father Jupiter. She was represented as a young woman, with a grave and noble countenance, clothed in full armor.

MYTHOLOGY—Continued.

MERCURY, p. 708, def. 1.

Mercury, after Giovanni di Bologna.

The son of Jupiter and Maïa, the god of eloquence, of commerce, and of robbers, called by the Greeks Hermes. He was the messenger, herald, and ambassador of Jupiter. In antiquity, there were several persons or deities of this name.

NEPTUNE, p. 748, def. 1.

He is represented similar in appearance to Jupiter, but his symbols are a trident and the dolphin.

NEREID, p. 748.

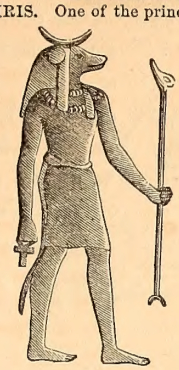
In myth., a sea-nymph. In ancient monuments, the Nereids are represented as riding on sea-horses, sometimes with the human form entire, and sometimes with the tail of a fish. They were the daughters of Nereus, and constantly attended Neptune.

NIOBE. In classical myth., the daughter of Tantalus, and one of the Pleiades, married to Amphion, king of Thebes. Proud of her numerous progeny, she provoked the anger of Apollo and Diana, who slew them all. This fable has afforded a subject for art, and has given rise to the beautiful group in the tribune at Florence, known by the name of Niobe and her children.

Niobe and her Children.

MYTHOLOGY—Continued.

OSIRIS. One of the principal Egyptian deities, the brother of Isis, and the father of Orus. He was venerated under the forms of the sacred bulls, Apis and Mnevis, or as a human figure with a bull's head, distinguished by the name of Apis-Osiris. He is commonly represented as clad in pure white, and his usual attributes are the high cap, the flail or whip, and the crosier. Osiris, in common with Isis, presided over the world below.



PALLAS, p. 792, def. 1. Also ÆGIS, p. 23.

In ancient myth., the goddess of wisdom among the Greeks, subsequently identified with the Roman Minerva.

PEGASUS, p. 809, def. 1.

Pegasus (Winged Horse).

In antiquity, the winged horse on which Bellerophon is fabled to have ridden.

PLUTO, p. 839.

Pluto and Proserpine.

He is represented as an old man with a dignified but severe aspect, holding in his hand a two-pronged fork.

MYTHOLOGY—Continued.

SATURN, p. 982, def. 1.

SATYR, p. 982.

In myth., a sylvan deity or demigod, represented as a monster, half man and half goat, having horns on his head, a hairy body, with the feet and tail of a goat. Satyrs are usually found in the train of Bacchus, and have been distinguished for lasciviousness and riot. They have been represented as remarkable for their piercing eyes and keen raillery.

SEA-HORSE, p. 995.

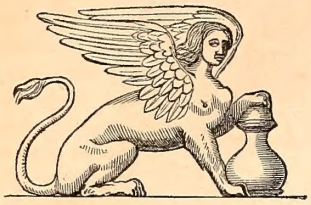
In myth., a fabulous animal depicted with fore parts like those of a horse, and with hinder parts like those of a fish. The Nereids used sea-horses as riding steeds, and Neptune employed them for drawing his chariot.

SIREN, p. 1035, def. 1.

In ancient myth., a mermaid or goddess, who enticed men into her power by the charms of music, and devoured them. Hence in modern use, an enticing woman; a female rendered dangerous by her enticements.

MYTHOLOGY—Continued.

SPHINX, p. 1063, def. 1.



Sphinx guarding a cinerary urn.

The Greek Sphinxes are represented with wings, but those of Egypt were without wings. Sphinxes are also found in India as ornaments of temples, but they are always represented with the head of a man.

TERPSICHORE, p. 1139.

Terpsichore, from an antique statue.

She is generally represented with a lyre, having seven strings, or a plectrum in the hand, in the act of dancing, and crowned with flowers.

THALIA, p. 1142.

Thalia, after an antique statue.

She is represented leaning on a column, with a comic mask in her right hand, and a shepherd's crook in her left.

THOTH, p. 1148.

Thoth, from a bronze in the British Museum.

He is represented as a human figure with the head of a lamb or ibis.

MYTHOLOGY—Continued.

TRIMURTI. In Hindoo myth., the triad or trinity of the Vedas, born of Brahm, and composed of Brahma, the creator; Vishnu, the preserver; and Siva, the destroyer.

Trimurti, from Coleman's Hindoo Mythology

TRITON, p. 1176.

Mythological Triton.

A fabled sea demigod, supposed to be the son and trumpeter of Neptune. We find, however, a number of Tritons spoken of in ancient mythology, who were half man, half fish, and upon whom the Nereids rode.

URANIA, p. 1221.

Urania, from an antique statue.

In Grecian myth., the muse of astronomy. She is generally represented with a crown of stars, in a garment spotted with stars, and holding in her left hand a celestial globe or a lyre. Urania is likewise the name of the heavenly Venus, or of pure intellectual love. One of the Oceanides, or sea-nymphs, was also called Urania.

VARUNA.

In Hindoo myth., the god of the waters, the Indian Neptune, and the regent of the west division of the earth. He is represented as a white man, four-armed, riding on a sea-animal, with a rope in one of his hands, and a club in another.

MYTHOLOGY—Continued.

VESTA, p. 1233.

Vesta, from an antique statue.

In myth., the goddess of the domestic hearth or of fire; worshiped both by the Greeks and Romans. She was a virgin divinity, the daughter of Saturn and Rhea, and the patroness of chastity, as well as of domestic union and happiness. The fire burning on the domestic hearth was regarded as the symbol of Vesta; and each political community, city, or state, had its public hearth or altar of Vesta, on which a perpetual fire was kept burning.

VISHNU, p. 1238.

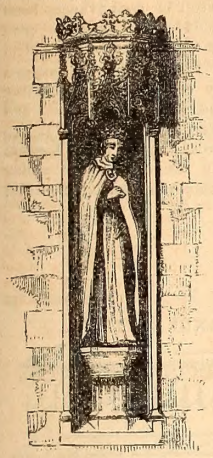
In the Hindoo myth., the name of one of the chief deities of the trimurti or triad, the other two being Brahma and Siva. He is the second person of this unity, and a personification of the preserving powers. Hence, he is frequently called the Preserver, the other two being respectively the Creator and the Destroyer.

YAMA, or DHERMARAJAH.

The Hindoo Pluto, regent of the south or lower division of the world, mythologically called Patala, or the infernal regions. He is described as being of a green color, with red garments, having a crown on his head, his eyes inflamed, and sitting on a buffalo, with a club in his hand.

N.

NICHE, p. 751.

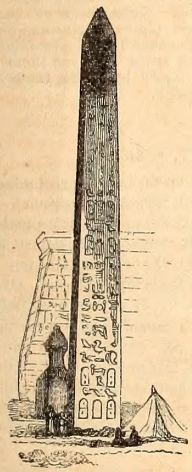


Niche, All Souls' College, Oxford.

In classic archit., niches were generally semicircular in the plan, and terminated in a semi-dome at the top. They were sometimes, however, square in the plan, and sometimes also square-headed.

O.

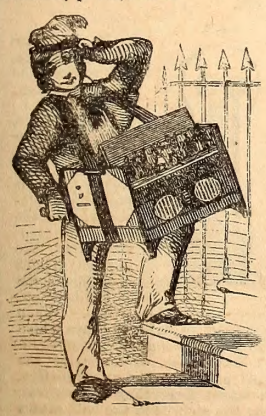
OBELISK, p. 762, def. 1.



Obelisk at Luxor.

The proportion of the thickness to the height is nearly the same in all obelisks; that is, between one-ninth and one-tenth; and the thickness at the top is never less than half, nor greater than three-fourths of the thickness at the bottom. Egypt abounded with obelisks, which were always of a single block of stone; and many have been removed thence to Rome and other places.

ORGAN, p. 778, def. 3.



Organ (Barrel Organ).

The barrel-organ is an instrument by which most of the effects of a small keyed-organ are produced by certain machinery. The keys, if so they may be called, are placed inside the organ, and acted on by means of a cylinder, or barrel, pinned or studded in a particular and very curious manner. The barrel is made to revolve by a winch.

P.

PACHA, or PASHAW, p. 789.

Pacha's Standard.

A title of honor given in the origin of the Turkish empire to the ministers and chief assistants of the sultan, but afterward applied to the governors of provinces, termed pachaliks. The distinction of rank between the two classes of pachas, under the old Turkish system, was indicated by their standards; the higher class having three horse-tails borne before them on a spear, headed with a crescent; the standard of the second class had but two horse-tails; hence the term, pacha of two or three tails.

PALANQUIN, p. 791.

PARACHUTE, p. 795.

Parachute (Garnerin's Parachute descending).

While the balloon is ascending, the parachute is like a closed umbrella.

PAX, or PAX-BREDE, p. 806.

Brass Pax of fifteenth century.

An ecclesiastical utensil, formed usually of a plate of metal, chased, engraved, or inlaid with figures representing the Virgin and Child, the Crucifixion, etc., which having been kissed by the priest during the Agnus Dei of the mass, is handed to the acolyte, who presents it to be kissed by each of the ecclesiastics officiating, saying to them Pax tecum (peace to thee). The decorations of the pax are frequently very rich.

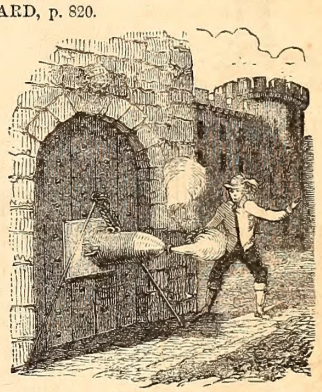
PAVISE, PAVAIS, or PAVACHE. [Fr. pavois, old Fr. pave, a covering; Ir. pavesse.] Antiq. A large shield covering the whole body, having an inward curve, managed by a pavisor, who with it screened an archer.

PEDESTAL, p. 808.

Pedestal (Listening Slave).

In arch., an insulated basement or support for a column, a statue, or a vase. It usually consists of a base, die, or dado, and a surbase, cornice, or cap.

PETARD, p. 820.

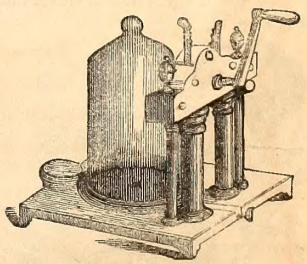


Firing a Petard.

The use of petards is now discontinued, as it has been discovered that gunpowder in loose bags is equally efficacious.

PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS.

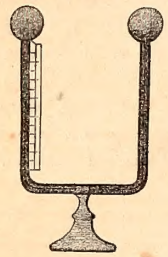
AIR-PUMP, p. 30.



Air-pumps are variously constructed; the most common forms have two barrels and two pistons, wrought by a toothed wheel, as that represented in the annexed cut.

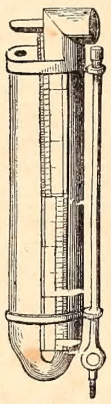
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS—Continued.

AIR THERMOMETER. Thermometers in which air is employed as a substitute for mercury and spirit of wine. Of these there are several kinds, but the most important is Leslie's Differential Thermometer.

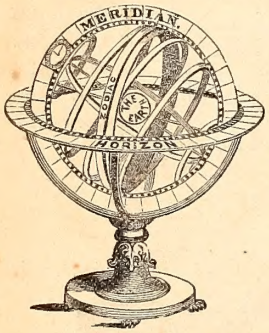


ALEMBIC, p. 33.

ANEMOMETER, p. 48.



ARMILLARY SPHERE, p. 69.



AZIMUTH COMPASS, p. 91.

Azimuth Compass.—a, b, sights.

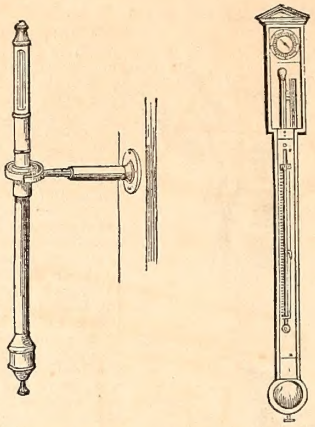
It differs from the common sea-compass only in this, that the circumference of the card, or box, is divided into degrees; also to the box is fitted an index with two sights, which are upright pieces of brass placed diametrically opposite to each other, having a slit down the middle of them, through which the sun or a star is to be viewed at the time of observation.

BLOW-PIPE, p. 132.

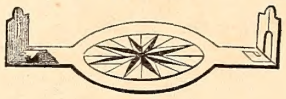
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS—Continued.

BAROMETER, p. 100.



Marine Barometer. Common Upright Barometer.

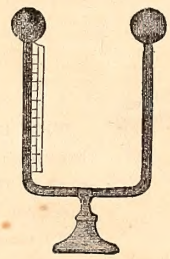
CIRCUMFERENTOR, p. 206.



CRYOPHORUS, p. 289.

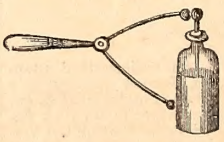
It consists of a glass tube, bent at each end, the bent parts being terminated by a bulb.

DIFFERENTIAL THERMOMETER, p. 332.



Two glass tubes, each terminating in a hollow ball, and having their bores somewhat widened at the other ends, a small portion of sulphuric acid tinged with carmine being introduced into the ball of one, are joined together by the flame of a blow-pipe, and afterward bent into nearly the shape of the letter U. To one of the legs of the thermometer a scale is attached; and the liquid contained in the tube is so disposed that it stands in the graduated leg opposite the zero of the scale, when both balls are exposed to the same temperature so that the instrument is affected only by the difference of heat of the two balls.

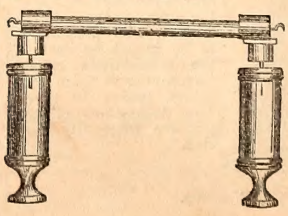
DISCHARGER, p. 339, def. 3.



Discharger and Leyden Jar.

In electricity, an instrument for discharging a Leyden phial, jar, etc., by opening a communication between the two surfaces.

ELECTROSCOPE, p. 384.



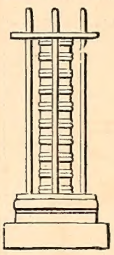
An instrument for exhibiting the attractive and repulsive energies of electricity, or for indicating its presence.

PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS—Continued.

EUDIOMETER, p. 412.

The use of the eudiometer has, since its original contrivance, been also extended to all gaseous mixtures; but especially to the determining of the quantity of oxygen which they contain, when resulting from the operations of analysis; and it is an essential instrument in the investigation of bodies which become gaseous by the changes to which they are subjected during chemical research.

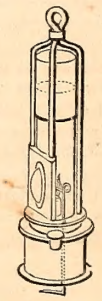
GALVANIC PILE.



GALVANIC BATTERY.

Galvanic trough or battery. This arrangement consists of a trough divided into numerous compartments by partitions, the whole being made of non-conducting materials. Into these compartments are let down square plates of zinc and copper, previously united together in pairs by soldering each pair, inclosing a space between them so as to form a cell for the liquid by which the combination is to be made active.

LAMP, DAVY'S SAFETY, p. 646.

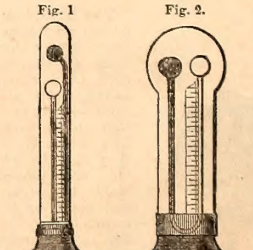


Davy's Safety Lamp.

A lamp for lighting coal mines, without exposing workmen to the explosion of inflammable air. It consists of a cistern for holding the oil, in the top of which the wick is placed. Over the cistern is placed a cylinder of wire gauze, so as to envelope the flame. By this contrivance light is transmitted to the miner, without endangering the kindling of the atmosphere of firedamp which may surround him.

PHOTOMETER, p. 823.

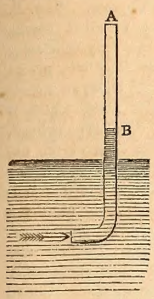
Fig. 1 Fig. 2.



It has two general forms, as represented in the figures; the one (Fig. 1.) being portable, and the other (Fig. 2.) being stationary. The theory of this photometer depends on the assumed principle that the intensity of light is proportional to the heat excited by its incidence on the black ball. When the instrument is exposed to light, the rays which fall on the clear ball pass through it without suffering obstruction; but those which strike the dark ball are stopped and absorbed at its surface, where, assuming a latent form, they act as heat, which, by expanding the air within the ball, causes the liquid in the stem to descend.

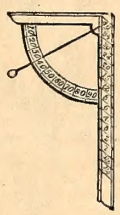
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS—Continued.

PITOT'S TUBE. In hydraulics, an instrument for ascertaining the velocity of water in rivers, etc. It consists in its simplest form of a bent glass-tube A, which is held in the water in such a manner that its lower end is horizontal, and opposed to the direction of the flowing water. In consequence of the momentum of the moving fluid, the level rises within the tube to a height B, proportional to the velocity of the stream.



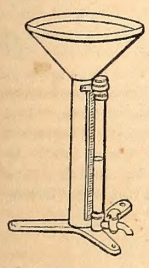
QUADRANT, p. 895, def. 3.

Hadley's Quadrant.



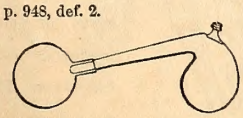
Gunner's Quadrant.

RAIN GAUGE, p. 906.



Rain gauges are variously constructed. One convenient form consists of a cylindrical tube of copper, with a funnel at the top where the rain enters. Connected with the cylinder at the lower part is a glass tube with an attached scale. The water which enters the funnel, stands at the same height in the cylinder and glass tube, and being visible in the latter the height is read immediately on the scale, and the cylinder and tube being constructed so that the sum of the areas of their sections is a given part, for instance a tenth of the area of the funnel at its orifice, each inch of water in the tube is equivalent to the tenth of an inch of water entering the mouth of the funnel. A stop-cock is added for drawing off the water.

RETORT, p. 948, def. 2.



SIPHON, p. 1035, def. 1.

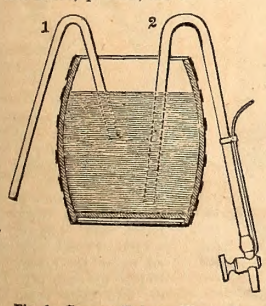


Fig. 1. Common Siphon. Fig. 2. Improved Siphon, with exhausting tube for filling it.

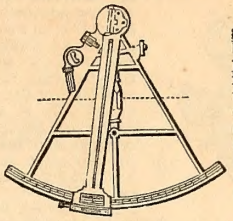
Sometimes an exhausting tube is placed on the longer leg for exhausting the air by suction, (see Fig. 2,) and causing the flow to commence, but the more general method is to fill the tube in the first place with the liquid, and then stopping the mouth of the longer leg, to insert the shorter leg in the vessel; upon removing the stop the liquid will immediately begin to flow.

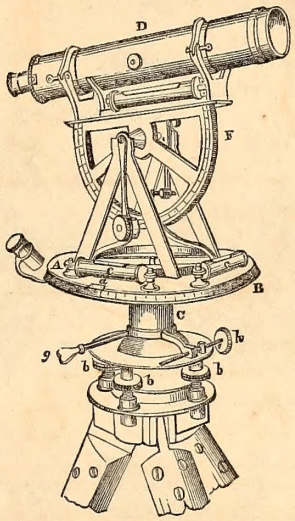
PHILOSOPHICAL INSTRUMENTS—Continued.

SEXTANT, p. 1015, def. 2.



It is capable of very general application, but it is chiefly employed as a nautical instrument for measuring the altitudes of celestial objects, and their apparent angular distances. It is an instrument of the utmost importance in navigation.

THEODOLITE, p. 1144.



A most important surveying instrument for measuring horizontal angles, or the angular distances between objects projected on the plane of the horizon. This instrument is variously constructed, and provided with subordinate apparatus, according to the price, or the particular purposes to which it is to be applied.

PHRENOLOGY, p. 823.

Fig. 1.

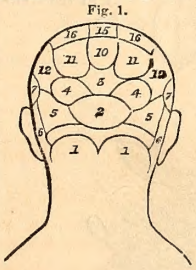


Fig. 2.

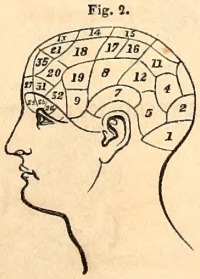

Fig. 3.

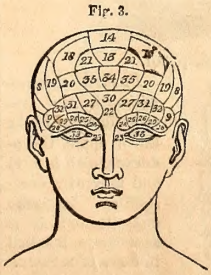
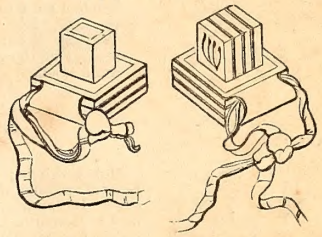
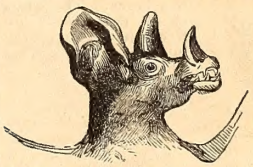


Dr. Spurzheim, who is followed by Dr. Combe, divides our faculties into three classes: the intellectual or perceptive, the sentiments or emotions, and the animal propensities. To the first of these is assigned the anterior portion of the head; the second occupies the middle and upper; while the posterior region, and cerebellum, are allowed to the third and most inglorious division. Each of these divisions is subdivided into minute special organs corresponding to distinct faculties. Thus, according to this science, the manifestation of each of the several faculties of the mind depends on a particular part of the brain, and cæteris paribus, the degree or strength in which each faculty is manifested in each individual, depends on the size or developement of its appropriated portion of the brain, or its organ. In the adjoined figures the different organs (most of them double) are marked out, and numbered, according to the system of Spurzheim. The faculties generally recognized by phrenologists are the following. The numbers refer to the figures. Order I. Feelings. Genus I. Propensities—common to man with the lower animals. The love of life; appetite for food. 1. Amativeness. 2. Philoprogenitiveness. 3. Concentrativeness. 4. Adhesiveness. 5. Combativeness. 6. Destructiveness. 7. Secretiveness. 8. Acquisitiveness. 9. Constructiveness. Genus II. Sentiments. 1. Sentiments common to man with the lower animals. 10. Self-esteem. 11. Love of approbation. 12. Cautiousness. 13. Benevolence. 2. Sentiments proper to man. 14. Veneration. 15. Firmness. 16. Conscientiousness. 17. Hope. 18. Wonder. 19. Ideality. 20. Wit. 21. Imitation. Order II. Intellectual faculties. Genus I. External senses. Feeling or touch, taste, smell, hearing, sight. Genus II. Intellectual faculties which perceive existence. 22. Individuality. 23. Form. 24. Size. 25. Weight. 26. Coloring. Genus III. Intellectual faculties which perceive the relations of external objects. 27. Locality. 28. Number. 29. Order. 30. Eventuality. 31. Time. 32. Tune. 33. Language. Genus IV. Intellectual faculties which compare, judge, and discriminate. 34. Comparison. 35. Causality.

PHYLACTERY, p. 823, def. 2.

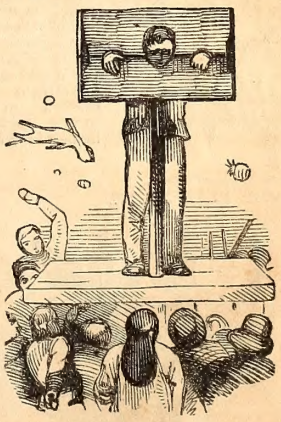


PHYLLOSTOMIDÆ. A family of insectivorous Cheiroptera, which have a simple and fleshy leaf-like appendage to the nose, and a forefinger of two joints. To this family the vampyre belongs, and other blood-sucking species.



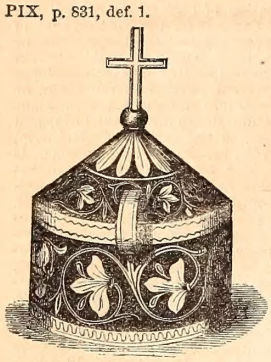
Head of Vampyre-bat (Vampyrus spectrum).

PILLORY, p. 827.



A frame of wood erected on posts, with movable boards and holes, through which were put the head and hands of an offender for punishment. In this manner offenders were formerly exposed to public view, and generally to public insult.

PIX, p. 831, def. 1.



Pixes are most frequently made of gold or silver and sometimes are in form like a chalice with merely the addition of a lid.

Pix, of 12th Century.

PLANTS AND SHRUBS.

ACACIA, p. 8.

Egyptian thorn, a species of plant ranked by Linnæus under the genus Mimosa, and by others, made a distinct genus. Acacia among the moderns, a very extensive genus of trees or shrubby plants inhabiting the tropical parts of both the Old and New World. Nearly 300 species of the acacia are known.

Acacia Arabica.

CACTUS, p. 162.

Melon thistle; a genus of plants of the class Icosandria, and order Monogynia, nat. order Cacteæ, or Cactaceæ. The fruit is a Unilocular Polyspermous berry. The fruits of all the species are frequently eaten by the inhabitants of the West Indies.

Cactus—Melon Thistle.

CASSAVA, p. 179.

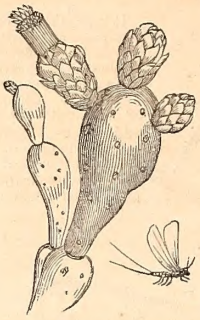
Cassava is the starchy matter produced from the Janipha Manihot, which is made into a kind of bread which serves for food to the natives of Africa and the West Indies. The Brazilians export cassava in small lumps under the name of tapioca.

Cassada, or Cassava Plant.

CASTOR-OIL PLANT, p. 180.

PLANTS—Continued.

COCHINEAL FIG. The Opuntia cochinillifera of Haworth, or Cactus cochinillifer. It is an icosandrious plant, and belongs to the nat. order Opuntiaceæ or Cactaceæ. It is a native of South America, and being the plant on which the Coccus cacti or Cochineal insect is found, is there extensively cultivated.



Cochineal Fig (Opuntia cochinillifera).

COFFEE, p. 221, def. 1.

COTTON-PLANT, p. 272.

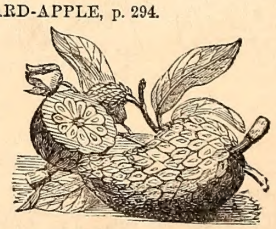
Coffee-Plant (Coffea Arabica).

CROTON, p. 286.

Croton tiglium is a native of several parts of the East Indies. It is the most active and dangerous of drastic purgatives; every part—wood, leaves, and fruit—seems to participate equally in the energy.

Croton tiglium.

CUSTARD-APPLE, p. 294.



DATURA STRAMONIUM, p. 301.

Datura stramonium is the systematic name of the thorn apple, the odor of which is fetid and narcotic, occasioning headache and stupor; it is sometimes smoked in cases of asthma.

PLANTS—Continued.

DURIO. A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Bombaceæ. The D. Zibethinus or civet Durio, which is the only species, is a large and lofty tree growing in the Malayan archipelago. Its fruit, which is the size of a man's head, is a favorite food of the natives, during the time (May and June) when it is in season, but there is usually a second crop in November. The smell is at first disagreeable, but ultimately persons become accustomed to it and relish the fruit.

Durio (D. zibethinus).

ELECAMPANE, p. 383.

It is a perennial plant, and grows in moist meadows and pastures near houses. It is an aromatic bitter, and was formerly regarded as expectorant.

FERN, p. 447.

The ferns constitute the first order of cryptogams, in the sexual system. The total number of living species of ferns is about 1500. The large tree ferns are confined almost exclusively to the tropics. Immense fossil arborescent ferns, from thirty to forty feet in height, are found in the coal formation.

Lady Fern (Asplenium Filix-fœmina).

FLOWER-DE-LUCE, p. 464.

In bot., the Iris, a genus of monogynian trianders, called also flag-flower. The species are numerous.

Flower-de-Lis.

FLY-TRAP, p. 466.

The leaf consists of a flat stalk and a broad blade, formed of two pieces united only by a hinge. On each of these pieces three hairs are placed, which, when touched, cause the pieces to fold on each other, and thus seize upon a fly or other small object.

PLANTS—Continued.

FLOWERING-FERN. The Osmunda regalis of Linn., a plant of the genus Osmunda, class Cryptogamia, order filices; nat. order Osmundaceæ. It is the noblest and most striking of our ferns, and grows in boggy places, and wet margins of woods.

Flowering-Fern (Osmunda regalis).

FUNGUS, p. 488, def. 1.

1. Agaricus comatus, tall cylindrical agaric. 2. Boletus edulis, edible boletus. 3. Morchella esculenta, round-headed morel.

GAMBOGE, p. 492.

Gamboge (Garcinia cambogia).

GENTIAN, p. 498.

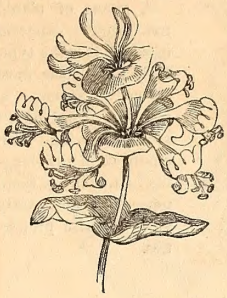
The officinal gentian (Gentiana lutea) is a native of Switzerland and the mountainous parts of Germany. The root, the only medicinal part of the plant, has a yellowish brown color, and a very bitter taste, and is in general use as a tonic, stomachic, anthelmintic, antiseptic, emenagogue, and febrifuge.

GUTTA PERCHA. This important gum-resin is contained in the sap of a large tree of the genus Isonandra, the I. gutta of Hooker, nat. order Sapotaceæ. The tree abounds in the island of Singapore, and in some dense forests at the extremity of the Malayan peninsula. Gutta percha comes to us in two forms; the one is in thin films or scraps, something similar to clippings of white leather; the other is in rolls formed by rolling the thin layers together in a soft state. When pure the slips are transparent, and somewhat elastic, verging in color from a whitish yellow to a pink. Below the temperature of 50° gutta percha is as hard as wood, excessively tough, and only flexible in the form of thin slips. When it is united with caoutchouc, and another substance called jintawan, an elastic material is produced, which is impervious to water and insoluble in it. This substance may be formed into springs for clocks, clasps, belts, garters, and strings; picture-frames, walking-sticks, sword and knife-handles, &c., &c., &c.

Gutta Percha (Isonandra gutta).

PLANTS—Continued.

HONEY-SUCKLE, p. 559.

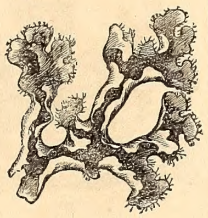


A beautiful genus of flowering and climbing shrubs, natives of Britain, America, China, and the south of Europe. Class Pentandria, and order monogynia; nat. order Caprifoliaceæ. It is known also by the name of Woodbine.

Honey-Suckle (Lonicera caprifolium).

INDIAN CORN, p. 596.

ICELAND MOSS, p. 572.



LOTUS, p. 677.

The ancients applied the name Lotus to the Ziziphus Lotus of Africa, [see LOTE,] and to the Nymphæa Lotus, an Egyptian water-plant.

Lotus (Nymphæa Lotus).

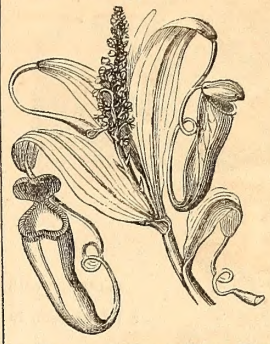
LUCUMA.

Mammee sapota (Lucuma mammosa).

A genus of plants, nat. order Sapotaceæ. The species are trees yielding a milky juice. L. mammosa, the common or mammee sapota, is a native of the tropical parts of South America, and of many of the West Indian Islands. The fruit, which is of a large size, is covered with a brownish rough skin, under which is a soft pulp, very luscious, and which, on account of its flavor, is called natural marmalade.

PLANTS—Continued.

NEPENTHES, p. 748.



A nat. order of exogenous plants inhabiting the damper and warmer parts of Asia, and having, in the place of leaves, large hollow bodies or pitchers, furnished with a lid, and containing water, secreted from a peculiar glandular apparatus with which they are lined. The N. distillatoria is known by the name of pitcher-plant.

Nepenthes distillatoria (Pitcher Plant).

OPIUM, p. 774.

It is one of the most energetic of narcotics, and at the same time one of the most precious of all medicines, and is employed in a great variety of cases, but most commonly for the purpose of procuring sleep, and relief from pain; but its habitual use is attended with similar, if not worse effects than the intemperate use of ardent spirits. A full dose is intoxicating and exhilarating, but its effects are dangerous and fatal if taken in large quantities.

Opium (Papaver somniferum).

ORCHIS, p. 776.

Few of the species produce seeds; and they are propagated by their tubers, which are of a peculiar structure. The flowers are so grotesque in form that we are forced to search for resemblances to them in the animal world. Hence we have such names among native British orchises as the butterfly, monkey, lizard, and frog orchis. Several species are cultivated for the sake of their singular forms, their gay colors, and their delicious fragrance. In other respects they are of little value.

Salep (Orchis mascula).

PEPPER, p. 812.

The fruit grows abundantly from all the branches in long small clusters of from twenty to fifty grains; when ripe it is of a bright red color, but becomes nearly black when dried.

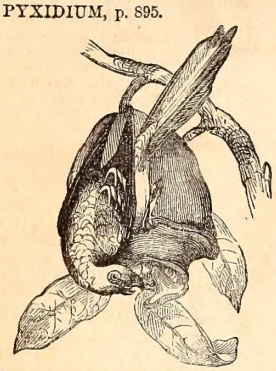
Black Pepper (Piper nigrum).

PLANTS—Continued.

PUMPKIN, p. 888.

Pumpkin (Cucurbita pepo).

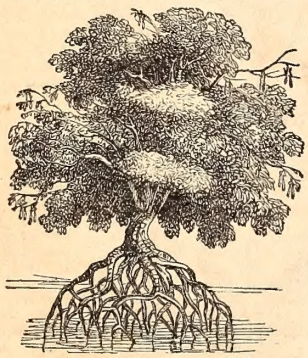
PYXIDIUM, p. 895.



A capsule with a lid, as seen in henbane and in the fruit of Lecythis ollaria, the monkey-pot tree.

Yellow Parrot on a Pyxidium of Lecythis ollaria.

RHIZOPHORA.



Mangrove Rhizophora manglier.

A genus of plants which gives its name to the nat. order Rhizophoraceæ or the mangrove tribe. The species are natives of the tropics, where they root in the mud, and form a dense thicket down to the verse of the water.

SQUILL, p. 1072, def. 1.

Squill (Scilla maritima).

The bulb has been known as a medicine from the earliest ages; it is still held in great estimation, and is of very frequent use. It acts as an emetic, purgative, expectorant, or diuretic, in proportion to the dose in which it is given.

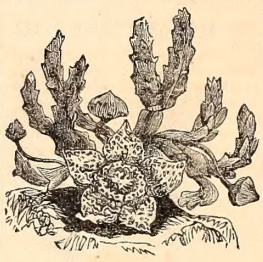
PLANTS—Continued.

SOLANUM, p. 1050.

A genus of plants, nat. order Solanaceæ, of which it is the type. It is one of the most extensive genera of plants, upward of 400 species having been enumerated as belonging to it, many of them possessing apparently very opposite properties.

Egg Plant (Solanum molongena).

STAPELIA. An extensive and curious genus of plants, nat. order Asclepiadaceæ. They are succulent plants without leaves, frequently covered over with dark tubercles, giving them a very grotesque appearance.



Stapelia variegata.

STRAWBERRY-PEAR. A plant of the genus cactus, the C. triangularis, which grows in the West-India Islands. It bears the best flavored fruit of any of the Cactaceæ. It is sweetish, slightly acid, pleasant, and cooling.

Strawberry Pear (Cactus triangularis).

SUGAR-CANE, p. 1105.

It resembles the reeds common in morasses, except that its skin is soft, and its pulp a spongeous substance. It usually grows to the height of 18 to 20 feet, with a diameter of two inches. It is divided by knots at the distance of 18 inches from each other. At its top it protrudes several long green leaves, and in the center of these is its flower. When the leaves springing from the knots decay, the plant is ripe. It is then cut, stripped of its leaves, and carried to the mills, where it is crushed and its juice expressed.

Sugar-Cane. (Saccharum officinarum).

PLANTS—Continued.

SWEET-POTATO, p. 1118.

A native of the East Indies, but now cultivated in all the warmer parts of the globe. There are numerous varieties. The tubers are edible, and are much used in tropical countries. They are considered to be very nutritious, wholesome, and easy of digestion.

Sweet-Potato (Convolvulus batatas).

SYNGENESIA, p. 1122.

The thistle, tansy, daisy, southernwood, sunflower, and marigold, are examples.

Syngenesia (Senecio Jacobæo).
1. Floret magnified. 2. Section of floret magnified.

TANGHINIA. A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Apocynaceæ. T. venenifera is a tree which produces the celebrated tanghin poison of Madagascar. The poisonous quality resides in the kernel, and one seed is said to be sufficient to kill twenty persons.

Tanghinia venenifera.

TARO, p. 1130.

A plant of the genus Arum, the A. esculentum, or Colocasia esculenta, cultivated in the Polynesian islands for the sake of its esculent root, which, although pungent and acrid in its natural state, becomes mild and palatable by baking or boiling.

Taro (Colocasia esculenta).

PLANTS—Continued.

TEASEL, or TEAZLE, p. 1133.

Common Teasel (Dipsacus fullonum). a, Hooked scale of the Receptacle; b, Corolla slit open.

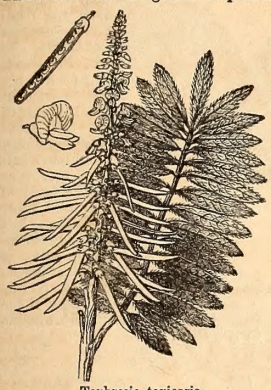
TEA PLANT, p. 1132.

Black Tea (Thea bohea).

TEPHROSIA. A genus of plants, nat. order Leguminosæ, papilionaceous division. It consists of shrubs, undershrubs, or herbs scattered over every quarter of the globe, T. toxicaria is a native of the West Indies, and of Cayenne. The whole plant affords a narcotic poison, and the leaves are used for intoxicating fish.



Tephrosia toxicaria.

TOBACCO, p. 1157.

Tobacco (Nicotiana tabacum)

A plant, a native of America, of the genus Nicotiana, the N. tabacum, the dried leaves of which are much used for smoking and chewing, and in snuff. As a medicine, it is narcotic, emetic, and cathartic; and it possesses two additional powers at least, if not more. Tobacco has a strong disagreeable smell, and an acrid taste.

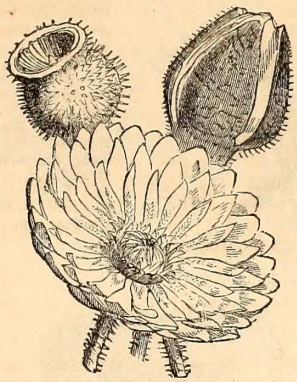
URCEOLA.

Urceola elastica.

A genus of plants; nat. order Apocynaceæ. The plants of this genus inhabit the Malayan peninsula. The most important species is the U. elastica, or caoutchouc-vine.

PLANTS—Continued.

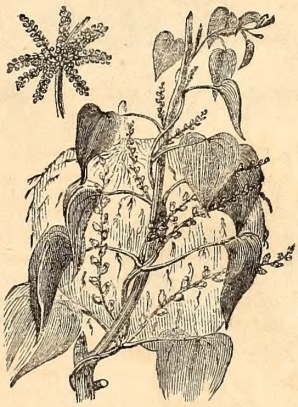
VICTORIA.



Victoria regia.

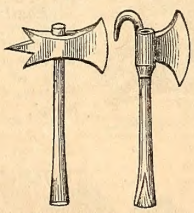
A genus of aquatic plants, named in honor of her Majesty Queen Victoria; nat. order Nymphaceæ. The V. regia is a native of Guiana and Brazil; its large spreading leaves are three to five feet in diameter, and have a rim three to five inches high; and its immense rose-white flowers sometimes, when fully expanded, attain a diameter of twenty-three inches. In South America it is called water-maize.

YAM, p. 1277.



Yam (Dioscorea globosa).

POLE-AX, p. 842.



Boarding Pole-axes.

A sort of hatchet with a handle about fifteen inches in length, and a point or claw bending downward from the back of its head.

PORTCULLIS, p. 848, def. 1.

In fort., a strong grating of timber or iron, resembling a harrow, made to slide in vertical grooves in the jambs of the entrance gate of a fortified place, to protect the gate in case of assault.

PORTLAND VASE. A celebrated cinerary urn or vase, found in the tomb of the emperor Alexander Severus. The basis is of a deep blue glass, and the figures in the mythological scene represented upon it, are of the same material but whiter. It is now in the British Museum.

PREHENSILE, p. 859.

Prehensile (Coaita or Spider Monkey).

An epithet given by naturalists to certain animals which are capable of grasping with their tails as with a claw.

PRISM, p. 869.

Triangular prism.

A triangular prism of glass is one bounded by two equal and parallel triangular ends and three plane and well polished sides, which meet in three parallel lines, running from the three angles of the one end to the three angles of the other end. The prism is the instrument by means of which most of the remarkable phenomena of light and colors are exhibited.

PULKHA, p. 887.

It is made somewhat in the form of a boat, and, from its lightness, is very liable to be upset when the rein-deer, by which it is drawn, is strong and fresh. The traveler, in such a case, would be immediately thrown out were he not strapped to the pulkha.

Q.

QUADRUPEDS.

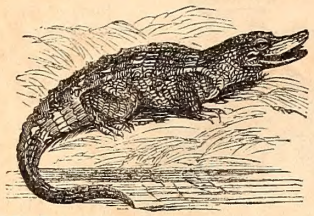
AI, p. 30.

Three-toed Sloth (Bradipus tridactylus).

It is as large as a cat, and is entirely adapted for living in trees. It is the only mammiferous animal known which has nine cervical vertebræ. It is found in the tropical parts of South America.

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

ALLIGATOR, p. 36.



ANT-BEAR, p. 52.

A quadruped that feeds upon ants. This animal has no teeth, but a snout or muzzle, with a long cylindrical tongue. The body is covered with long hair.

Great Ant-Eater (Myrmecophaga jubata).

ANTELOPE, p. 53.

Belonging to this numerous genus, there are nearly seventy different species, of which upwards of fifty inhabit the African continent alone.

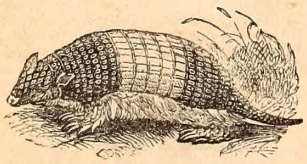
Springbok Antelope (Antilope euchore).

APE, p. 57, def. 1.

A genus of quadrumana, found in the torrid zone of both continents, of a great variety of species. In common use, the word extends to all the tribe of monkeys and baboons; but in zool., ape is limited to such of these animals as have no tails; while those with short tails are called baboons, and those with long ones, monkeys.

Long-armed ape (Hylobates lar).

ARMADILLO, p. 69.



Armadillo (Dasypus sexcinctus).

AUROCH, p. 86.

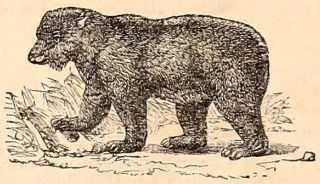
Auroch (Bos urus).

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

AYE-AYE. A singular nocturnal quadruped found in Madagascar, the Cheiromys Madagascariensis. In its habits it resembles the sloth, but it is classed by some naturalists with the monkey tribe, from the hand-like structure of its hinder feet. It is about the size of a hare, and is called aye-aye by the natives, from its peculiar cry.

Aye-aye (Cheiromys Madagascariensis).

BEAR, p. 107, def. 1.



Brown Bear.

BEAVER, p. 108, def. 1.

BUCK, p. 153, def. 1.

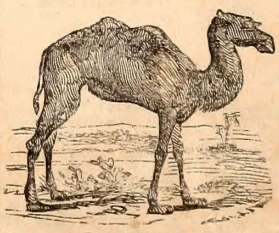
The male of the fallow-deer, of the goat, the sheep, the rabbit, and hare. It is applied only to the smaller quadrupeds.

Buck of Fallow Deer.

BUFFALO, p. 154.

The Bubalus, a species of the bovine genus, originally from India but now found in most of the warmer countries of the Eastern Continent.

CAMEL, p. 167, def. 1.



The hair of the Camel is imported into England chiefly for the purpose of being manufactured into fine pencils for drawing and painting. In the East, however, it serves for the fabrication of tents, carpets, and wearing apparel. The most esteemed hair comes from Persia.

Bactrian Camel.

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

CAMELOPARD, p. 167.

The giraffe, a species constituting the genus Camelopardalis. This animal is found in the central and eastern parts of Africa. It is timid and not fleet.

CHAMELEON, p. 190.

The extraordinary faculty which the Chameleon possesses of changing its color, has been supposed by some to arise in a great measure from the great size of the lungs, which, when fully dilated, renders the body of the animal most transparent; but this has been denied by some of the ablest naturalists, who contend that these changes proceed from two layers of membraneous pigment existing in the skin.

Fork-nosed Chameleon.

CHIMPANZEE, p. 199.

Linnæus placed the form under the genus Homo, with the specific name Troglodytes, next to Homo sapiens. It is one of those species which approach nearest to man.

CHINCHILLA, p. 199.

Chinchilla (Chinchilla lanigera).

They are gregarious and subterranean in their habits, and mild in disposition. One genus is the Lagotis of Cuvier, about the size of the rabbit, and much resembling it in form. The fur of these animals is used for tippets, muffs, linings to cloaks and pelisses.

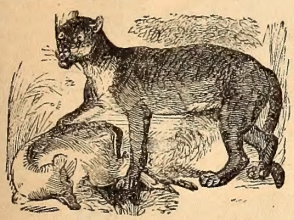
QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

CHAMOIS, p. 190.

CIVET-CAT, p. 208.

Civet-Cat (Viverra civetta).

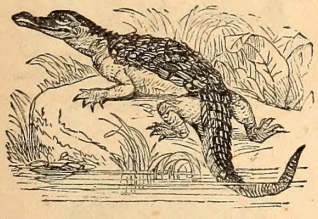
COUGAR, p. 272.



Cougar (Felis concolor).

A voracious quadruped of the cat kind, inhabiting most parts of America. It is by some called the red tiger, and is the most formidable and destructive of all the animals of America, particularly in the warmer climates, where it plunders the houses, carrying off fowls, dogs, cats, and other domestic animals. It frequently encounters the alligator.

CROCODILE, p. 285.



DIDELPHYS, p. 331.

Didelphys (Kangaroo).

A genus of mammiferous animals, which includes the opossum and kangaroo. The females are distinguished by having a marsupium or pouch, for the protection and preservation of the young.

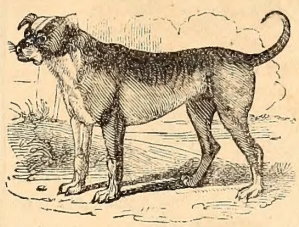
QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

Dogs.

BLOOD-HOUND, p. 130.

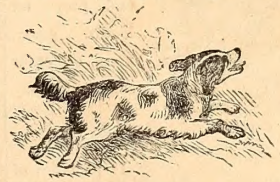
There are several varieties of this animal, as the English, the Cuban, and the African blood-hound. In formertimes, blood-hounds were not only trained to the pursuit of game, but also to the chase of man. A flying enemy, or a murderer, had but little chance of escape when once the blood-hounds were let loose upon him.

BULL-DOG, p. 155.

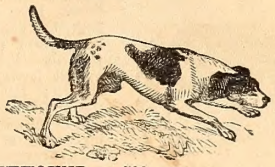


A species of dog of a particular form and of remarkable courage; so named probably from being employed in baiting bulls, or from the size of the head.

COCKER. A dog of the spaniel kind, used for raising woodcocks and snipes from their haunts in woods and marshes.

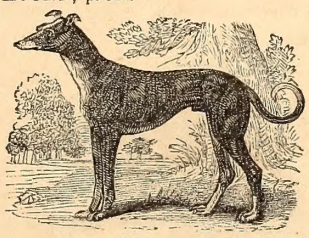


FOX-HOUND, p. 478.



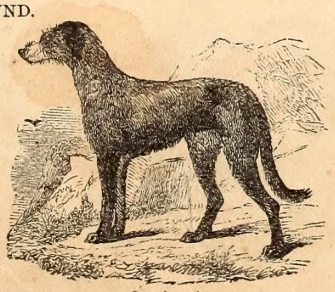
A hound for chasing foxes.

GREYHOUND, p. 520.



Remarkable for the keenness of its sight, the symmetrical strength and beauty of its form, and its great swiftness.

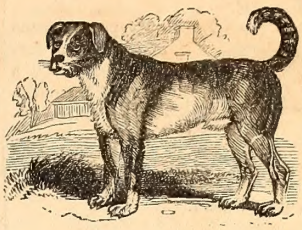
HOUND.



Stag-hound.

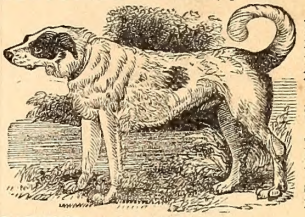
QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

MASTIFF, p. 698.



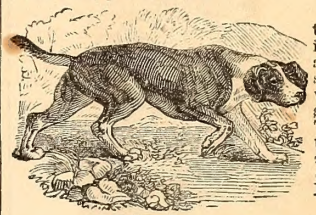
A variety of dog of a very old English breed, now seldom seen in its original state of purity. A true-bred mastiff is of considerable size and very stoutly built. The head is well developed and large, the lips deep and pendulous on each side of the mouth, and the whole aspect noble. This animal is capable of great attachment, and is valuable as a watch-dog.

NEWFOUNDLAND DOG, p. 359.



The pure English Newfoundland dog is remarkable for his zeal, his devotedness, and entire abandonment of self, when he rushes to the rescue of some drowning wretch.

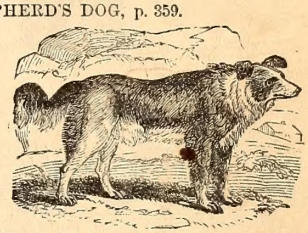
POINTER, p. 841, def. 3.



Pointer Dog.

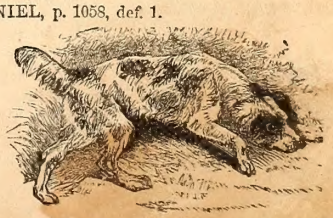
A variety of the dog used in shooting, and trained to stop and point where the game lies. This variety is the canis familiaris avicularis of Linn.

SHEPHERD'S DOG, p. 359.



SIBERIAN DOG. A variety of the dog, distinguished by having its ears erect, and the hair of its body and tail very long; it is also distinguished for its steadiness, docility, and endurance of fatigue, when used for the purpose of draught. In many northern countries these dogs are employed in drawing sledges over the frozen snow.

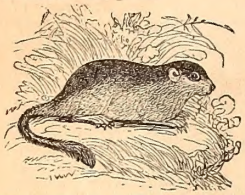
SPANIEL, p. 1058, def. 1.



Spaniel (Canis extrarius).

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

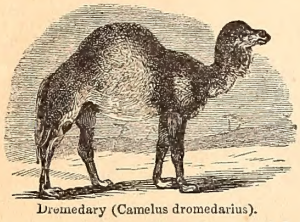
DORMOUSE, p. 361.



The popular name of the several species of Myoxus, a genus of Mammalia of the order Rodentia.

Common Dormouse (Myoxus avellanarius).

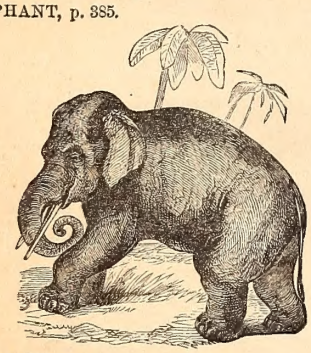
DROMEDARY, p. 369, def. 1.



Dromedary (Camelus dromedarius).

It is more swift of foot than the camel, being capable of traveling upward of a hundred miles a day, and of continuing its journey at that rate for several successive days.

ELEPHANT, p. 385.

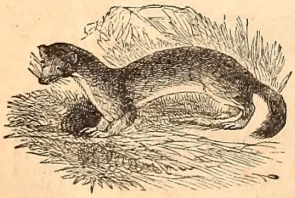


ELK, p. 386.

A quadruped, the Cervus Alces of Linn., a ruminant mammal, called moose in North America, from the Indian name Musu.

Elk (Cervus Alces).

ERMINE, p. 407.



It nearly resembles the martin in shape, but the weasel in food and manners. In winter, the fur is entirely white; in summer, the upper part of the body is of a pale tawny brown color, but the tail is tipped with black.

Ermine (Mustela erminea).

FALLOW-DEER, p. 436.

It is smaller than the stag; of a brownish bay color, whitish beneath, on the insides of the limbs, and beneath the tail.

Fallow-Deer (Cervus dama).

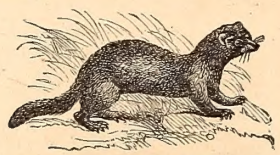
QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

FERRET, p. 447, def. 1.

An animal of the genus Mustela, or weasel kind.

Ferret (Mustela furo).

FOUMART, p. 477.



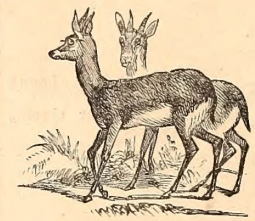
Foumart (Mustela putorius).

FOX, p. 478.

This animal burrows in the earth, is remarkable for his cunning, and preys on lambs, geese, hens, or other small animals.

Fox (Canis vulpes).

GAZELLE, p. 496.



It partakes of the nature of the goat and the deer. Like the goat, the gazelle has hollow permanent horns, and it feeds on shrubs; but in size and delicacy, and in the nature and color of its hair, it resembles the roe-buck.

Gazelle (Antilope dorcas).

GNU, p. 508, def. 1.

Gnu (Catoblepas gnu).

GOAT, p. 509.

They are found in all parts of the world, and many varieties are valued for their hair or wool; as the Cashmere goat, the Angora goat, etc. The male of the goat is called a buck.

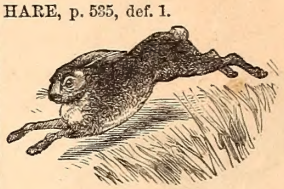
Goat of Cashmere.

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

GROUND SQUIRREL. A small quadruped of the genus Tamias, of a reddish color, with blackish stripes on its sides, residing in burrows, and found in the cold and temperate regions of both hemispheres.

Ground Squirrel (Tamias striatus).

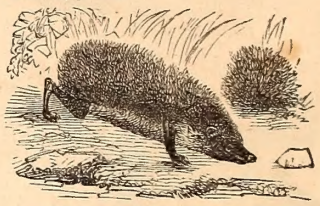
HARE, p. 535, def. 1.



A quadruped of the genus Lepus, with long ears, a short tail, soft hair, and a divided upper lip. It is a timid animal, often hunted for sport or for its flesh, which is excellent food.

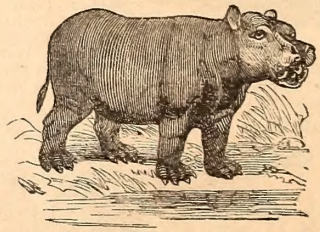
Hare (Lepus timidus).

HEDGEHOG, p. 544.



Hedgehog (Erinaceus Europæus).

HIPPOPOTAMUS, p. 553.



Hippopotamus (H. amphibius).

HYENA, p. 570.

Striped Hyena (H. vulgaris).

IBEX, p. 572.

A species of Capra or goat, inhabiting the Alps, Pyrenees, Apennines, etc.

Ibex (Capra Ibex).

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

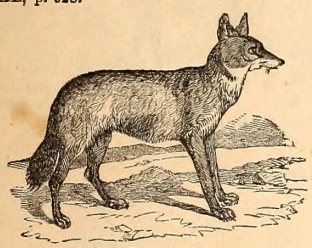
ICHNEUMON, p. 572.

Egyptian Ichneumon (Viverra Ichneumon).

INDRI. A tailless quadruped belonging to the lemur family. Its hinder limbs are very long. The natives of Madagascar tame this quadrumanous animal, and train it to the chase.

Indri (Indris brevicaudata).

JACKAL, p. 628.



Jackal (Canis aureus).

The jackals are of gregarious habits, hunting in packs: rarely attacking the larger quadrupeds. They feed on the remnants of the lion's prey, dead carcasses, and the smaller animals, and poultry, which they seize as prey.

JAGUAR, p. 629.

The largest and most formidable feline quadruped of the new world. It is marked with large dark spots in the form of circles, with a dark spot or pupil in the center of each.

Jaguar (Felis onça).

KANGAROO, p. 637.

The kangaroos feed entirely on vegetable substances, particularly on grass. They assemble in small herds, under the guidance of the older ones. The gigantic kangaroo is sometimes six feet in height, and is the largest of the New Holland animals.

Aroe Kangaroo (Macropus unialbatus).

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

JERBOA, p. 630.

They resemble the rat in size, but are sufficiently distinguished by the shortness of the anterior limbs, and the length of the hinder extremities, and by the tail, which is covered at its extremities with long hairs. They seldom move otherwise than by great leaps on their hind feet.

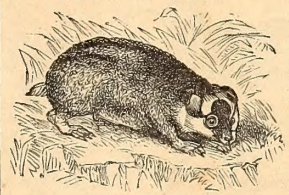
Egyptian Jerboa.

KINKAJOU, p. 640.

Kinkajou (Cercoleptes caudivolvulus).

It is a nocturnal animal, and in captivity is very mild.

LEMMING, p. 657.



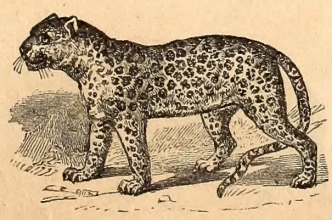
An English name applied to a group of rodent mammals, very nearly allied to the mouse and rat. They mostly inhabit the north of Europe and Asia.

Lemming (Mus Lemmus).

LEMUR, p. 657.

Red Lemur (L. ruber).

LEOPARD, p. 658.



Leopard (Felis leopardus).

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

LION, p. 668, def. 1.

The lion is a native of Africa and the warm regions of Asia. He preys chiefly on live animals, avoiding carrion, unless impelled by intense hunger.

Lion (Felis leo).

LAMA, p. 645, def. 2.

Brown Llama (Auchenia llama).

Its hide makes good leather, and its hair, of woolly nature, is in great request for weaving light wiry stuffs. The color of the animal varies, in different individuals, but brown is the general tint; the hair being always longer, thicker, and more frizzly on the body, than on the head, neck, and legs.

LYNX, p. 683, def. 1.

Lynx (Felis Lynx).

MAKI, p. 688.

A quadrumanous animal. The ring-tailed maki is of the size of a cat.

Ring-tailed Maki.

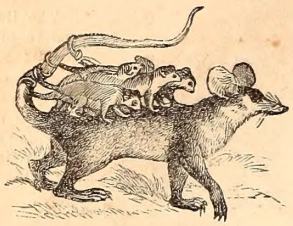
MARMOT, p. 695.

A quadruped of the genus Arctomys, allied to the murine tribe. It is about the size of the rabbit, and inhabits the higher region of the Alps and Pyrenees.

Marmot (Arctomys marmotta).

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

MARMOSE, p. 695.



Marmose (Didelphys marina)

MARSUPIAL, p. 696.

Marsupial (Didelphys opossum).

The skin of the animal is so arranged round the mammæ as to form a pouch, in which not only the imperfect fetus, attached to the nipple by its mouth, remains till fully developed, but into which, long after it is able to run about, it leaps when alarmed, or when wishing to conceal itself. The marsupials form the fourth order of mammalia of Cuvier. There are many genera both herbivorous and carnivorous. The kangaroo and opossum are familiar examples.

MARTEN, p. 696.

Pine Marten (Mustela martes).

An animal allied to the weasels, of several species, genus Mustela, Linn. It is found in England, and in many localities on the continent of Europe and in North America.

MERINO SHEEP, p. 708.

The Spanish word merino signifies an overseer of pasture lands; and is applied to this breed of sheep, because in Spain they are kept in immense flocks under a system of shepherds, with a chief as a head, and with a general right of pasturage all over the kingdom.

MOLOCH.

Moloch-lizard (Moloch horridus).

A genus of lizards found in Australia, about King George's Sound. M. horridus, moloch-lizard, in its external appearance, is one of the most ferocious of reptiles, the horns on the head and the numerous spines on the body giving it a most formidable appearance. Its name is given to it from part of a line in Milton, "Moloch, horrid king."

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

MONKEY, p. 726, def. 1.

Silky Tamarin (Midas rosalia).

Diana Monkey (Cercopithecus Diana).

MOUFFLON. The Ovis musmon, an animal of the sheep kind, inhabiting the mountainous parts of Corsica, Sardinia, Greece, etc. It is about the size of a small fallow-deer, and, although covered with hair, bears stronger resemblance to the ram than to any other animal, both in regard to its horns and its general conformation.

Mouffion (Ovis musmon).

MUSK DEER, p. 739.

Musk Deer (Moschus moschiferus).

This animal is a little more than three feet in length; the head resembles that of the roe, the fur is coarse, like that of the cervine race, but thick, erect, smooth, and soft.

MUSK OX, p. 739.

Musk Ox (Ovibos moschatus).

It has large horns united at the skull, but turned downward on each side of the head. The hair of this animal is very long and fine.

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

MYCETES. [Gr. μυκητης, one who bellows.] The howling monkeys, a genus of quadrumanous animals inhabiting the American continent. They are remarkable for the powerful development of the voice, which has a prodigious volume and a most frightful sound. They are shaggy animals, about the size of a fox, and subsist on fruits and foliage.

Howling Monkey (Mycetes ursinus).

NYLGAU, p. 761.

Nylgau (Antilope picta).

A ruminant mammal of the caprid tribe, as large as, or larger than a stag. It is the Damalis Risia, of modern naturalists, and the Antilope picta, of the older ones. It inhabits Northern India.

OCELOT, p. 766.

Ocelot (Felis Pardalis).

OPOSSUM, p. 774.

Virginian Opossum (Didelphys Virginiana).

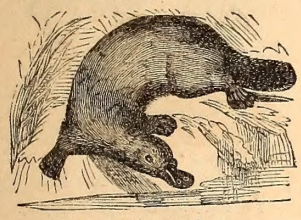
They are fetid and nocturnal animals, arboreal in their habits, remaining on trees, and there pursuing birds, insects, etc., although they do not despise fruit. The true opossums are now limited to the American continent, but their former existence in Europe is proved by the fossil remains that have been found in the Paris basin. It is almost the size of a cat, the general color whitish gray, and the whole hair of a wool-like softness. On the ground the motions of the opossum are awkward and clumsy, but on the branches of a tree he moves with great celerity and ease, using his tail, which is prehensile, to assist his motions. During the night he steals into villages, attacks fowls, eats their eggs, etc. He sometimes commits great depredations on orchards, but his favorite food is the persimmon. The female has from ten to fifteen young, which are for a long time nourished in the pouch, and to which they resort on the appearance of any danger.

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

ORANG OUTANG, p. 776.

These animals walk on their hind legs, feed on fruits, sleep on trees, and make a shelter against the inclemencies of the weather. They are remarkable for their strength as well as their ability to use weapons with the hand.

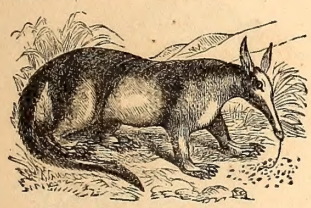
ORNITHORHYNCHUS, p. 779.



Ornithorhynchus paradoxus.

This animal is peculiar to the fresh-water rivers and lakes of Australia and Van Dieman's Land, and is also known by the names of duck-bill, or duck-billed platypus, and water-mole.

ORYCTEROPUS.



Earth-wolf (Orycteropus capensis).

[Gr. ορυκτηρ, a digger, and πους, a foot.] A genus of edentate insectivorous animals, partaking of the nature both of the ant-eater and the armadillo. The O. capensis has received the name of the aard-vark, or earth-hog, from the Dutch colonists at the Cape of Good Hope, from its habit of burrowing, and from its fancied resemblance to a small short-legged hog. Its taper head and powerful claws are admirably adapted for burrowing.

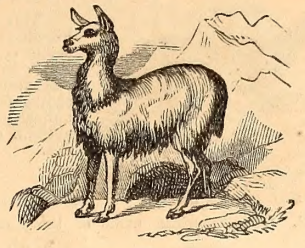
OTTER, p. 781.

Otter (Lutra vulgaris).

The common river otter, the Lutra vulgaris of Europe, is a quadruped adapted to amphibious habits, by its short, strong, flexible, palmated feet, which serve as oars to propel it through the water, and by its long and strong tail, which acts as a powerful rudder, and enables the animal to change its course with great ease and rapidity. It inhabits the banks of rivers, and feeds principally on fish. When his retreat is found he instantly takes the water and dives, remaining a long time underneath it, and rising at a considerable distance from the place at which he dived. The weight of a full-grown male is from 20 to 24 pounds. In many parts of England, and especially in Wales, the otter is hunted with dogs trained for this purpose, and with all the form and circumstances of the chase.

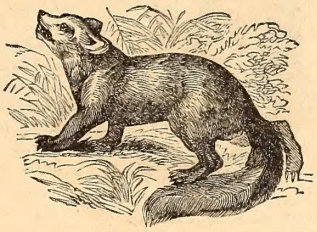
QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

PACO, or PACOS, p. 790, def. 1.



Auchenia Paco.

PANDA.



Panda (Ailurus refulgens).

A quadruped of the genus Ailurus, the A. refulgens. It is a native of the woody parts of the mountains of Northern India, and is of a bright fulvous color. Caps are made from its fur. In Nepaul it is called wah. No quadruped excels it in climbing.

PHASCOLARCTOS. A marsupial animal, closely allied to the phalangers. It is common in New South Wales, where it is called by the natives koala, by the colonists "the monkey." Its generic name is derived from its having some resemblance to a bear (φασκωλον, a pouch, and αρκτος, a bear).

Phascolarctos fuscus.

PLATYPUS, p. 834.

Platypus (O. Paradoxus).

Two quadrupeds of Australia, now called Ornithorhynchus paradoxus and O. fuscus.

PORCUPINE, p. 847.

The crested or common porcupine (H. cristatus), which inhabits Italy and Africa, has a body about two feet in length, four toes on each of the fore feet, and five on each of the hind feet, a crested head, a short tail, and the upper lip divided like that of the hare.

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

PRIONODON.

Delundung (Prionodon gracilis).

[Gr. πριων, a saw, and οδους, a tooth.] A genus of quadrupeds, partaking of the structural character both of the Felidæ and Mustelidæ, but in the general economy and habits resembling the former only. P. gracilis is a native of Java, where it is called the delundung. It is a most active animal.

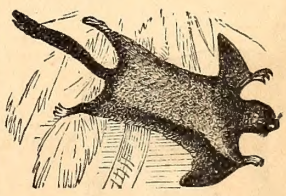
PROTELES.

Aard wolf (Proteles Lalandi).

The aard-wolf (earth-wolf) of the Cape of Good Hope (Proteles Lalandi). It forms the connecting link between the hyenas and civets, resembling the former in its general contour and manners, though of inferior size and strength, and having more of the lengthened head and pointed muzzle of the latter. It is very destructive to young lambs.

PTEROMYS. [Gr. πτερον, a wing, and μυς, a mouse.] The winged mouse, or flying squirrel; a genus of rodent animals, to which the skin of the flank, extending between the fore and hind legs, imparts the faculty of supporting themselves for a moment in the air, and of making very great leaps.



Pteromys (Flying Squirrel).

QUAGGA, p. 896.

Quagga (Equus Quagga).

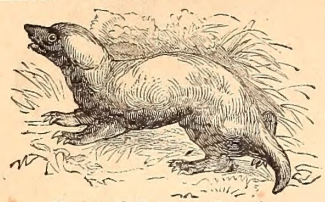
A pachydermatous mammal, the Equus Quagga, nearly allied to the ass on the one hand, and the zebra on the other. It inhabits southern Africa.

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

RACCOON, p. 903.

Raccoon (Procyon lotor).

RATELLUS.



Honey-ratel (Ratellus mellivorus).

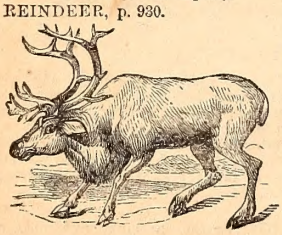
The ratel, a genus of carnivorous quadrupeds of the weasel family, natives of India and the Cape of Good Hope. The R. mellivorus of the Cape is celebrated for the destruction it makes among the nests of the wild bee, to the honey of which it is very partial.

RED-DEER. The common stag (Cervus elaphus), a native of the whole of the forests of Europe and Asia where the climate is temperate.

Red-Deer (Cervus elaphus).

REINDEER, p. 930.

Among the Laplanders, he is a substitute for the horse, the cow, the goat, and the sheep, as he furnishes food, clothing, and the means of conveyance. This animal will draw a sledge on the snow more than a hundred miles in a day.



Reindeer (Cervus tarandus).

RHINOCEROS, p. 953.

Rhinoceros Indicus.

ROE-BUCK, p. 961.

Roe-buck (Cervus capreolus).

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

SABLE, p. 973.

This animal burrows in the earth or under trees; in winter and summer subsisting on small animals, and in autumn on berries.

Sable (Mustela zibellina).

SAKIS. The American name of those monkeys which constitute the genus Pithecia of Desmarest and Illiger. They have for the most part long and bushy tails, and thus have obtained the name of Fox-tailed monkeys.

Saki Cuxio (Pithecia satanas).

SAPAJOU, p. 980.

The Sapajous are very active, and climb well. They are small in size, playful in disposition, leading a gregarious life, and feeding chiefly on fruits and insects.

Sapajou (Cebus capucinus).

SHEEP, p. 1020, def. 1.

Barbary Broad-tailed Sheep (Ovis steatopyga).

Rocky Mountain Sheep (Ovis montana).

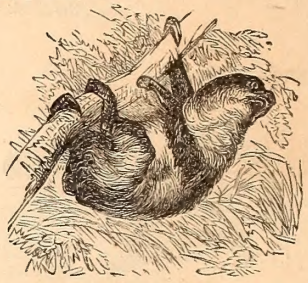
QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

SKUNK, p. 1038.

This animal has two glands, near the inferior extremity of the alimentary canal, which secrete an extremely fetid liquor, and which the animal has the power of emitting at pleasure as a means of defense.

Skunk (Mephitis Americana).

SLOTH, p. 1042, def. 3.



Two-toed Sloth (Bradypus didactylus).

They live on trees, and never remove from the one they are on until they have stripped it of every leaf. The sloths are exceedingly helpless when on the ground, and move with great difficulty; and hence the accounts of their slowness have been greatly exaggerated.

SLOW LEMUR, or SLOW-PACED LEMUR.

Slow-paced Lemur (Loris tardigradus).

A species of lemur, the L. tardigradus of Linn., and Loris stenops of Illiger; also called the sloth of Bengal. It is an animal of small size, scarcely equal to that of a cat, and has been so named from the slowness of its gait.

SQUIRREL, p. 1072.

Common Squirrel (Sciurus vulgaris).

The squirrels are formed into a family, Sciuridæ, the type of which is the genus Sciurus, Linn., or true squirrels. This family comprehends three groups; the true squirrels (Sciurus), the ground-squirrels (Tamias), and the flying squirrels (Pteromys).

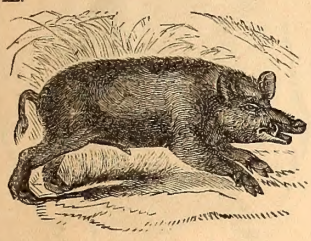
QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

SPRING-BOK, p. 1069.

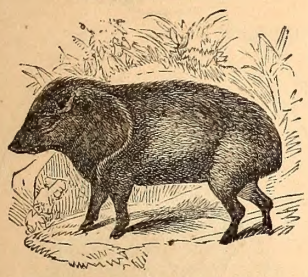
Spring-bok (Antilope euchore).

A ruminant mammal of the caprid tribe, the Antilope euchore, or Springer Antelope, which inhabits the plains of South-Africa.

SUIDÆ.



Wild Boar (Sus scrofa).



Collared Peccary (Sus Tajussu).

[L. sus, a hog or a swine.] Swine, a family of pachydermatous mammalia, of high importance to man for economical purposes. The family includes the domestic hog, of which there is an endless variety of breeds; the wild boar (Sus scrofa, Linn.); and the Peccary (Dicotyles, Cuv.) a native of America.

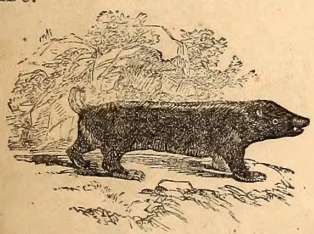
SUSLIK, p. 1114.

Suslik (Mus scitillus).

There are some species in America. It is named also the earless marmot.

TELEDU.

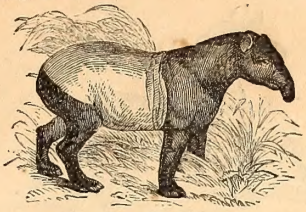


Teledu (Mydaus meliceps).

A Javanese quadruped, allied to the skunk, and, like it, when provoked, capable of diffusing a most abominable stench. Its principal food consists of earth-worms, which it turns up with its snout. It is the Mydaus meliceps of authors, and was named by Sir Stamford Raffles Mephitis javanensis.

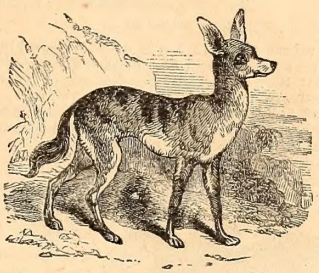
QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

TAPIR, p. 1129.



Malay Tapir (T. Malayanus).

THOS, or THOUS.



Thous Dog of Senegal.

A name given to the Thoan group of dogs, which is a kind intermediate between the wolf, the fox, and the jackal, of all of whose natures it somewhat partakes. The thous are larger than a jackal; they do not burrow, and are marked on the back by black and white colors, the rest of the fur being in general ochrey buff.

THYLACINUS. [Gr. θυλαξ, a pouch, and κυων, a dog.] A genus of marsupial animals, distinguished from the opossums by the hind feet having no thumb, by the hairy and not prehensile tail, and two incisors less to each jaw. Only one existing species is known, a native of Van Diemen's Land, where it is called the dog-faced opossum, or the hyena. It is nocturnal in its habits.

TIGER, def. 1153, def. 1.

Bengal Tiger (Felis tigris).

TUPAIADÆ. The banxrings, a family of insectivorous vertebrate animals, consisting of the single genus Tupaia. They are found in the Indian Archipelago, where they live in trees.

Banxring (Tupaia Tana).

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

VICUGNA, or VICUNA. A ruminant mammal, Auchenia vicugna, of the family Camelidæ. It is closely allied to the llama, the guanaco, and the paco, and in size exceeds the latter two, measuring 4 ft. 1 inch from the sole of the foot to the crown of the head, and 2½ ft. to the shoulders. Its wool is short and curly, and finer than that of any of its relative species. It is a native of South America, and frequents lofty slopes in the Andes of Chili, etc.

Auchenia Vicugna.

WANDEROO, p. 1247.

Wanderoo Baboon (Macacus silenus).

It has a long beard or mane of a grayish or whitish color, which descends on each side of the face like a ruff. The rest of the body is of a deep black color, and the tail ends in a brush of tufted hair.

WAPITI, p. 1247.

Wapiti (Cervus canadensis).

It is the most gigantic of the deer genus, frequently growing to the height of our tallest oxen. Its flesh is not much prized, but its hide, when made into leather, after the Indian fashion, is said not to turn hard in drying, after being wet.

WATER-HOG, p. 1252.

Water-Hog (Hydrochœrus capybara).

It feeds on vegetables and fish, swimming after and seizing the latter like an otter.

QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

WART-HOG. A name given to pachydermatous animals of the genus Phacochœrus, from the projecting appendages about the head. The engraved figure is the P. Œlani.

Head of Wart-Hog.

WEASEL, p. 1255.

Common Weasel (Mustela vulgaris).

WISTIT, p. 1268.

The striated monkey; a small species of monkey from South-America, with sharp claws and squirrel-like habits, the ouistiti of Buffon; and the hapales jacchus of Illiger.

Wistit (Hapales jacchus).

WISTONWITH, p. 1268.

Called also barking squirrel, burrowing squirrel, and prairie dog.

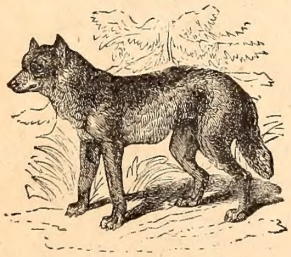
Wistonwith (Arctomys ludovicianus).

WOLF, p. 1270, def. 1.



Common Wolf (Canis lupus).

WOMBAT, p. 1270.

Wombat (Phascolomys wombat).

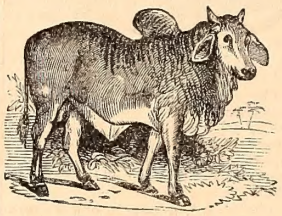
QUADRUPEDS—Continued.

ZEBRA, p. 1280.

Zebra (Equus zebra).

The zebras graze in herds on the steep hill-side, and seek the wildest and most sequestered spots, so that they are extremely difficult of approach, not only from their watchful habits and great swiftness of foot, but also from the inaccessible nature of their abode. They are incapable of being tamed, unless they are taken very young.

ZEBU, p. 1280.



The zebus are used as beasts of burden, and their flesh is used as an article of food, especially the hump, which is esteemed as a great delicacy.

Zebu (Taurus indicus).

QUERN, p. 899.

Grinding with the Quern.

QUINTAIN, p. 901.

Ancient Quintain at Offham, Kent, England.

R.

Races, p. 903, def. 1.

THE AFRICAN RACE.

THE AMERICAN RACE.

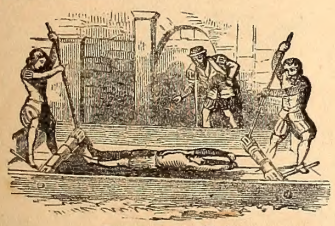
THE CAUCASIAN RACE.

RACES—Continued.

THE MALAY RACE.

THE MONGOLIAN RACE.

RACK, p. 904, def. 1.



Tortured on the Rack.

REDAN, p. 922.

Redan. Queue d'hironde.

In field fort., the simplest kind of work employed, consisting of two parapets of earth raised so as to form a salient angle, with the apex toward the enemy and unprotected on the rear. Two redans connected form a queue d'hironde, and three connected, form a bonnet de prêtre. Several redans connected by curtains form lines of intrenchment.

RAVELIN, p. 912.

In fort., a work composed of two lines of rampart meeting in a salient angle, and usually constructed beyond the main ditch of a fortress, and in front of the curtain between two bastions.

A, A, Bastions; b, b, Curtain; c, c, Tenailles; d, d, Caponniere; e, Ravelin; F, Redoubt in the Ravelin; g, g, Covert way; h, h, Re-entering places of arms; i, i, Redoubts in do.; k, k, Ditch; l, l, Ditch of Ravelin; m, m, m, m, Glacis.

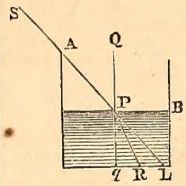
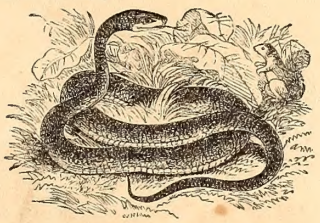
REFRACTION, p. 927.



A ray of light, when it enters a medium of different density, deviates from its original path and is bent at the surface of the medium. This deviation or bending is called refraction, and is the ultimate fact from which many of the most interesting phenomena of light receive their explanation. Suppose a beam of light proceeding from a luminous point S to be admitted through a small hole A, in the side of a vessel A B; then, the vessel being empty, the light will fall on the bottom at a point L, in the same straight line with S and A. Now let water be poured into the vessel, and suppose the beam of light to fall on its surface at P; then it will be seen that the light no longer continues its course in the same straight line, but is bent or refracted at P, and proceeds through the water in a straight line P R more nearly perpendicular to the surface.

REPTILES.

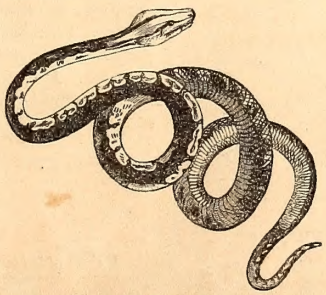
BLACK SNAKE, p. 126.



Black Snake (Coluber constrictor).

A serpent of a black color; two species are found in America. They are of the genus Coluber.

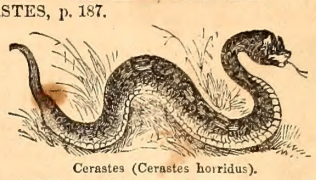
BOA CONSTRICTOR, p. 133.



Though destitute of fangs and venom, the serpents of this genus have been endowed with a degree of muscular power which renders them terrible. Once fairly involved in the crushing folds of the Constrictor, the strength of the strongest man would not prove of the slightest avail. It seizes even bullocks, and crushes their bones to pieces in its folds, after which, it swallows the animal whole. The species of boa are peculiar to the hot parts of South America.

REPTILES—Continued.

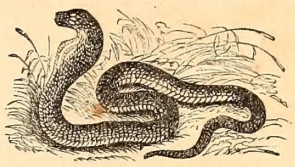
CERASTES, p. 187.



Cerastes (Cerastes horridus).

Remarkable for their fatal venom, and for two little horns or pointed bones, placed one over each eye. Hence they have received the name of horned vipers. C. horridus is an example.

COBRA DE CAPELLO. The Portuguese trivial name of the Naja tripudians, the spectacle snake or viper of the English, a reptile of the most venomous nature, found in various degrees of abundance in different hot countries of the old continent, and in the lands adjacent. The vipers of the genus Naja are all remarkable for the manner in which they spread out or flatten the sides of the neck and head when irritated. When disturbed by the approach of an individual or any noise the cobra raises the anterior part of its body, so as to appear to stand erect, distends its hood, and is then prepared to inflict a deadly wound.



CONSTRICTOR, p. 256, def. 2.

Boa Constrictor.

A species of serpents, the black snake of the United States. Also, the Boa constrictor, the largest of known serpents. [See BOA CONST.]

DRAGON, p. 365.

Flying Dragon (Draco volans).

Distinguished from their congeners in having their first six false ribs, instead of hooping the abdomen, extending in a nearly straight line, and sustaining a production of the skin, which forms a kind of wing comparable to that of the bats, but independent of the four feet. This wing sustains the animal like a parachute when it leaps from branch to branch, but does not possess the faculty of beating the air, and thus raising the reptile into flight like a bird. All the species are small and inoffensive.

FROG, p. 483, def. 1.

Edible Frog (Rana esculenta).

The frog tribe form a natural section of the Batrachians, Cuvier's fourth order of reptiles. They have no ribs, and their skin is naked, being without scales. The young, when hatched, breathe under water by means of gills, very much after the manner of fishes, being, in their early state of growth, quite unlike their parents. The frog tribe is very numerous. Besides the common frog, there is the green or esculent frog, the dotted frog, the alpine frog, the bull frog, the noisy frog, etc. Toads form a subgenus of the section.

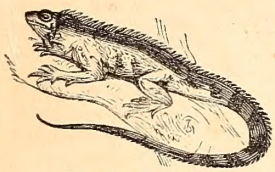
REPTILES—Continued.

GECKO, p. 496.

Gecko fascicularis.

A nat. family of Saurians. They are, strictly speaking, the nocturnal lizards, they are flattened especially in the head, their feet are rather short, and their toes of nearly equal length and often peculiarly formed; the tail varies, but is not long, and often has folds or circular depressions, but never a dorsal crest.

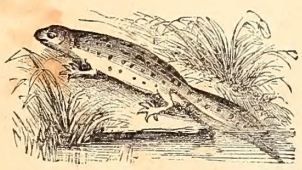
IGUANA, p. 575.



Iguana tuberculata.

It is from three to five feet long; it inhabits rocky and woody places, and feeds on insects and vegetables.

NEWT, p. 750.



Newt (Triton aquaticus).

The great water-newt is the Triton palustris, which abounds in the ponds and ditches of England. It is about six inches in length. The common water-newt is the Triton aquaticus, and is much smaller than the preceding.

PANGOLIN, p. 794.

They are also known by the name of scaly ant-eaters.

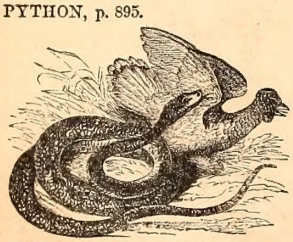
PYTHON, p. 895.



Doubly striped Python (Python bivittatus).

They sometimes attain a length of thirty feet. They are not venomous, but kill their prey, quadrupeds, fowls, etc., by compression.

RATTLE-SNAKE, p. 911.

Rattle-Snake (Crotalus horridus).

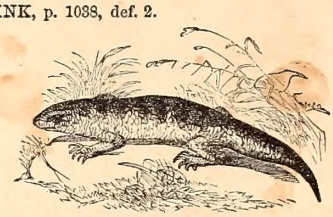
The rattle-snake is one of the most deadly of poisonous serpents. The genus is peculiarly American.

REPTILES—Continued.

SALAMANDER, p. 976.

Alleghany Salamander (Menopoma Alleghaniensis).

SKINK, p. 1038, def. 2.



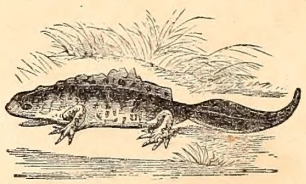
Skink (Scincus officinalis).

SNAKE, p. 1046.

Common Snake (Natrix torquata).

A name commonly given to any serpent, but more particularly used to designate the common snake, the Natrix torquata of Ray, and the Coluber natrix of Linn.

WATER-NEWT, p. 1252.



Water-newt, male (Triton cristatus).

It is not at all uncommon, is very aquatic in its habits, attains the length of six inches, and is perfectly harmless.

RETEPORA. [L. rete, a net, and porus, a pore.] A genus of polypiferous corallines, consisting of flattened foliaceous expansions pierced like net-work. R. cellulosa is known by the name of Neptune's ruffles.

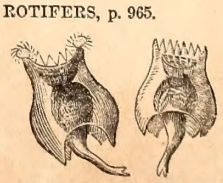
Retepora cellulosa.

ROTIFERS, p. 965.



Rotifera. Wide-mouthed Brachionus (Brachionus patulus) in two positions.

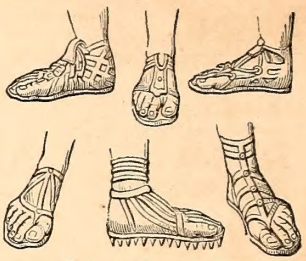
A class of infusorial animals, distinguished by their circles of cilia, sometimes single, sometimes double, which, through the microscope, appear like revolving wheels, whence they have been called wheel animalcules.

S.

SABOT, p. 973.

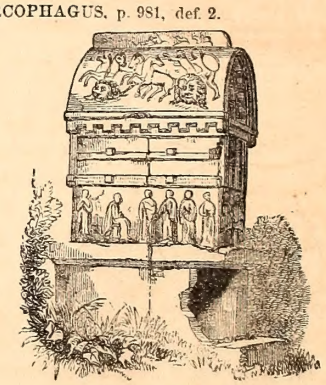
A kind of wooden shoe worn by the peasantry in France, Belgium, etc.

SANDAL, p. 979.



Grecian and Roman Sandals.

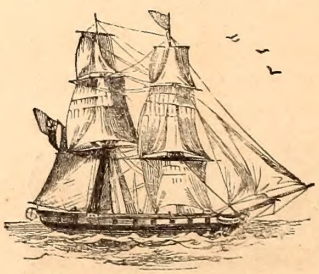
SARCOPHAGUS, p. 981, def. 2.



Sarcophagus, Xanthus.

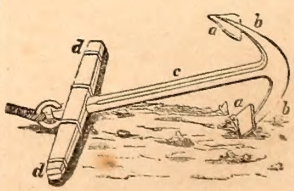
SHIPS AND NAVAL ARCHITECTURE.

ABACK, p. 1.



Laid Aback.

ANCHOR, p. 47, def. 1.

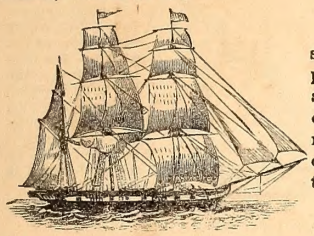


The anchor now used is iron formed with a strong shank c, at one end of which are two arms b, b, terminating in flukes a, a; at the other end of the shank is the stock d, d, supplied with a ring, to which a cable can be attached.

SHIPS—Continued.

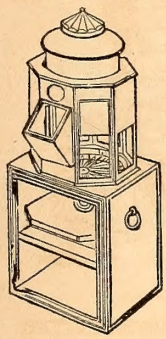
BAGGALA, or DOW. A two-masted Arab boat, used both for commerce and for piracy in the Indian Ocean, between the Malabar coast and the Red Sea. They are generally of 200 to 250 tons burden, exceedingly weatherly, and sail with great rapidity.

BARK, or BARQUE, p. 99.



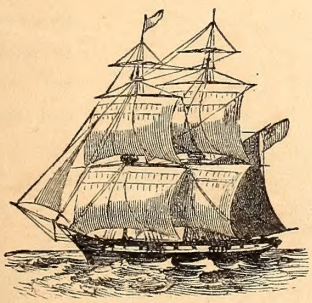
A small ship; but appropriately, a ship which carries three masts without a mizzen top-sail.

BINNACLE, p. 123.



A wooden case or box in which the compass and lights are kept on board a ship. It is sometimes divided into three apartments, with sliding shutters; the two sides contain each a compass, and the middle division, a lamp or candle.

BRIG, p. 148.

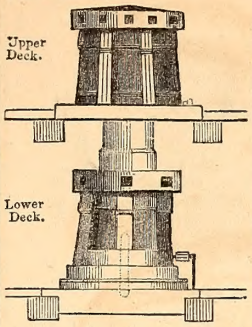


CATAMARAN, p. 181.

In naval lan., a kind of float. It consists of three pieces of wood lashed together, one of which serves as the bottom, and the other two as the sides. It is used on the coasts of Coromandel, and particularly at Madras, for conveying letters, messages, etc., to the shipping in the roads.

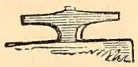
SHIPS—Continued.

CAPSTAN, p. 173.



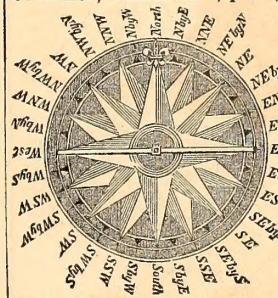
Capstans are made in various ways, but they all act on the principle of the wheel and axle. A very effective form of this machine is called the double capstan, in which the barrel round which the rope is coiled is composed of two cylinders differing in diameter. The smaller the difference between the diameters of the two axles the greater the power of this machine, or, the power is to the resistance as half the difference between the two circumferences to the circumference described by the power.

CLEAT, p. 212, def. 2.



It is formed with one arm or two, or with a hollow to receive a rope, and is made fast to some part of a vessel. There are several kinds of cleats on board vessels; such as belaying cleats, dock-cleats, or thumb-cleats. [The form of some may differ from that given above, but the use of all is the same.]

COMPASS, MARINER'S, p. 234, def. 5.



Compass Face or Card.

The four principal are called cardinal points; viz. North, South, East, and West. The names of the rest are compounded of these. The top of the box is covered with a glass pane, to prevent the wind from disturbing the motion of the card.

CORACLE, p. 266.

Fisherman with Coracle.

CROSS-TREES, p. 286.

a, a, Topgallant Cross-Trees.

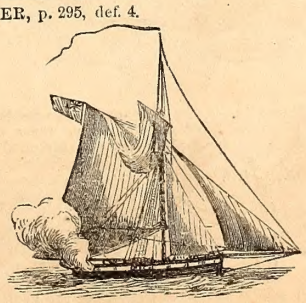
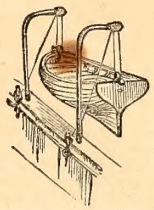
CUTTER, p. 295, def. 4.



Cutter.—Armed Cutter.

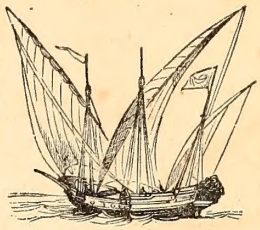
SHIPS—Continued.

DAVIT, p. 301, def. 2.



Davits are two projecting beams of wood or iron on the side or stern of a vessel, used for hoisting the boats by means of sheave and pulley. They are fixed so as to admit of being shipped and unshipped at pleasure.

FELUCCA, p. 446.



Felucca of Barbary.

A boat or vessel, with oars and lateen sails, used in the Mediterranean. It has this peculiarity, that the helm may be applied to the head or stern, as occasion requires.

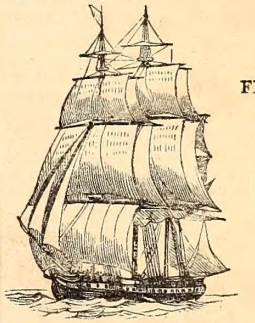
FRIGATE, p. 482, def. 1.



Frigate, Studding-Sails set.

FLUKE, p. 464.

Anchor. c c Flukes.

GAFF, p. 490, def. 2.

Cutter. a, Gaff.

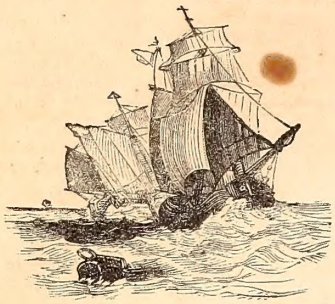
A sort of boom or pole, used in small ships, to extend the upper edge of the mizzen, and of those sails whose foremost edge is joined to the mast by hoops or lacings, and which are extended by a boom below, as the main sail of a sloop.

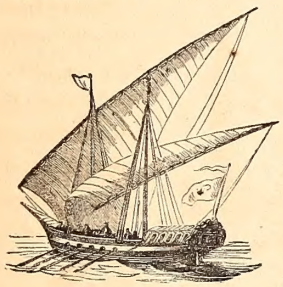
SHIPS—Continued.

GALIOT, p. 491.



Dutch Galiot.

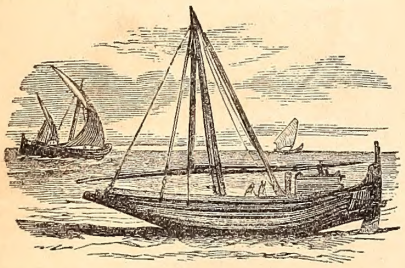
GALLEY, p. 492, def. 1.



Venetian Galley.

The largest sort of galleys, employed by the Venetians, were 162 ft. in length, or 133 ft. keel. They had three masts and thirty-two banks of oars; each bank containing two oars, and each oar managed by six or seven slaves. In the fore-part they carried three small batteries of cannon.

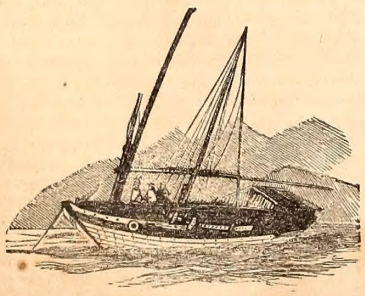
GAROOKUH.



Garookuh of the Persian Gulf.

A vessel met with in the Persian Gulf, and trading often as far as the Malabar coast. In length it varies from 50 to 100 feet, and is remarkable for the keel being only one-third the length of the boat. Though well formed it does not equal the baggala; it sails well, but carries only a small cargo, and is more suitable for fishing than for trading purposes.

GAY-DIANG.

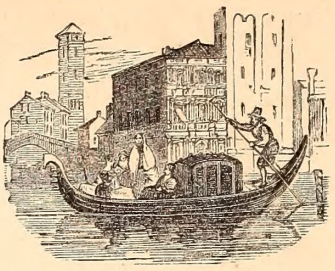


Gay-Diang of Anam.

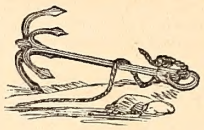
A vessel of Anam, generally with two, but in fine weather with three masts, 50 to 65 feet long, with lofty triangular sails. It has a curved deck, in construction somewhat resembling a Chinese junk, and carrying heavy cargoes from Cambodia to the Gulf of Tonquin.

SHIPS—Continued.

GONDOLA, p. 511.

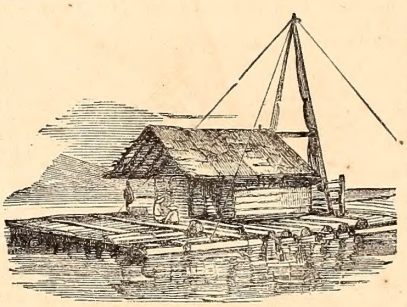


GRAPNEL, or GRAPLINE, p. 517.



A small anchor fitted with four or five flukes or claws, used to hold boats or small vessels.

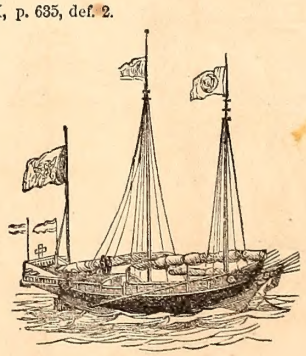
JANGADA.



Peruvian Jangada.

A raft-boat used in Peru and the northern parts of Brazil. The Peruvian jangada, to which that of Brazil is very similar, is formed of an odd number of beams, the center one being lower than the others. It has a square sail, and is steered by several perpendicular beams, placed at intervals along the middle of the raft.

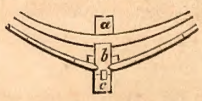
JUNK, p. 635, def. 2.



Chinese Junk.

The Chinese junks are flat-bottomed vessels from 100 to 300 tons burden. They have three masts, and a short bowsprit placed on the starboard bow.

KEELSON, p. 637.



Keel and Keelson, in ships.
a, Keelson; b, Keel; c, False Keel.

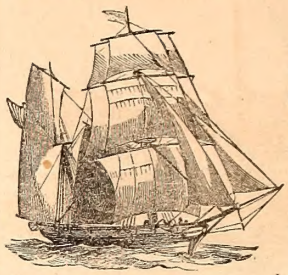
A piece of timber in a ship, laid on the middle of the floor timbers over the keel, fastened with long bolts and clinched, and thus binding the floor timbers to the keel.

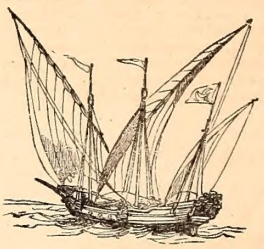
SHIPS—Continued.

KETCH, p. 638.



A strongly built vessel, of no well specified rig, but usually two-masted, and from 100 to 250 tons burden.

LATEEN, p. 649.



Felucca with Lateen Sails.

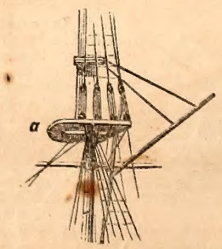
A lateen sail is a triangular sail, extended by a lateen yard, which is slung about one quarter the distance from the lower end, which is brought down at the tack, while the other end is elevated at an angle of about 45 degrees.

LIFE-BOAT, p. 663.

LUGGER, p. 680.

On the bowsprit are set two or three jibs; and the lugsails hang obliquely to the masts.

MAIN-TOP, p. 686.

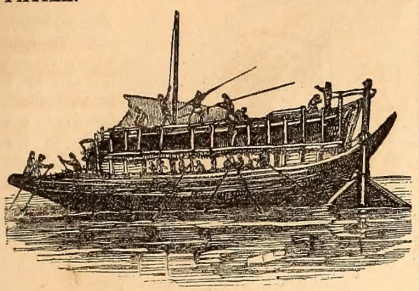


a, Main-Top.

A platform placed over the head of the main-mast, resting on the trestle trees to spread the rigging, and for the convenience of men aloft.

SHIPS—Continued.

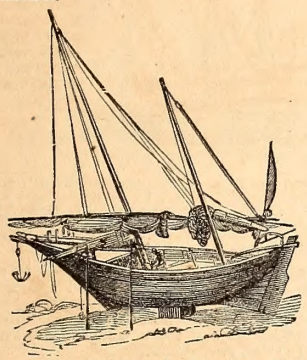
PATILE.



Patile of the Ganges.

A broad flat-bottomed boat, used for transporting the products of Upper Bengal down the Ganges; from forty to sixty-five feet long, lightly made, and capable of conveying a heavy cargo; it is especially adapted for transporting cotton. The patile is surmounted by a large shed, of a flat shape, as long as the boat, and carries a single large square sail.

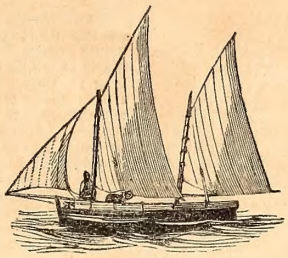
PATTEMAR.



A Malabar trading boat carrying about 500 Bengal maunds of rice. Pattemars are peculiar to Malabar, and are extensively employed in the coasting trade by the merchants of Bombay.

SHIPS—Continued.

PINNACE, p. 828.



A small vessel navigated with oars and sails, and having generally two masts rigged like those of a schooner; also, a boat, usually rowed with eight oars.

PIROGUE, p. 829.

Pirogue of Lakeba.

Pirogues are generally small, and worked by paddles; they are, however, sometimes large, decked, rigged with sails, and furnished with out-riggers. They are frequently confounded with proas, from which they differ, in having both sides alike, and in being formed from one piece of wood.

SHIPS—Continued.

POINTERS.

In ship-building, pieces of timber fixed fore-and-aft, and diagonally inside of a vessel's run or quarter, to connect the sternframe with her after-body. They are also called snake-pieces.

Frame of Ship, inside of Stern. 1, 1, Pointers; 2, 2, Quarter-timbers; 3, 3, Counter-timbers; 4, Counter-timber Knee; 5, Main Transom.

PROA, p. 871.

Proas are found chiefly within the region of the trade winds, for which by their construction they are peculiarly adapted.

Proa of Satawal, Archipelago of the Carolines.

ROWLOCK p. 967.

Ship's boat. a, a, Rowlocks.

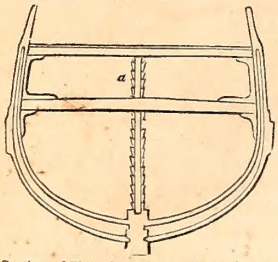
Merchantman under full Sail. 1. Flying jib; 2. Jib; 3. Fore top-mast stay sail; 4. Fore course; 5. Fore-top sail; 6. Fore-top-gallant sail; 7. Fore-royal; 8. Fore sky sail; 9. Fore-royal studding sail; 10. Fore-top-gallant studding sail; 11. Fore-top-mast studding sail; 12. Maincourse; 13. Main-top sail; 14. Main-top-gallant sail; 15. Main-royal; 16. Main-sky sail; 17. Main-royal studding sail; 18. Main-top-gallant studding sail; 19. Main-top-mast studding sail; 20. Mizzen course; 21. Mizzen-top sail; 22. Mizzen-top-gallant sail; 23. Mizzen-royal; 24. Mizzen-sky sail; 25. Mizzen-spanker.

SAILS, p. 976, def. 1. A sail extended by a yard hung (slung) by the middle and balanced, is called a square sail; a sail set upon a gaff or a stay, is called a fore and aft sail; which terms refer to the position of the yard, gaff, or stay, when the sail is not set. The upper part of every sail is the head, the lower part the foot, the sides in general are called leeches; but the weather or side edge of any but a square sail is called the luff, and the other edge the after leech. The upper two corners are earings, but that of a jib is the head; the lower two corners are in general clues; the weather clue of a fore and aft sail, or of a course while set, is the tack. The edges of a sail are strengthened by a rope called the bolt rope. Sails take their names from the mast, yard, or stay upon which they are stretched. Thus the sails connected with the main mast are the main-sail, main-top-mast sail, main-top-gallant sail, and the main-royal. In like manner there are the fore sail, the fore-top sail, the fore-top-gallant sail, and the fore-royal; and similar appellations are given to the sails supported by the mizzen or after-mast. The main-stay sail, main-top-mast-stay sail, etc., are between the main and fore masts, and the mizzen-stay sail, mizzen-top-mast stay sail, etc., are between the main and mizzen masts. Between the fore mast and bow-sprit, are the fore-stay sail, the fore-top-mast stay sail, the jib, and sometimes a flying jib and middle jib. The principal sails are the courses or lower sails, the top-sails and top-gallant sails.

SHIPS—Continued.

SAMSON'S-POST, p. 979.



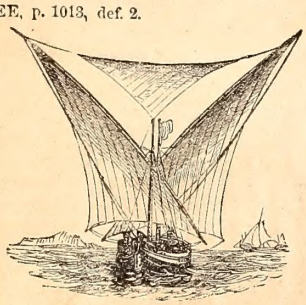
Supporting a beam of the deck over the hold, and thus acting to keep the cargo in its place. It is furnished with several notches that serve as steps to ascend or descend.

Section of Ship showing the Samson's-post, a, a.

SCHOONER, p. 988.

The schooner differs from the brig, chiefly in the rig of the mainmast; that of the schooner having only fore and aft sails, while that of the brig has square topsails.

SETTEE, p. 1013, def. 2.



SHORE, p. 1025.

In mar. lan., shores are props or stanchions fixed under a ship's side or bottom, to support her on the stocks, or when laid on the blocks on the slip.

Vessel on the stocks supported by Shores.

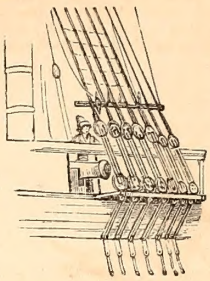
SHOULDER-OF-MUTTON-SAIL.

Boat with Shoulder-of-mutton-sail.

Shoulder-of-mutton-sail, a triangular sail, so called from the peculiarity of its form. It is used chiefly to set on a boat's mast.

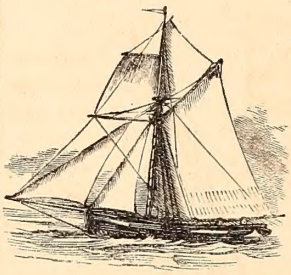
SHIPS—Continued.

SHROUDS, p. 1027, def. 3.



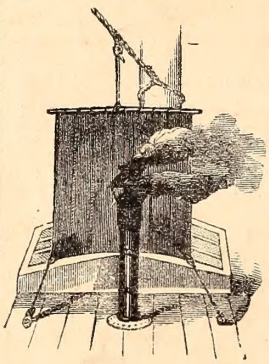
The shrouds as well as the sails, etc., are denominated from the masts to which they belong; they are the main, fore, and mizzen shrouds, the main-top-mast, fore-top-mast, or mizzen-top-mast shrouds; and the main-top-gallant, fore-top-gallant, or mizzen-top-gallant shrouds. There are also futtock shrouds, bowsprit shrouds, etc.

SLOOP, p. 1042.



A vessel with one mast, the main-sail of which is attached to a gaff above, to a boom below, and to the mast on its foremost edge. It differs from a cutter by having a fixed steeving bowsprit and a jib-stay.

SMOKE-SAIL, p. 1045.



A small sail hoisted against the fore-mast when a ship rides head to wind, to give the smoke of the galley an opportunity of rising, and to prevent its being blown aft on to the quarter deck.

SNATCH-BLOCK, p. 1046.

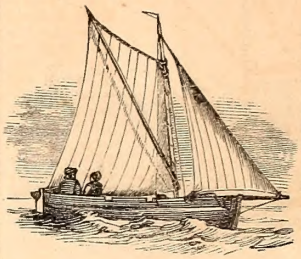
It is chiefly used for heavy purchases, where a warp or hawser is brought to the capstan. It is also called rouse-about-block.

SNOW, p. 1047, def. 2.

A vessel equipped with two masts, resembling the main and fore-masts of a ship, and a third small mast just abaft the main-mast, carrying a try-sail.

SHIPS—Continued.

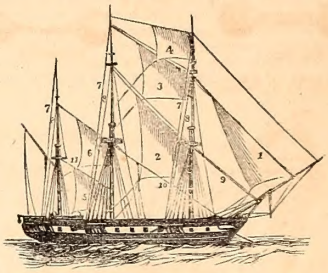
SPRIT-SAIL, p. 1069.



A small boom, pole, or spar which crosses the sail of a boat diagonally from the mast to the upper aftmost corner, which it is used to extend and elevate.

Sprit-sail rigged Boat.

STAY, p. 1080, def. 8.



Stays and Stay Sails. 1. Fore top-mast stay sail; 2. Main top-mast stay sail; 3. Main top-gallant stay sail; 4. Main royal stay sail; 5. Mizzen stay sail; 6. Mizzen top-mast stay sail; 7, 8. Fore, main, and mizzen top-mast and top-gallant mast back stays; 9. Fore stay; 10. Main stay; 11. Mizzen stay.

Stays, in ships, are large ropes used to support masts, and leading from the head of some mast down to some other mast, or to some part of the vessel. Those which lead forward are called fore-and-aft-stays; and those which lead down to the vessel's sides, back-stays.

TARTAN, p. 1130.

Used in the Mediterranean, both for commercial and other purposes. It is furnished with a single mast on which is rigged a large lateen sail; and with a bowsprit and fore-sail. When the wind is aft, a square sail is generally hoisted like a cross-jack.

TRANSOM, p. 1169.

Transoms are distinguished into the helm-post transom, which is at the head of the stern-post; wing transom, the next below, which forms the lower part, and deck transom, that whereon all the lower deck planks are rebated.

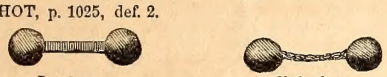
Frame of Ship, inside of Stern. 1. Main transom; 2, 2. Half transoms; 3. Transom; 4, 4. Transom knees; 5. Stern post.

SHIPS—Continued.

XEBEC, p. 1277.

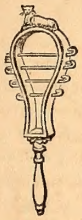
A small, three masted vessel, used in the Mediterranean sea. With a fair wind, in good weather, it carries two large square sails; when close hauled, it carries large lateen sails.

SHOT, p. 1025, def. 2.



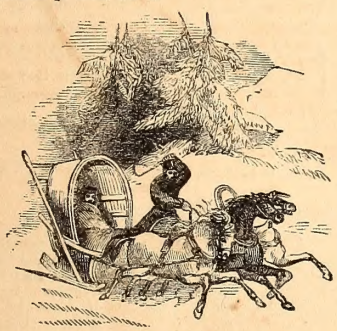
Bar-shot. Chain-shot.

SISTRUM, p. 1036.



A kind of timbrel which the Egyptian priests of Isis used to shake with their hands at the festivals of that goddess.

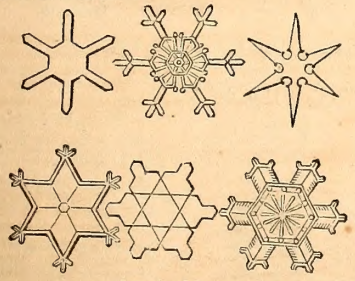
SLEDGE, p. 1040, def. 2.



Russian Sledge.

Sledges, or carriages without wheels, are much used in Russia and northern countries during winter, instead of wheel-carriages.

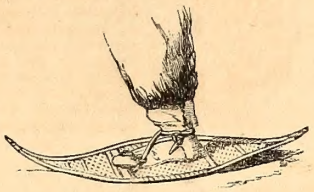
SNOW, p. 1047, def. 1.



Crystals of Snow.

Snow is formed in the air, when the temperature of the atmosphere sinks below the freezing point. The particles of moisture contained in the atmosphere are then frozen, and form flakes, which descend to the earth. These have great diversities of density, and display innumerable varieties of the most beautiful forms. Generally speaking, when examined by the microscope, they present modifications of stelliform and hexagonal crystals; and frequently they consist of a star of six rays, formed of prisms united at angles of 60°, from which other prisms shoot at similar angles, giving the whole an appearance of exquisite beauty and great regularity. Sometimes, however, snow presents no traces of crystallization, but falls in a fine powder; and in this case it is supposed to have been formed near the surface of the earth.

SNOW-SHOE, p. 1047.



SPEAR, p. 1060, def. 1.

Ancient Spears. a, Spetum, time of Edward IV.; b, Partisan, time of James I.; c, Pike, time of Cromwell; d, Voulge, or Boulge, time of Henry VII.; e, Ranseur, time of Henry VIII.

A long pointed weapon used in war and hunting, by thrusting or throwing; a lance. Also, the long piece of wood which is fixed to the body or beam of a cheval de frise.

SPLICE, p. 1066.

Splices of Ropes. a, Short Splice; b, Long Splice; c, Eye Splice.

There are different modes of splicing, as the short splice, long splice, eye splice, etc.

SPORRAN. [Gael. sporan, sparan.] The leathern pouch or large purse worn by Highlanders in full dress. It is worn in front of the philibeg. The word properly signifies a purse, and is sometimes used in that general sense.

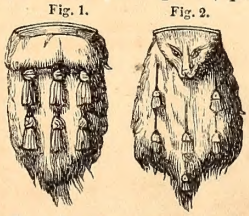

Fig. 1. Fancy dress Sporran; Fig. 2. Sporran as worn by the 93rd British Regiment.

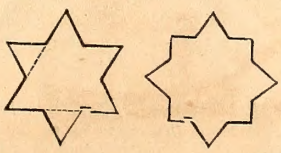
STAR FORTS, p. 1077.



Hexagonal Star Fort. Octagonal Star Fort.

A star redoubt is of the same form.

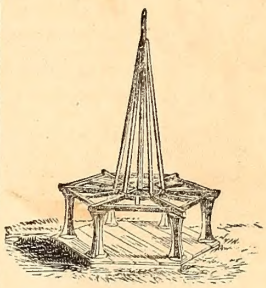
SPUR, p. 1070, def. 1.

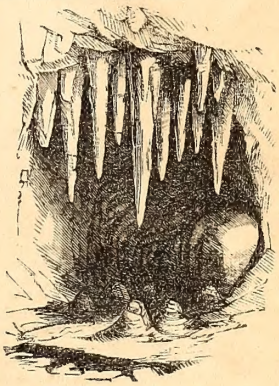
Ancient Spurs. a, Frankish Spur, of the tenth century; b, Brass Spur, of the reign of Henry IV.; c, Long-spiked rowel Spur, of the reign of Edward IV.; d, Long-necked brass Spur, of the reign of Henry VII.; e, Steel Spur, early part of the reign of Henry VIII.

STACK-STAND, or CORN-STAND. A basement of timber or masonry, sometimes of iron, raised on props and placed in a stack-yard, on which to build the stack. Its object is to keep the lower part of the stack dry, and exclude vermin.



Stack-Stand with Stack-Funnel.

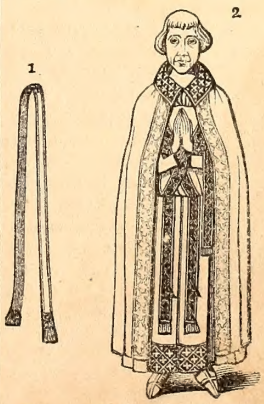
STALACTITE, p. 1074.



Cave with Stalactites and Stalagmites.

A subvariety of carbonate of lime, usually in a conical or cylindrical form, pendent from the roofs and sides of caverns like an icicle; produced by the filtration of water containing calcareous particles, through fissures and pores of rocks.

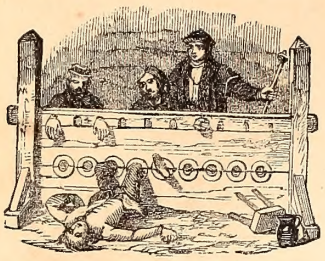
STOLE, p. 1087, def. 1.



1. Stole; 2. Priest wearing the Stole, A, A.

It is a long broad white band, of silk or silver stuff, lined with stiff linen, worn by deacons over the left shoulder, and reaching to the right hip; but the priests wear it over both shoulders, and hanging down across the breast. It is marked with three crosses, and not unfrequently has little bells at the end.

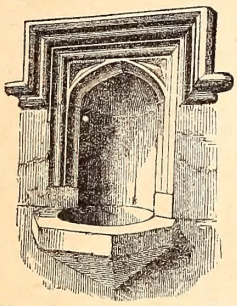
STOCKS, p. 1087, def. 17.



Punished in the Stocks.

This punishment, once common in England and the United States, is now nearly out of use.

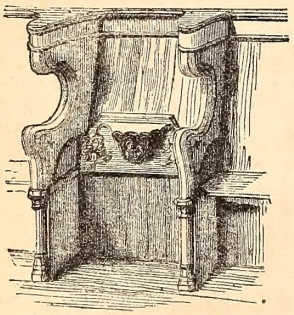
STOUP.



A basin for holy water, usually placed in a niche at the entrance of Roman Catholic churches.

Stoup, Maidstone Church, Kent, England.

SUBSELLIA.



Subsellia, All Souls, Oxford, England, the Seat turned up.

[L. subsellium, a bench or seat.] In eccles. arch., the small shelving seats in the stalls of churches or cathedrals, made to turn up upon hinges so as to form either a seat, or a form to kneel upon, as occasion required. They are still in constant use on the Continent, though comparatively seldom used in England. They are also called *miserere*s.

SURCOAT, p. 1112.

During the middle ages, a covering of body armor; being a loose, sleeveless wrapper, worn over a coat of mail. It was open in front, but not at the sides, usually reached to the mid-leg, and was girt to the waist by the sword-belt.

Surcoat. William Longespée, Earl of Salisbury, Salisbury Cathedral, England.

TABARD, p. 1123.

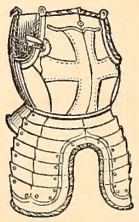
Tabard, Sir John Cornwall, Ampthill Church, Beds, England.

TAM-TAM, or TOM-TOM, p. 1128.

Various forms of Indian Tam-tams.

Used in the East Indies and in Western Africa. Public notices, when proclaimed in the bazaar or public parts of Eastern towns, are generally accompanied by the tam-tam. This is called proclamation by tam-tam.

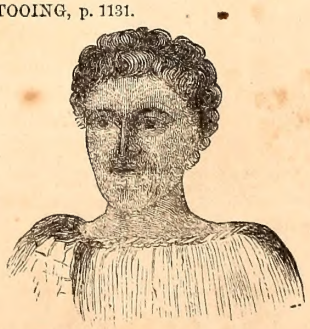
TASSES, or TASSETS, p. 1131.



Armor for the thighs; appendages to the ancient corselet, consisting of skirts of iron that covered the thighs. They were fastened to the cuirass with hooks.

Corselet with Tassets, A. D. 1525.

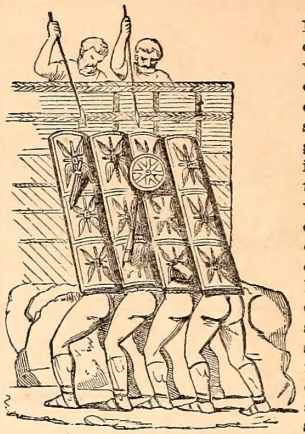
TATTOOING, p. 1131.



Head of Ko-towa-towa, a New-Zealand chief.

The word tattoo appears to be formed by a reduplication of a Polynesian verb ta, meaning to strike, in allusion to the method of performing the operation. Degrees of rank are indicated by the greater or less surface of tattooed skin.

TESTUDO, p. 1141.



Among the Romans, a cover or screen which a body of troops formed with their shields or targets, by holding them over their heads when standing close to each other. This cover resembled the back of a tortoise, and served to shelter the men from darts, stones, and other missiles.

Roman Testudo from Trajan's Pillar.

TOGA, p. 1158.

The name given to the principal outer garment worn by the Romans. It was a loose flowing garment made of wool, and sometimes of silk, the usual color being white. It covered the whole body with the exception of the right arm, and the right of wearing it was the exclusive privilege of every Roman citizen.

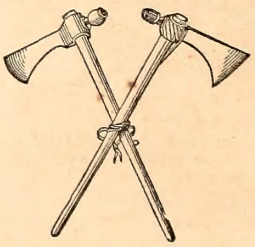
TOMAHAWK, p. 1159.



The tomahawk is the most valued of an Indian's weapons. In time of peace he uses it for cutting his firewood, etc., and in time of war it is the deadly weapon which he wields in the hand, or throws with unerring and fatal aim.

Tomahawks of the North American Indians.

TOWER, p. 1163, def. 3.

Worn by females in the reigns of William III. and queen Anne. It was composed of pasteboard, ribbons, and lace; the latter two disposed in alternate tiers, or the ribbons were formed into high stiffened bows, covered or not, according to taste, by a lace scarf or vail, that streamed down each side of the pinnacle.

Tower Head-dress, time of William III.

TOURNAMENT, p. 1163.

The tournament furnished an exciting show, and gave valor and military talent an opportunity of acquiring distinction; but it not unfrequently happened that angry passions burst forth on such occasions, so that a tournament often ended in a hostile conflict. The arms usually employed were lances without heads, and with round braces of wood at the extremity, and swords without points, and with blunted edges; but those who desired to signalize themselves in an extraordinary degree, encountered each other with the ordinary arms of warfare.

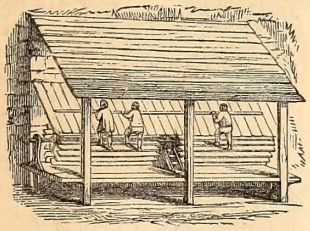
TREADMILL, p. 1171.



TREES AND THEIR FRUITS.

BANIAN TREE, p. 97, def. 3.

In bot., when any thing appears out of the ordinary course of nature, if a bud appears where buds do not usually appear, it is adventitious; so also with roots, as in the banian tree, where adventitious roots are sent down from the branches.

BREAD-FRUIT TREE, p. 145.

The bread-fruit tree, or Artocarpus, a tree which grows in the islands of the Pacific ocean, of the size of an apple-tree, producing a fruit shaped like a heart, and as large as a small loaf of bread, which is eaten as food.

BOX-TREE, p. 142, def. 6.

B. sempervirens is a British species, growing on dry hills in the south of England. Its hard, close, yellowish wood is employed in making mathematical instruments, and for wood-engraving.

Box-tree (Buxus sempervirens).

CEDAR, p. 185.

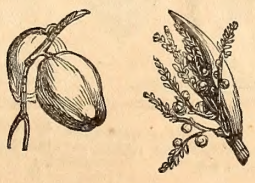
Cedar (Pinus cedrus).

Cedar exceeds oak in toughness, but is very inferior to it in strength and stiffness. A species of cypress is called white cedar in America. The red cedar, a species of juniper, is used for making black-lead pencils.

COCOA, p. 220.

The flowers proceed from within large pointed spathes, which always open on the under side. The spathes are inflammable, and frequently used by the natives as torches. From the juice of the stem, a kind of palm wine, and, subsequently, an ardent spirit, are prepared.

Cocoa-nut Palm (Cocos nucifera).



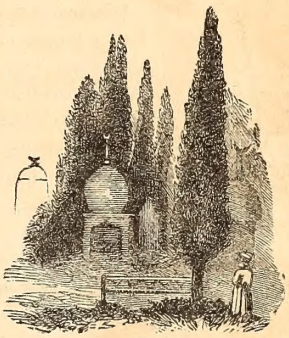
Cocoa-nut and Flower.

TREES—Continued.

CORK, p. 267, def. 1.

Cork-tree (Quercus suber).

CYPRESS, p. 296, def. 1.



The most remarkable are the sempervirens, or common cypress, the evergreen American cypress or white cedar, and the disticha or deciduous American cypress. The wood of these trees is remarkable for its durability.

Cypress Tree.

FAN-PALM. The talipot tree or great fan-palm (Corypha umbraculifera), a native of Ceylon, Malabar, and the East Indies. It attains the height of sixty or seventy feet, with a straight cylindrical trunk, crowned at the summit by a tuft of enormous leaves, and is one of the most magnificent of the whole tribe of palms. The leaves are employed for umbrellas, tents, coverings for houses, books, and the pith is made into a kind of bread. The leaves, when they first appear, are folded together like a fan, and afterwards spread open. They are usually eighteen feet long, exclusive of the leaf-stalk, and fourteen broad. Several other palms are called fan-palms from the structure of their leaves.

Fan-Palm (Corypha umbraculifera).

This fruit is not of the same nature as the apple, the orange, and other fleshy seed-vessels; but it is a hollow receptacle, containing a great multitude of minute flowers, the ripe fruit of which, erroneously called the seed, is imbedded in the pulp.

Fig (Ficus carica).

TREES—Continued.

FIR, p. 454.

Scotch Fir (P. Sylvestris).

The firs belong to the nat. order Coniferæ, and are almost all remarkable for the regularity of their growth, tapering form, and great altitude of their boles. Their timber is also valuable.

MANCHINEEL, p. 690.

Manchineel (H. mancinella).

It is among the most poisonous of all known vegetable productions. The whole plant abounds in a milky juice of a most venomous description, which, when dropped upon the skin, produces a sensation of severe burning, followed by a blister.

MAPLE, p. 693.

Maple (acer saccharinum).

Two species are common, the great maple, or sycamore (A. pseudo-platanus), and the common maple (A. campestris). The wood of the former is valuable for various purposes, as for musical instruments, saddle trees, wooden dishes, and many other articles, both of furniture and machinery. The knotted parts of the common maple furnish the pretty bird's eye maple of cabinet-makers. The sugar, or rock maple (A. saccharinum), yields a large proportion of sugar.

MULBERRY, p. 736.

Black Mulberry (Morus nigra).

The black or common mulberry (Morus nigra), is the only species of Morus worthy of being cultivated as a fruit-tree. The white mulberry (M. alba), is the most interesting of the genus, on account of its leaves being used for food by silk-worms.

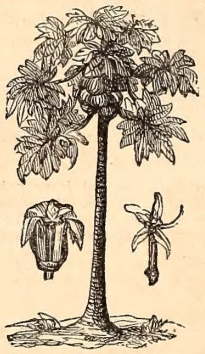
TREES—Continued.

PALM, p. 792, def. 4.

Cocoa-Nut Palm (Cocos nucifera).

It is supposed that there are about 1000 species of palms, and these are divided into fifty-nine genera. Wine, oil, wax, flour, sugar, salt, are the produce of palms; to which may be added, thread, utensils, weapons, food, and habitations. There is scarcely a single species in which some useful property is not found. The cocoa nut, the date, and others are valued for their fruit; the cabbage-palm, for its edible terminal buds; the fan-palm, and many more, are valued for their foliage, whose hardness and durability render it an excellent material for thatching; the sweet juice of the palmyra (Borassus), when fermented, yields wine; the center of the sago palm abounds in nutritive starch; the trunk of the Ceroxylon exudes a valuable vegetable wax; oil is expressed in abundance from the oil palm; an astringent matter resembling dragon's blood is produced by Calamus draco; many of the species contain so hard a kind of fibrous matter that it is used instead of needles, or so tough that it is manufactured into cordage; and finally, their trunks are, in some cases, valued for their strength, and used as timber, or for their elasticity or flexibility, as in the cane palm.

PAPAW, p. 795.



Papaw Tree (Carica papaya).

The juice of the unripe fruit is a most powerful and efficient vermifuge; the powder of the seed even answers the same purpose; the tree is also said to have the singular property of rendering the toughest animal substances tender.

PIACABA, or PIASABA. [Port.] The name under which a fibrous produce of the palm-tree, Attalea funifera, is imported from Brazil into this country. The fibers are derived from the dilated base of the leaf-stalks, and are extensively employed in the manufacture of brooms and brushes for street-sweeping. The fruit of this tree, which belongs to the cocoa-nut group, is imported under the name of coquilla nuts.

PECAN, p. 807.

Pecan (Carya oliviformis).

PINE, p. 828, def. 1.

White Pine (Pinus strobus).

The pines, together with the spruces and larches, abound in temperate climates, and are among the most useful of the products of the vegetable creation, on account of the valuable timber which they yield, and the resinous matter which they secrete. About thirty species are known, amongst which are the Canadian pine, the white pine, the red pine, the yellow pine, the pitch pine, the wild pine, or Scotch fir, the stone pine, etc.

QUINCE, p. 901.

Quince (Cydonia vulgaris).

Quinces, when mixed with other fruit, in cookery, communicate a very pleasant flavor.

SAND-BOX, p. 979, def. 2.

Sand-box Tree (Hura crepitans).

A tree or plant of the genus Hura, the H. crepitans. It is said that the pericarp of the fruit will burst in the heat of the day with a loud report, and throw the seeds to a distance.

TREES—Continued.

SAGUERUS.

Gomuti-palm (Saguerus saccharifer).

A genus of plants, nat. order Palmaceæ. S. saccharifer the gomuti-palm, inhabits tropical Asia. It yields a saccharine fluid abundantly, and also sago. It is likewise a great source of palm-wine.

SHADDOCK, p. 1016.

Shaddock Tree (Citrus decumana).

It is a native of China and Japan, and was brought to the West Indies by a Captain Shaddock, hence the name. The pulp is white, of a sweet taste mingled with acidity.

SPRUCE, p. 1070.

Norway Spruce (Abies excelsa).

The name given to several species of trees of the genus Abies. The Norway spruce fir is the A. excelsa, or Pinus abies, Linn., which yields the valuable timber known under the name of white or Christiana deal.

TREES—Continued.

SHITTIM, p. 1023.

Shittim wood (Acacia vera).

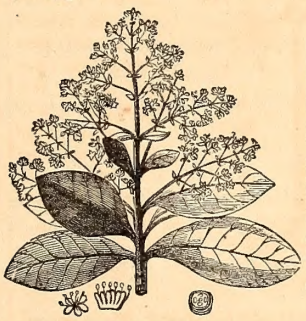
It is of the size of a large mulberry tree.

STAR-APPLE, p. 1077.

Star-Apple (Chrysophyllum Cainito).

Chrysophyllum Cainito is the most important species. It is a native of the West Indies. The fruit resembles a large apple, which in the inside is divided into ten cells, each containing a black seed, surrounded by a gelatinous pulp. It is eaten in the warm climates of America by way of dessert.

TEAK, p. 1132.



Teak (Tectona grandis).

It grows to an immense size, and is remarkable for its very large leaves, which are from 12 to 24 inches long, and from 8 to 16 broad. Teak timber is found to be excellent for ship-building, and has been called the oak of the East.

WAX-PALM, p. 1253.

Wax-Palm (Ceroxylon andicola).

The C. andicola, unlike most other palms, avoids the heat of tropical plains, and thrives best where the temperature of the air is lowered by the proximity of perpetual snow. It is called Palma de cera by the Spaniards, and grows to the height of 180 ft. The trunk is marked by rings, caused by the falling off of the leaves, which are eighteen to twenty feet long, and is covered with a thick secretion, consisting of two thirds resin and one third wax.

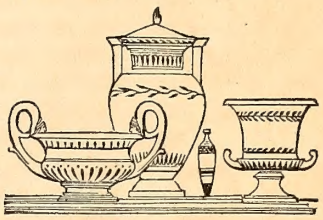
TRUNK-HOSE, p. 1180.

Costume, time of Queen Elizabeth. Doublet and Trunk-hose.

A kind of short wide breeches gathered in above the knees, or immediately under them, and distinguished according to their peculiar cut as French, Gallic, or Venetian. This garment prevailed during the reign of Henry VIII., Elizabeth, and James I.

V.

VASE, p. 1227, def. 1.



Grecian Vases.

Ancient vases of metal, stone, and clay, and of all varieties of shape, have come down to our time. The most numerous class are those of painted, dried or baked, clay, which have been discovered by thousands in tombs and catacombs in Etruria, Southern Italy, Sicily, Greece, and some of the Grecian islands.

VELOCIPEDE, p. 1229.

A carriage for one person, having two wheels placed one before the other, in the same line, and connected by a beam, on which the person sits astride, and propels the vehicle, by striking the tips of his toes against the earth.

TABLE OF SYNONYMS.

BY CHAUNCEY A. GOODRICH.

These words are here grouped and compared, not for the purpose of making those minute discriminations which belong to a regular treatise on Synonyms, but of carrying out a distinctive feature of Dr. Webster's original plan. He was accustomed, in defining a word, to select at times some other word of nearly the same import, and by comparing the two, was able to show more clearly the use and significance of the term under consideration. This plan is here adopted, and applied to many hundreds of the most important words in our language. The object is to give the leading sense of the several words thus compared, and in this way to aid those who may wish to pursue the subject, in making those nicer discriminations to which the inquiry will naturally lead. In the numerous schools and academies where this Dictionary has been placed as a book of reference, this aid may be found of peculiar value. It may furnish the means of making the "discriminations of synonyms" a regular exercise for the higher class of pupils. As to the benefits of such an exercise, the following remarks are made by Dr. TRENCH in his book on the Study of Words:

"In words is a material ever at hand on which to train the spirit to a skillfulness in this [discrimination], on which to exercise its sagacity through the habit of distinguishing there where it would be so easy to confound. Nor is this habit of discrimination only valuable as a part of our intellectual training; but what a positive increase is it of mental wealth when we have learned to discern between things which really differ, but have been hitherto confused in our minds; and have made these distinctions permanently our own in the only way by which they can be made secure, that is, by assigning to each its appropriate word and peculiar sign. * * * Nor let us suppose this power of exactly saying what we mean, and neither more nor less than we mean, to be merely an elegant mental accomplishment. It is indeed this, and perhaps there is no power so surely indicative of a high and accurate training of the intellectual faculties. But it is also much more than this: it has a moral meaning as well. It is nearly allied to morality, inasmuch as it is nearly connected with truthfulness. * * * I can not promise you that the study of synonyms, or the acquaintance with derivations, or any other knowledge but the very highest knowledge of all, will deliver you from the temptation to misuse this or any other gift of God—a temptation which always lies so near us—yet I am sure that these studies rightly pursued will do much in leading us to stand in awe of this divine gift of words, and to tremble at the thought of turning it to any other than those worthy ends for which God has endowed us with it."

ABA

To ABANDON, DESERT, FORSAKE.

These words agree in representing a person as giving up or leaving some object, but differ as to the mode of doing it.

The distinctive sense of abandon is that of giving up a thing absolutely and finally, as if placed under a ban; as, to abandon one's friends or profession. Crabb is wrong in saying that it is always used in a bad sense, since we speak of abandoning a hopeless enterprise, or abandoning a shipwrecked vessel. —Desert is from de and sero, to cease cultivating or taking care of one's land. As this ordinarily supposes criminal neglect, the verb, when applied to persons in the active voice, has usually or always a bad sense, implying some breach of fidelity, honor, &c.; as, to desert one's colors, to desert one's post, to desert one's principles or duty. When used in the passive, the sense is not necessarily bad; as, the fields were deserted, a deserted village, deserted halls. —Forsake is from the Saxon for, and sacan, to seek no longer, or to seek forth and away from. It therefore, as its distinctive sense, supposes previous union; as, the blood forsook his cheeks; or that the thing left had been familiar or frequented; as, to forsake old friends, to forsake the paths of rectitude, &c. It may be used either in a good or a bad sense.

ABA

ABANDONED, PROFLIGATE, REPROBATE.

These adjectives agree in expressing the idea of great personal depravity.

Profligate (from profligatus, broken or ruined,) has reference to open and shameless immoralities either in private life or political conduct; as, a profligate court, a profligate ministry.

> You are so witty, profligate and thin,
> At once we think thee Milton's Death and Sin.
> EPIGRAM ON VOLTAIRE.

—Abandoned is stronger, and has reference to the searing of conscience and hardening of heart produced by a man's giving himself wholly up to iniquity; as, an abandoned villain, a man of abandoned character.—Reprobate (from reprobatus, rejected or condemned,) is still stronger, and describes the condition of one who is so entirely abandoned as to leave no hope of his recovery. Thus, we speak of a person as "given over to a reprobate mind."

To ABASE, DEBASE, DEGRADE.

These words agree in the idea of bringing down from a higher to a lower state.

ABA

Abase has reference to a bringing down in condition or feelings; as, to abase the proud, to abase one's self before God.—Debase has reference to the bringing down of a thing in purity, or making it base. It is, therefore, always used in a bad sense; as, to debase the coin of the kingdom, to debase the mind by vicious indulgence, to debase one's style by coarse or vulgar expressions.—Degrade has reference to a bringing down from some higher grade or degree of elevation. Thus, a priest is degraded from the clerical office. When used in a moral sense, it denotes a bringing down in character and just estimation; as, degraded by intemperance, a degrading employment, &c. In geology, degrade has the sense of bringing down physically; as, the rocks were degraded by the action of the elements.

The nouns abasement, debasement, degradation, follow the distinctions of their verbs as given above.

To ABASH, CONFUSE, CONFOUND.

Abash is a stronger word than confuse, but not so strong as confound. We are abashed (connected with abase and bashful) when struck either with sudden shame or with a humbling sense of inferiority; as, Peter was abashed by the look of his master, "abashed the Devil stood." So, a modest youth is abashed in the presence of those who are greatly his superiors.—We are confused when, from some unexpected or startling occurrence, we lose clearness of thought and self-possession. Thus, a witness is often confused by a severe cross-examination, a timid person is apt to be confused in entering a room full of strangers.—We are confounded (from cum, with, and fundo, to pour,) when our minds are overwhelmed, as it were, by something wholly unexpected, amazing, dreadful, &c., so as to have nothing to say. Thus, a criminal is usually confounded at the discovery of his guilt.

> Satan stood
> Awhile as mute, confounded what to say.
> MILTON.

To Abate (intransitive), Subside.

These words, as here compared, imply a coming down from some previously raised or excited state.

Abate (Fr. abattre) expresses this in respect to degrees, and implies a diminution of force or intensity; as, the storm abates, the cold abates, the force of the wind abates; or, the wind abates, a fever abates.—Subside (from sub and sido,) to settle down,) has reference to a previous state of agitation or commotion; as, the waves subside after a storm, the sea subsides into a calm.

When the words are used figuratively, the same distinction should be observed. If we conceive of a thing as having different degrees of intensity or strength, the word to be used is abate. Thus we say, a man's anger abates, the ardor of one's love abates, "winter's rage abates." But if the image be that of a sinking down into quiet from preceding excitement or commotion, the word to be used is subside; as, the tumult of the people subsides, the public mind subsided into a calm. The same is the case with those emotions which are tumultuous in their nature; as, his passion subsides, his joy quickly subsided, his grief subsided into a pleasing melancholy. Yet, if in such cases we were thinking of the emotion as intense, we might use abate; as, his joy will abate in the progress of time: and so in other instances.

To Abdicate, Resign.

Abdicate (from ab, from, and dico, to speak off,) expresses the act of a monarch in yielding up sovereign authority; as, to abdicate the crown, to abdicate one's throne, to abdicate the government. King James II. of England was held to have abdicated (and not merely deserted his post), when he fled from the country, and thus ceased to administer the government.—Resign (from resigno, to break the seal of office,) is applied to the act of any person, high or low, who gives back an office or trust into the hands of him who conferred it. Thus, a minister resigns, a military officer resigns, a clerk resigns. The expression, "the king resigned his crown," sometimes occurs in our later literature, implying that he held it from his people.—There are other senses of resign which are not here brought into view.

Aberration. See Insanity.

Abettor, Accessary, Accomplice.

These words denote different degrees of complicity in some deed or crime.

An abettor is one who incites or encourages to the act, without sharing in its performance.

An accessary is one who is neither present nor takes part in the act, but accedes to or becomes involved in its guilt, either by some previous or subsequent act, as of aiding, concealing, &c.

An accomplice (from the verb to accomplish,) is one who is directly engaged in doing the deed, or is held, by construction of law, to have been so engaged. Thus, in treason, there are no abettors or accessaries, but all are held to be principals or accomplices.

Abettors propose, incite, instigate or promote; accessaries assist, aid, help forward; accomplices carry into effect, execute or complete.

Abbey. See Cloister.

To Abhor. See To Hate.

Ability, Capacity.

These words come into comparison when applied to the higher intellectual powers.

Ability (Fr. habilité, ease of execution,) has reference to the active exercise of our faculties. It implies not only native vigor of mind, but that ease and promptitude of execution which arise from superior mental training. Thus, we speak of the ability with which a book is written, an argument maintained, a negotiation carried on, &c. It always supposes something to be done, and the power of doing it.—Capacity (from capio, to take in,) has reference to the receptive powers. In its higher exercises, it supposes great quickness of apprehension and breadth of intellect, with an uncommon aptitude for acquiring and retaining knowledge. Hence it carries with it the idea of resources and undeveloped power. Thus, we speak of the extraordinary capacity of such men as Lord Bacon, Blaise Pascal and Edmund Burke. "Capacity," says H. Taylor, "is requisite to devise, and ability to execute a great enterprise."

The word abilities, in the plural, embraces both these qualities, and denotes high mental endowments.

To Abolish, Repeal, Abrogate, Revoke, Annul, Nullify.

These words have in common the idea of setting aside by some overruling act.

Abolish applies particularly to things of a permanent nature, such as institutions, usages, customs, &c.; as, to abolish monopolies, serfdom, slavery, &c.—Repeal describes the act by which the legislature of a state sets aside a law which it had previously enacted.—Abrogate (from ab and rogo, to call back,) was originally applied to the repeal of a law by the Roman people; and hence, when the power of making laws was usurped by the emperors, the term was applied to their act of setting aside the laws. Thus it came to express that act by which a sovereign or an executive government sets aside laws, ordinances, regulations, treaties, conventions, &c.—Revoke (from revoco, to call back,) denotes the act of recalling some previous grant which conferred power, privilege, &c.; as, to revoke a decree, to revoke a power of attorney, &c. Thus, also, we speak of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.—Annul is used in a more general sense, denoting simply to make void; as, to annul a contract, to annul an agreement, &c.—Nullify (from nullus and fio, to make of no effect,) is an old word recently revived in this country, and applied to the setting of things aside either by force or by total disregard; as, to nullify an act of Congress.

To Abominate. See To Hate.

Abridgment, Compendium, Epitome, Abstract, Synopsis.

An abridgment is made by omitting the less important parts of some larger work; as, Bacon's Abridgment.—A compendium (from the Latin) is a brief exhibition of a subject or science for common use; as, a Compendium of American Literature, a Compendium of Logic.—An epitome (Gr., a cutting down,) corresponds to a compendium, and gives briefly the most material points of a subject; as, an Epitome of History.—An abstract is a brief statement of a thing in its main points.—A synopsis (Gr., literally a looking at collectively,) is a bird's eye view of a subject or work in its several parts.

To Abrogate. See To Abolish.

Absent, Abstracted.

These words both imply a want of attention to surrounding objects, but for different causes.

We speak of a man as absent, when his thoughts wander from present scenes or topics of discourse; we speak of him as abstracted when his mind (usually for a brief period) is strongly drawn off to some remote object or train of thought, and is thus prevented from giving attention to what is going on around him. Absence of mind is usually the result of loose habits of thought; abstraction commonly arises either from engrossing interests and cares, or unfortunate habits of association.

To Absolve, Exonerate, Acquit.

We speak of a man as absolved (Lat., absolvo, to release,) from something that binds his conscience or involves the charge of wrong-doing; as, to absolve from allegiance or from the obligation of an oath, to absolve from the imputation of criminal conduct.—We speak of a person as exonerated (from ex, from, and onus, a load,) when he is released from some burden which had rested upon him; as, to exonerate from suspicion, to exonerate from blame or odium.—We speak of a person as acquitted (from Fr. acquitter, to exempt from charge), when a decision has been made in his favor either by a jury or by disinterested persons; as, acquitted of all participation in the crime.

To Absorb, Engross, Swallow up, Engulf.

These words agree in one general idea, that of completely taking up. They are chiefly used in a figurative sense, and may be distinguished by a reference to their etymology.

We speak of a person as absorbed (lit., drawn in as by a whirlpool,) in study or some other employment of the highest interest.—We speak of a person as engrossed (lit., seized upon in the gross, or wholly,) by something which occupies his whole time and thoughts, as the acquisition of wealth or the attainment of honor.—We speak of a person (under a stronger image,) as swallowed up, and lost in that which completely occupies his thoughts and feelings, as in grief at the death of a friend, or in the multiplied cares of life.—We speak of a person as engulfed in that which (like a gulf), takes in all his hopes and interests, as engulfed in misery, engulfed in ruin.

> Lethean gulfs receive them as they fall,
> And dark oblivion soon absorbs them all.
> COWPER.

> Too long hath love engross'd Brittania's stage,
> And sunk to softness all our tragic rage.
> TICKELL.

> Should not the sad occasion swallow up
> All other cares?—ADDISON.

> And in destruction's river
> Engulf and swallow up.—SIR P. SIDNEY.

Abstract. See Abridgment.

Abstracted. See Absent.

Absurd, Irrational, Foolish, Preposterous.

Of these terms irrational is the weakest, denoting that which is plainly inconsistent with the dictates of sound reason; as, an irrational course of life.—Foolish rises higher and implies either a perversion of that faculty, or an absolute weakness or fatuity of mind; as, foolish enterprises.—Absurd (from absurdus, deaf or stupid,) rises still higher, representing a person as deaf to the voice of reason, and his opinion or conduct as opposed to the dictates of common sense; as, an absurd scheme, an absurd hypothesis, an absurd argument, &c.—Preposterous (from præ and pono, to place,) rises still higher, and supposes an absolute inversion in the order of things; or in plain terms, a "putting of the cart before the horse;" as, a preposterous suggestion, preposterous conduct, a preposterous regulation or law.

Abundance, Plenty, Exuberance.

These words rise upon each other in expressing the idea of fullness.

Plenty (from plenus, full,) denotes a sufficiency to supply every want; as, plenty of food, plenty of money, &c.—Abundance (from abundo, to overflow,) expresses more, and gives the idea of superfluity or excess; as, abundance of riches, an abundance of wit and humor. Often, however, it only denotes plenty in a high degree.—Exuberance (from exubero, to grow luxuriantly,) rises still higher, and implies a bursting forth on every side, producing great superfluity or redundance; as, an exuberance of mirth, an exuberance of animal spirits, &c.

> Whose grievance is satiety of ease,
> Freedom their pain, and plenty their disease.
> HARTE.

> At the whisper of thy word,
> Crown'd abundance spreads my board.
> CRASHAW.

Burke was equally distinguished for richness of thought and exuberance of imagery.—ANON.

Abundant. See Ample.

Abuse, Invective.

These words, as here compared, are applied to the language of insult uttered under different circumstances of excitement.

Abuse is generally prompted by anger, and vented in words; invective is more frequently used in writing or in public debate. Abuse generally takes place in private quarrels; invective in discussions before the public. Abuse is the weapon of the vulgar; invective is the instrument of the higher orders.

> I, dark in light, exposed
> To daily fraud, contempt, abuse and wrong.
> SAMSON AGONISTES.

> And more to make him publicly despised,
> Libels, invectives, railing rhymes were sowed
> Among the vulgar to prepare his fall.
> DANIEL.

To Accept. See To Receive.

Accessory. See Abettor.

Accidental, Incidental, Casual, Fortuitous, Contingent.

We speak of a thing as accidental (from ad and cado,) when it falls to us as by chance, and not in the regular course of things; as, an accidental meeting, an accidental advantage, &c.—We call a thing incidental (from in and cado,) when it falls, as it were, into some regular course of things, but is secondary and forms no essential part thereof; as, an incidental remark, an incidental evil, an incidental benefit.—We speak of a thing as casual (from cado, to fall,) or fortuitious (from fors, chance,) when it falls out or happens, as it were, by mere chance, without being prearranged or premeditated; as, a casual remark or encounter; a "fortuitious concourse of atoms." RAY.—We call a thing contingent when it is such that, considered in itself, it may or may not happen, but is dependent for its existence on something else; as, the time of my coming will be contingent on intelligence yet to be received.

To Accompany, Attend, Escort.

We accompany those with whom we go as companions.—We attend those whom we wait upon or follow.—We escort those whom we attend with a view to guard and protect.

A gentleman accompanies a friend to some public place, he attends or escorts a lady. The disciples at Miletus accompanied Paul to the ship; one of the clergy in that quarter at the present day would expect to be attended, at least, if not escorted.

Accomplice. See Abettor.

To Accomplish, Effect, Execute, Achieve, Perform.

These words agree in the general idea of carrying out to some end proposed. Their differences will be sufficiently seen from the following examples. We accomplish (from ad and compleo, to fill up to,) an end or object, &c.; we effect (from e and facio, to make or carry out,) a purpose; we execute (from e and sequor, to follow out,) a design, project, plan, &c.; we perform (from per and formo, to form or carry through,) a work or task, &c.; we achieve (from Fr. achever, to finish,) some enterprise or undertaking of importance.

Accordingly, Consequently.

These words indicate a connection between two things, the latter of which is done on account of the former.

Accordingly marks the connection as one of simple accordance or congruity, leading naturally to the result which followed; as, "he was absent when I called, and I accordingly left my card;" "our preparations were all finished, and we accordingly set sail."—Consequently marks a closer connection, that of logical or causal sequence; as, "the papers were not ready, and consequently could not be signed." "Reputation is power; consequently to despise is to weaken."—SOUTH.

Account, Narrative, Narration, Recital.

These words are applied to different modes of rehearsing a series of events.

Account (from Fr. conte, a tale or short story,) turns attention not so much to the speaker as to the fact related; and more properly applies to the report of some single event, or a group of incidents taken as a whole; as, an account of a battle, of a shipwreck, &c.—A narrative (from narro, to tell,) is a continuous story of connected incidents, such as one friend might tell to another; as, a narrative of the events of a siege, a narrative of one's life, &c.—Narration is usually the same as narrative, but is sometimes used to describe the mode of relating events; as, his powers of narration are uncommonly great. In oratory, the word is applied to the narrative part of an oration.—Recital (from re and cito, to summon up,) denotes a series of events drawn out into minute particulars, usually expressing something which peculiarly interests the feelings of the speaker; as, the recital of one's wrongs, disappointments, sufferings, &c.

Accurate, Correct, Exact, Precise.

We speak of a thing as correct (from correctus, made straight,) with reference to some rule or standard of comparison; as, a correct account, a correct likeness, a man of correct deportment. —We speak of a thing as accurate (from ad and curo, to do carefully,) with reference to the care bestowed upon its execution, and the increased correctness to be expected therefrom; as, an accurate statement, an accurate detail of particulars.—We speak of a thing as exact (from exactus, carried out completely,) with reference to that perfected state of a thing in which there is no defect and no redundance; as, an exact coincidence, the exact truth, an exact likeness.—We speak of a thing as precise (from præcisus, cut down,) when we think of it as strictly conformed to some rule or model, as if cut down thereto; as, a precise conformity to instructions; precisely right; he was very precise in giving his directions.

To Accuse, Charge, Impeach, Arraign.

These words agree in bringing home to a person the imputation of wrong-doing.

To accuse (from ad and causam, a suit,) is a somewhat formal act, and is applied usually (though not exclusively) to crimes; as, to accuse of treason.—Charge is informal, referring more commonly to moral delinquencies; as, to charge with dishonesty or falsehood.—Arraign (old Fr. ad reson, from ad rationem ponere, to bring to account,) is the bringing of a person before a tribunal for trial; as, to arraign one before a court or at the bar of public opinion. —Impeach is simply a word of more dignity than arraign; as, to impeach a minister of high crimes; to impeach one's motives. It shows the curious changes which take place in language, that peach, which was originally the same as impeach, is now one of our lowest words for accuse, and is used only among thieves, &c.

To achieve. See To Accomplish.

Acknowledge, Recognize.

Acknowledge is from the Sax. cnawan, to know, and lecgan, to lay, or lay open. It is, therefore, opposed to keep back or conceal; and supposes that something had been previously known to us (though perhaps not to others) which we now feel bound to lay open or make public. Thus, a man acknowledges a secret marriage, one who has done wrong acknowledges his fault, an author acknowledges his obligations to those who have aided him.—Recognize (from re and cognosco) supposes that we have either forgotten or not had the evidence of a thing distinctly before our minds; but that now we know it (as it were) anew, or receive and admit it on the ground of the evidence it brings. Thus, we recognize a friend after a long absence. We recognize facts, principles, truths, &c., when their evidence is brought up fresh to the mind; as, "bad men usually recognize the providence of God in seasons of danger." A foreign minister, consul or agent of any kind, is recognized on the ground of his producing satisfactory credentials.

Acquaintance, Familiarity, Intimacy.

These words mark different degrees of closeness in social intercourse.

Acquaintance arises from occasional intercourse; as, our acquaintance has been a brief one.—Familiarity springs from persons, being frequently together, so as to wear off all restraint and reserve; as, the familiarity of old companions.—Intimacy is the result of close connection and the freest interchange of thought; as, the intimacy of established friendship.

Our admiration of a famous man lessens upon our nearer acquaintance with him.—Addison.

We contract at last such a familiarity with them as makes it difficult and irksome for us to call off our minds.—Atterbury.

It is in our power to confine our friendships and intimacies to men of virtue.—Rogers.

Acquire. See To Obtain.

Acquit. See To Absolve.

Acrimony, Asperity, Harshness, Tartness.

These words express different degrees of angry feeling or language.

Tartness springs from an irritable temper united to quickness of intellect.—Asperity and harshness arise from angry feelings connected with a disregard for the feelings of others.—Acrimony is a biting sharpness produced by an embittered spirit.

Tartness of reply; harshness of accusation; acrimony of invective.

No order of men have an enmity of more acrimony or longer continuance.—Rambler.

It is no very cynical asperity not to confess obligations where no benefit has been received.—Johnson.

A just reverence of mankind prevents the growth of harshness and brutality.—Shaftesbury.

> The grand debate,
> The popular harangue, the tart reply,
> The logic, and the wisdom, and the wit,
> And the loud laugh—I long to know them all.
> Cowper.

Actual. See Real.

Acute. See Subtile.

Adage. See Axiom.

To Add, Join, Annex, Unite, Coalesce.

We add by bringing things together so as to form a whole.—We join by putting one thing to another in close or continuous connection.—We annex (from ad and necto, to fasten,) by attaching some adjunct to a larger body.—We unite (from unitas, state of oneness,) by bringing things together so that their parts adhere or intermingle.—Things coalesce (from coalesco, to grow together,) by coming into an entire cohesion of all their parts.

To add quantities; to join houses; to annex territory; to unite kingdoms; to make parties coalesce.

Addicted, Devoted, Consecrated, Dedicated.

Addicted (from ad and dico, to declare for,) was formerly used in a good sense; as, "addicted to letters," but is now employed only in a bad one; as, "addicted to vice."—Devoted (from de and voveo, to give up by vow,) is always taken in a good sense, expressing an habitual earnestness in the pursuit of some favorite object; as, "devoted to science."—Consecrated (from consecro, to devote as sacred,) and dedicated (from dedico, to give religiously,) express devotion of a higher kind involving religious sentiment; as, "consecrated to the service of the Church;" "dedicated to God."

Adherence, Adhesion.

These words, which were once freely interchanged, are now almost entirely separated.

Adherence is no longer used to denote physical union, but is applied to mental states or habits; as, "a strict adherence to one's duty;" "close adherence to the argument," &c.—Adhesion is now confined chiefly to the physical sense, except in the phrase "to give in one's adhesion to a cause or party."

Adhesion. See Adherence.

Adjacent, Adjoining, Contiguous.

Things are adjacent (from ad and jacio,) when they lie near to each other without actually touching; as, adjacent fields, adjacent villages, &c. Things are adjoining (ad and jungo,) when they meet at some line or point of junction; as, adjoining farms, an adjoining highway. What is spoken of as contiguous (from con and tango, to touch,) should properly touch on the whole of one side; as, a row of contiguous buildings, a wood contiguous to a plain. In some cases, however, especially among the poets, contiguous is applied to things that are very near, but not in absolute contact; as,

"Where, then, ah! where shall Poverty reside,
To 'scape the pressure of contiguous Pride."

Adjoining. See Adjacent.

To Adjourn, Prorogue.

These words are used in respect to public bodies when they lay aside business and separate.

Adjourn, both in Great Britain and this country, is applied to all cases in which such bodies separate for a brief period, with a view to meet again. Prorogue is applied in Great Britain to that act of the executive government which brings a session of Parliament to a close. The word is not used in this country, but a legislative body is said in such a case, to adjourn sine die. "A prorogation is the continuance of Parliament from one session to another."—BLACKSTONE.

ADMISSION. See ADMITTANCE.

ADMITTANCE, ADMISSION.

These words are, to some extent, in a state of transition and change.

Admittance is now chiefly confined to its primary sense of access into some locality or building. Thus we see on the doors of factories, &c., "No admittance." Its secondary or moral sense; as, "admittance to the church," is almost entirely laid aside.—Admission has taken to itself the secondary or figurative senses; as, admission to the rights of citizenship; admission to the church; the admissions made by one of the parties in a dispute. And even when used in its primary sense, it is not identical with admittance. Thus, we speak of admission into a country, territory, and other larger localities, &c., where admittance could not be used. So, when we speak of admission to a concert or other public assembly, the meaning is not perhaps exactly that of admittance, viz., access within the walls of the building; but rather a reception into the audience, or access to the performances.—But the lines of distinction on this subject are not fully drawn.

ADMONITION, REPREHENSION, REPROOF.

Admonition is prospective and relates to moral delinquencies; its object is to prevent further transgression. Reprehension and reproof are retrospective, the former being milder than the latter, and involving less that affects personal independence. A person of any age or station may be liable to reprehension in case of wrong conduct, but reproof is confined to children or inferiors. "The master of a school may be exposed to the reprehension of the parents for any supposed impropriety; his scholars are subject to his frequent reproof."—CRABBE. "When a man feels the reprehension of a friend, seconded by his own heart, he is easily heated into resentment."—JOHNSON. "There is an oblique way of reproof which takes off from the sharpness of it."—STEELE.

TO ADORN, ORNAMENT, DECORATE, EMBELLISH.

We decorate and ornament by putting on some adjunct which is attractive or beautiful and which serves to heighten the general effect. Thus, a lady's head-dress may be ornamented or decorated with flowers or jewelry; a hall may be decorated with carving or gilding, and ornamented with wreaths of flowers.—We embellish (Fr. embellir, to render beautiful,) not so much by mere adjuncts, as by so modifying the thing itself in its constituent parts, as to render it more beautiful and attractive. Thus, a book may be embellished with rich engravings, which are not strictly adjuncts, but an integral part of the volume itself. So, the grounds around a house may be embellished with flower-beds and shrubbery, which form a constituent part of the scene.—Adorn is sometimes identical with decorate, as when we say, a lady was adorned with jewels. In other cases, it seems to imply something more. Thus, we speak of a gallery of paintings as adorned with the works of some of the great masters, or adorned with noble statuary and columns. Here decorated and ornamented would hardly be appropriate. There is a value in these works of genius beyond mere show and ornament.

All these words, except decorate, are used in a secondary and figurative sense; as, a character adorned with every Christian grace; a style embellished with rich and beautiful imagery. Still, there is at times a certain degree of vagueness in their use; and these remarks are only designed to show what is believed to be a well-founded difference between them.

ADULATION, FLATTERY, COMPLIMENT.

Men deal in compliments from a desire to please; they use flattery either from undue admiration, or a wish to gratify vanity; they practice adulation from sordid motives and with a mingled spirit of falsehood and hypocrisy. Compliments are often unmeaning; flattery is apt to become gross; adulation is always servile and usually fulsome. Adulation is practiced by courtiers; flattery by lovers; compliments are used by the fashionable.

ADVANTAGE, ADVANTAGEOUS, BENEFIT, BENEFICIAL.

We speak of a thing as a benefit (from bene, well, and facio, to do,) or beneficial, when it is simply productive of good; as, "the benefits of early discipline," "the beneficial effects of adversity."—We speak of a thing as an advantage or as advantageous (connected with advance,) when it affords us the means of getting forward, and places us on a "vantage ground" for further effort. Hence, there is a difference between the benefits and the advantages of early education; between a beneficial and an advantageous investment of money.

> Offered life
> Neglect not, and the benefit embrace
> By faith, not void of works.—MILTON.

> Count all the advantage prosperous vice attains,
> 'Tis but what virtue flies from and disdains.
> POPE.

ADVANTAGEOUS. See ADVANTAGE.

ADVENTUROUS. See RASH.

ADVERSARY, ENEMY, OPPONENT, ANTAGONIST.

Enemy is the only one of these words which necessarily implies a state of personal hostility. Men may be adversaries, antagonists, or opponents to each other in certain respects, and yet have no feelings of general animosity. An adversary may be simply one who is placed for a time in a hostile position, as in argument, or in chess playing. An opponent is one who is ranged against another (perhaps passively) on the opposing side. An antagonist is one who struggles against another with active effort, either in a literal fight or in verbal debate.

ADVERSE. See AVERSE.

TO ADVERT. See TO REFER.

AFFECTION. See ATTACHMENT.

AFFIANT. See DEPONENT.

AFFIDAVIT. See DEPOSITION.

TO AFFIRM, ASSEVERATE, AVER, PROTEST.

We affirm (from ad and firmo, to make firm or sure,) when we declare a thing to be certain, and such as ought to be received on our credit. We asseverate it (from assevero, to declare rigidly or severely,) with increased positiveness as what cannot be disputed. We aver it with solemnity, as if speaking (a vero) in behalf of Truth herself. We protest it (from pro, before, and testes, witnesses), as what others around us can verify by their testimony.

People asseverate in order to produce a conviction of their veracity; they aver when they are peculiarly desirous to be believed; they protest when they wish to free themselves from imputations, or to produce a conviction of their innocence.

AFFLICTION, SORROW, GRIEF, DISTRESS.

Affliction and sorrow are terms of wide and general application; grief and distress, have reference to particular cases. Affliction (from ad and fligo, to smite or dash down) is the stronger term. The suffering lies deeper in the soul, and arises from some powerful cause; such as the loss of what is most dear—friends, health, property, &c. We do not speak of mere sickness or pain as "afflictions," though a person who suffers from them is said to be afflicted; but deprivations of every kind, such as deafness, blindness, loss of limbs, &c., are called afflictions, showing that the term applies particularly to prolonged sources of suffering.—Sorrow (from Sax. sorg, anxiety,) and grief (from L. gravis, heavy,) always imply mental suffering. Grief is the stronger term of the two, usually denoting sorrow from some definite cause, and that always in the past. Thus, we feel grief for the death of a friend, and sorrow during his illness; the past delinquencies of a child are remembered with grief, his present misconduct is looked upon with sorrow.—Distress

(from distringo, to strain or tear asunder) implies extreme suffering, either bodily or mental. In its higher stages it denotes pain of a restless, agitating kind, and almost always supposes some struggle of mind or body. Affliction is allayed; grief subsides; sorrow is soothed; distress is mitigated.

Affront, Insult, Outrage.

An affront (from ad, to, and frons, the face) is a designed mark of disrespect, usually in the presence of others. An insult (from in and salto, to leap upon) is a personal attack either by words or actions, designed to humiliate or degrade. An outrage (from out or utter, and rage or violence) is an act of extreme and violent insult or abuse. An affront piques and mortifies; an insult irritates and provokes; an outrage wounds and injures.

Captious persons construe every innocent freedom into an affront. When people are in a state of animosity, they seek opportunities of offering each other insults. Intoxication or violent passion impel men to the commission of outrages.—Crabb.

Agitation. See Emotion.

Agony, Anguish, Pang.

These words agree in expressing extreme pain of body or mind.

Agony (Gr. struggle) denotes acute and permanent pain, usually of the whole system, and often producing contortions.—Anguish (from angor, choking) denotes severe pressure, and considered as bodily suffering is more commonly local (as the anguish of a wound), thus differing from agony.—A pang (from Sax. pinan, to torture) is a paroxysm of excruciating pain.

The agonies of death; the anguish of a diseased limb; the pangs of dissolution.

The agonies or pangs of remorse; the anguish of a wounded conscience.

Aid. See Help.

Agreeable. See Pleasant.

Alarm, Fright, Terror, Consternation.

These words express different degrees of fear at the approach of danger.

Fright is the least vivid emotion, and chiefly affects the nerves and senses. Alarm (It. all' armé, to arms) is the hurried agitation of feeling which springs from a sense of immediate and extreme exposure. Terror is agitating and excessive fear, which usually benumbs the faculties. Consternation (from con and sterno, to smite down) is overwhelming terror, which usually overpowers the mind.

Alarm agitates the feelings; terror disorders the understanding, fright seizes on the senses; consternation takes possession of the whole soul and subdues its faculties.

Alienation. See Insanity.

To Allay. See To Alleviate.

Allegiance, Loyalty.

These words agree in expressing the general idea of fidelity and attachment to the "powers that be."

Allegiance from ad, to, and ligo, to bind) is a principle; loyalty (from lex, law) is a feeling or sentiment. Allegiance may exist under any form of government, and in a republic we generally speak of allegiance to the government, to the state, &c. In well-conducted monarchies, this sentiment takes the form of loyalty, and is a warm-hearted feeling of fidelity and obedience to the Sovereign. It is personal in its nature; and hence we speak of the loyalty of a wife to her husband, not of her allegiance. In cases where we personify, loyalty is more commonly the word used; as, loyalty to the Constitution, loyalty to the cause of virtue, loyalty to truth and religion, &c.

Hear me, recreant, on thine allegiance hear me!
—Shakespeare.

Abdiel faithful found,
Unshaken, unseduced, unterrified,
His loyalty he kept.—Milton.

To Alleviate, Mitigate, Assuage, Allay.

These words have in common the idea of relief from some painful state; and being all figurative, they differ in their application according to the image under which this idea is presented.

Alleviate (from levis, light) supposes a load which is lightened or taken off; as, to alleviate one's cares. Mitigate (from mitis, mild) supposes something fierce which is made mild; as, to mitigate one's anguish. Assuage supposes something violent which is quieted; as, to assuage one's sorrow. Allay (from Sax. alegan, to lay or depress) supposes something previously excited but now brought down; as, to allay one's suffering.

To alleviate the distresses of life; to mitigate the fierceness of passion; to assuage angry feeling; to allay wounded sensibility.

To Allow. See To Permit.

To Allude. See To Refer.

To Allure, Entice, Decoy, Seduce.

These words agree in the idea of acting upon the mind by some strong controlling influence, and differ according to the image under which this is presented. They are all used in a bad sense, except allure, which has sometimes (though rarely) a good one.

We are allured (from lure) by the prospect or offer (usually deceptive) of some future good. We are commonly enticed (from Romaic enticer, to excite) into evil by appeals to our passions. We are decoyed into danger by false appearances or representations. We are seduced (from L. se and duco, to lead astray) when drawn aside from the path of rectitude.

What allures draws by gentle means; what entices leads us by promises and persuasions; what decoys betrays us as it were into a snare or net; what seduces deceives us by artful appeals to the passions.

Also, Likewise, Too.

These words are used by way of transition in leaving one thought and passing to another.

Also (from all and so) is the widest term. It denotes that what follows is all so, or entirely like that which preceded, and may be affirmed with the same truth; as, "if you were there, I was there also;" "if our situation has some discomforts, it has also many sources of enjoyment."—Too is simply less formal and pointed than also; it marks the transition with a lighter touch; as, "I was there too;" "a courtier and a patriot too."—Pope.—Likewise denotes literally "in like manner," and hence has been thought by some to be more specific than also. "It implies," says Whately, "some connection or agreement between the words it unites. We may say, 'He is a poet, and likewise a musician;' but we should not say, 'He is a prince, and likewise a musician,' because there is no natural connection between these qualities."—This distinction, however, is hardly sustained by general usage; and likewise is very nearly or exactly identical with also.

Altercation, Dispute, Wrangle.

The term dispute (from dis and puto, to think differently) is in most cases, but not necessarily, applied to a verbal contest; as, a dispute on the lawfulness of war.—An altercation (from L. altercatio, a strife alternate) is an angry dispute between two parties, involving an interchange of severe language.—A wrangle (from the root of wring or twist) is a confused and noisy altercation.

Dispute it like a man.
I shall do so;
But I must also feel it as a man.
Shakespeare.

Their whole life was little else than a perpetual wrangling and altercation.—Hakewill.

Although, Though.

These words differ only in one respect; although is the stronger and more emphatic of the two, and is therefore usually chosen to begin a sentence; as, "Although I have many competitors, I still hope to succeed." See While.

Me the gold of France did not seduce,
Although I did admit it as a motive
The sooner to effect what I intended.
Shakespeare.

Even the favored isles
So lately found, although the constant sun
Cheer all their seasons with a grateful smile,
Can boast but little virtue. Cowper.

To Amaze, Astonish.

We are amazed (lost in a maze) at what is incomprehensible; we are astonished (attonitus, thunderstruck) at what is great or striking in a high degree. Both words express surprise and wonder, each however under its peculiar relations. Both may be used in a good sense, as applied to what gives us a high degree of of pleasure; or in a bad sense, when applied to persons or things which we regard with strong disgust or reprobation. In deciding which to use, we are to be governed by the etymology; and there are cases in which either word may be employed, though of course in a different sense. Thus we may speak of being amazed and of being astonished, at the bounties of Providence, or the rich provisions of divine grace, according to the emotion which we wish to indicate as awakened by these objects. We may be amazed at a man's folly, when we cannot account for his being betrayed into it; we may be astonished at it, when struck with wonder at its enormity. When the Duke of Bedford reproached Lord Thurlow in the House of Lords, as a mere lawyer who had recently been elevated to the peerage, the Lord Chancellor exclaimed, "I am amazed, my Lords, I am amazed at his grace's speech. He cannot look before him, or behind him, or on either side of him, without seeing some noble peer who owes his seat in this house to his successful exertions in the profession to which I belong." When Lord Suffolk, in the same body, proposed to employ American savages to carry on the war against the Colonies, Lord Chatham broke forth, "I am astonished to hear such principles expressed, I am shocked to hear them avowed in this house or in this country." In each case, the word chosen exactly represented the emotions awakened in the speaker's mind.

To Amend, Emend, Correct, Reform, Rectify.

These words agree in the idea of bringing things into a more perfect state.

We correct (literally, make straight) when we conform things to some standard or rule; as, to correct proof sheets.—We amend (literally, take away blots) by removing blemishes or faults, and thus rendering a thing more perfect; as, to amend our ways.—Emend is only another form of amend, and is applied chiefly to editions of books, &c.—To reform is literally to form over again or put into a new and better form; as, to reform one's life.—To rectify is to make right; as, to rectify a mistake.—We speak of correcting what is erroneous, of amending the moral conduct, of emending the edition of some book, of reforming what is faulty in ourselves or others, of rectifying (applied chiefly to things past) abuses, inadvertences, &c.

Amicable, Friendly.

Neither of these words denotes any great warmth of affection, since friendly has by no means the same strength as its noun friendship. It does, however, imply something of real cordiality; while amicable supposes very little more than that the parties referred to are not disposed to quarrel. Hence, we speak of amicable relations between two countries, an amicable adjustment of difficulties. "Those who entertain friendly feelings toward each other, can live amicably together."

> From side to side, with amicable aim,
> Each to the other darts the nimble bolt.
> DYER.

> If he be friendly, he comes well; if not
> Defense is a good cause, and Heaven be for us.
> MILTON'S COMUS.

Amidst, Among.

These words differ to some extent from each other, as will be seen from their etymology.

Amidst denotes in the midst or middle of, and hence surrounded by; as, this work was written amidst many interruptions.—Among (from the Sax. mengan, to mingle) denotes a mingling or intermixture; as, "he fell among thieves," "blessed art thou among women." Hence, we say among the moderns, among the ancients, among the thickest of the trees, among these considerations, among the reasons I have to offer; in none of which cases could amidst be used. So, also, we say, they kept on amidst the storm, he was sinking amidst the waves, he persevered amidst many difficulties; in none of which cases could among be used. In like manner, it is said by Milton of the seraph Abdiel, that he was

> "Faithful found > Among the faithless, faithful only he,"

because he was then in the mingled mass of the fallen angels, and had been one of their number. But when he decides to leave them, and thus ceases to be of their number, the poet adds,—

> "From amidst them forth he passed."

Among. See Between.

Ample, Copious, Abundant, Plenteous.

These words agree in representing a thing as large, but under different relations according to the image which is used.

Ample implies largeness producing a sufficiency or fullness of supply for every want; as, ample stores or resources, ample provision.—Copious carries with it the idea of flow or of collection at a single point; as, a copious fountain, a copious supply of materials, "copious matter for song."—MILTON.—Abundant and plenteous refer to largeness of quantity; as, abundant stores, plenteous harvests.

To Amuse, Divert, Entertain.

We are amused by that which occupies us lightly and pleasantly, drawing off the mind (a Musis) from study or severe employments.—We are entertained (from Fr. entretenir, to hold together or in company) by that which brings our minds into agreeable contact with others, as conversation or a book.—We are diverted (from diverto, to draw aside) by that which turns off our thoughts to something of livelier interest, especially of a sportive nature, as a humorous story or a laughable incident.

Whatever amuses serves to kill time, to lull the faculties, and to banish reflection. Whatever entertains usually awakens the understanding or gratifies the fancy. Whatever diverts is lively in its nature and sometimes tumultuous in its effects.—CRABB.

Ancient, Antiquated, Obsolete, Antique, Antic.

Ancient is opposed to modern, and has reference to antiquity; as, an ancient family, ancient landmarks, ancient institutions, systems of thought, &c.—Antiquated describes that which has gone out of use or fashion; as, antiquated furniture, antiquated laws, rules, &c.—Obsolete, is commonly used instead of antiquated in reference to language, customs, &c.; as, an obsolete word or phrase, an obsolete expression.—Antique is applied in present usage, either to that which has come down from the ancients; as, an antique cameo, bust, &c.; or to that which is made to imitate some ancient work of art; as, an antique temple. In the days of Shakespeare, antique was often used for ancient; as, "an antique song," "an antique Roman;" and hence, from the singularity often attached to what is ancient, it was used in the sense of grotesque; as, "an oak whose antique root peeps out;" and hence, came our present word antic, denoting grotesque or ridiculous.

Anger, Indignation, Resentment, Wrath, Ire, Rage, Fury.

Anger (from ango, to choke) is a feeling of keen displeasure (usually with a desire to punish) for what we regard as wrong toward ourselves or others. It may be excessive or misplaced, but is not necessarily criminal.—Indignation is a generous outburst of anger in view of things which are indigna, or unworthy to be done, involving what is mean, cruel, flagitious, &c., in character or conduct.—Resentment (from re and sentiment, reaction of feeling) is anger inflamed by a sense of personal injury or insult [see RESENTMENT], and hence is too often a moody feeling, leading one to brood over his supposed wrongs with a deep and lasting hatred.—Wrath and ire (the last poetical) express the feelings of one who is bitterly provoked.—Rage is a vehement ebullition of anger; and fury is an excess of rage, amounting almost to madness.

Warmth of constitution often gives rise to anger; a high sense of honor creates indignation at crime; a man of quick sensibilities is apt to cherish resentment; the wrath and ire of men are usually connected with a haughty and vindictive spirit; rage and fury are distempers of the soul to be regarded only with abhorrence.

Animosity, Enmity.

Enmity may be dormant or concealed; animosity is active enmity inflamed by collision and mutual injury between opposing parties. The animosities which were continually springing up among the clans in Scotland, kept that kingdom in a state of turmoil and bloodshed for successive ages. The animosities which have been engendered among Christian sects, have always been the reproach of the church.

Such conduct naturally conduces to inflame hatreds and make enmities irreconcilable.—SPECTATOR.

These factions never suspended their animosities till they ruined that unhappy government.—HUME.

TO ANTICIPATE, EXPECT.

These words, as here compared, agree in regarding some future event as about to take place.

Expect (from ex and specto, to look forward to) is the stronger. It supposes some ground or reason in the mind, for considering the event as likely to happen. Anticipate is, literally, to take beforehand, and here denotes simply to take into the mind as a conception of the future. Hence, to say, "I did not anticipate a refusal," expresses something less definite and strong than to say, "I did not expect it." Still, anticipate is a very convenient word to be interchanged with expect in cases where the thought will allow.

APOLOGY, EXCUSE.

An apology, in the original sense of the word, was a pleading off from some charge or imputation, by explaining and defending one's principles or conduct. It therefore amounted to a vindication.

One who now offers an apology, admits himself to have been, at least, apparently in the wrong; but brings forward some palliating circumstance, or tenders a frank acknowledgment, by way of reparation. We make an apology for some breach of propriety or decorum (like rude expressions, unbecoming conduct, &c.), or some deficiency in what might be reasonably expected.—We offer an excuse when we have been guilty of some breach or neglect of duty; and we do it by way of extenuating our fault, and with a view to be forgiven. When an excuse has been accepted, an apology may still, in some cases, be necessary or appropriate. "An excuse is not grounded on the claim of innocence, but is rather an appeal for favor resting on some collateral circumstance. An apology mostly respects the conduct of individuals toward each other as equals; it is a voluntary act produced by feelings of decorum or a desire for the good opinion of others."—CRABB.

TO APPRECIATE, ESTIMATE, ESTEEM.

Estimate is an act of judgment; esteem is an act of valuing or prizing, and when applied to individuals, denotes a sentiment of moral approbation. [See ESTIMATE.]

Appreciate (from ad and pretium, price) lies between the two. As compared with "estimate," it supposes a union of sensibility with judgment, producing a nice and delicate perception. As compared with "esteem," it denotes a valuation of things according to their appropriate and distinctive excellence, and not simply their moral worth. Thus, with reference to the former of these (delicate perception), an able writer says, "women have a truer appreciation of character than men;" and another remarks, "it is difficult to appreciate the true force and distinctive sense of terms which we are every day using." So, also, we speak of the difference between two things, as sometimes hardly appreciable. With reference to the latter of these senses (that of valuation as the result of a nice perception) we say, "it requires a peculiar cast of character to appreciate the poetry of Wordsworth;" "he who has no delicacy himself, can not appreciate it in others;" "the thought of death is salutary because it leads us to appreciate worldly things aright."

Appreciate is much used in cases where something is in danger of being overlooked or undervalued; as when we speak of appreciating the difficulties of a subject, or the risk of an undertaking. So Lord Plunket, referring to an "ominous silence" which prevailed among the Irish peasantry, says, "If you knew how to appreciate that silence, it is more formidable than the most clamorous opposition." In like manner, a person who asks some favor of another, is apt to say, "I trust you will appreciate my motives in this request." Here we have the key to a very frequent use of the word.

It is hardly necessary to say that appreciate looks on the favorable side of things. We never speak of appreciating a man's faults, but his merits. This idea of regarding things favorably, appears more fully in the word "appreciative;" as when we speak of an appreciative audience, or an appreciative review, meaning one that manifests a quick perception and a ready valuation of excellence.

TO APPREHEND, COMPREHEND.

These words come into comparison as describing acts of the mind.

Apprehend (ad and prehendo, to lay hold of,) denotes the laying hold of a thing mentally, so as to understand it clearly, at least in part.—Comprehend (from comprehendo, to take in,) denotes the embracing or understanding it in all its compass and extent. We may apprehend many truths which we do not comprehend. The very idea of God supposes that he may be apprehended, though not comprehended by rational beings. "We may apprehend much of Shakespeare's aim and intention in the character of Hamlet or King Lear; but few will claim that they have comprehended all that is embraced in these characters."—TRENCH.

APPREHENSION, ALARM.

Apprehension springs from a sense of danger when somewhat remote but approaching; alarm (It. all' armé, to arms,) arises from danger when announced as near at hand. Apprehension is calmer and more permanent; alarm is more agitating and transient. Apprehension may be felt by a single individual when alone; alarm is ordinarily social, spreading by contagion among all around.

And he the future evil shall no less
In apprehension than in substance feel.
MILTON.

Taught by this stroke renounce the war's alarms,
And learn to tremble at the name of arms.
POPE.

APPROBATION, APPROVAL.

Approbation is a state; approval is an act. The former denotes the feeling awakened in the mind; as, the approbation of one's conscience, the approbation of the wise. The latter denotes the sentence or decision by which the mind approves; as, the plan received the approval of the committee; his conduct merits the approval of the world at large. "We may be anxious for the approbation of our friends; but we should be still more anxious for the approval of our own consciences."

"He who is desirous to obtain universal ap- probation, will learn a good lesson from the fable of the old man and his ass."—"The work has been examined by several excellent judges, who have expressed their unqualified approval of its plan and execution."

Arbitrator. See Judge.

Ardor. See Felicity.

Arduous, Hard, Difficult.

We call a thing difficult when it requires more or less of exertion to perform it; as, a difficult problem to solve.—We call it hard when the effort required is decidedly greater; as, a hard task, a hard duty to be performed.—We call it arduous (from arduus, steep,) when it requires strenuous and persevering exertion, like that of one who is climbing a precipice; as, an arduous task, an arduous duty. "It is often difficult to control our feelings; it is still harder to subdue our will; but it is an arduous undertaking to control the unruly and contending will of others."

To Argue, Dispute, Debate.

These words, as here compared, suppose a contest between two parties in respect to some point at issue.

To argue (from arguo, to set forth or assert,) is to adduce arguments or reasons in support of one's cause or position.—To dispute (from dis and puto, to think contrary,) is to call in question or deny the statements or arguments of the opposing party.—To debate (from Fr. débattre, to beat or fight,) is to contend for and against, or to interchange arguments in a somewhat formal manner.

"Men of many words sometimes argue for the sake of talking; men of ready tongues frequently dispute for the sake of victory: men in public life often debate for the sake of opposing the ruling party, or from any other motive than the love of truth."—Crabb.

Artisan, Artist, Artificer.

An artist is one who is skilled in some one of the fine arts; an artisan is one who exercises any mechanical employment. A portrait-painter is an artist; a sign-painter is an artisan. The occupation of the former requires a fine taste and delicate manipulation; that of the latter demands only an ordinary degree of contrivance and imitative power.—The word artificer neither suggests the idea of vulgarity which attaches to the term artisan, nor the ideas of refinement and peculiar skill which belong to the term artist.—H. Taylor.

To Ascribe, Attribute, Impute.

Attribute denotes (1.) to refer some quality or attribute to a being; as, to attribute power to God. (2.) To refer something to its cause or source; as, to attribute a backward spring to icebergs off the coast.—Ascribe is used equally in both these senses; and its chief peculiarity seems to lie in the image which it involves. It comes from ad and scribo, to write or put on paper. It is, therefore, the stronger word, and emphasizes the thought more fully. Hence, it is now the word more commonly used.—To impute usually denotes to ascribe something doubtful or wrong, and hence in general literature has commonly a bad sense; as, to impute unworthy motives. [The theological sense of impute is not here taken into view.]

More than good-will to me attribute naught.
Spenser.

Pope.

Asperity. See Acrimony.

To Asperse, Defame, Slander, Calumniate.

These words have in common the idea of falsely assailing the character of another.

To asperse (ad and spergo, to bespatter), is figuratively to cast upon a character hitherto unsullied, the imputation of blemishes or faults which render it offensive or loathsome.—To defame (from de and fama) is to detract from a man's honor and reputation, by charges calculated to load him with infamy.—Slander from the Norman French, and calumniate from the Latin, have in common the sense of circulating reports to a man's injury from unworthy or malicious motives.

Men asperse their neighbors by malignant insinuations; they defame by advancing charges to sully their fair fame; they slander or calumniate either by spreading injurious reports of their own invention, or by magnifying slight faults into serious errors or crimes.

To Assassinate. See To Kill.

To Assault. See To Attack.

Assemblage, Assembly.

An assembly consists only of persons; an assemblage may be composed of things as well as persons; as, an assemblage of incoherent objects. Nor is every assemblage of persons an assembly; since the latter term denotes a body who have met, and are acting, in concert for some common end, such as to hear, to deliberate, to unite in music, dancing, &c., &c. An assemblage of skaters on a lake, or of horse jockeys at a race-course, is not an assembly; but might be turned into one by collecting into a body with a view to discuss and decide as to some object of common interest.

With innocence and meditation joined
In soft assemblage, listen to my song.
Thomson.

An assembly such as earth
Saw never, such as heaven stoops down to see.
Cowper.

Assent, Consent.

Assent is an act of the understanding, consent of the will or feelings. We assent (ad and sentio) to the views of others when our minds come to the same conclusions with theirs, as to what is true, right, or admissible. We consent when there is such a concurrence (consensus) of our will with their desires and wishes, that we decide to comply with their requests. The king of England gives his assent, not his consent, to acts of Parliament, because in theory, at least, he is not governed by personal feelings or choice, but by a deliberate judgment as to the common good. We also use assent in cases where a proposal is made which involves but little of interest or feeling. A lady may assent to a gentleman's opening the window; but if he offers himself in marriage, he must wait for her consent. [There is an obsolete use of consent for union, which is not here brought into view.]

You said the same; and are you discontent
With laws, to which you gave your own assent?
Pope.

When thou canst truly call these virtues thine,
Be wise and free by heaven's consent and mine.
Dryden.

To Assert, Maintain, Vindicate.

To assert is from assero, to fasten to one's self, and hence to claim. It is, therefore, adversative in its nature. We assert our rights and privileges, or the cause of free institutions, as against opposition or denial. So, also, in respect to our declarations, if we regard them as mere statements of what is true, we use the word affirm; if we claim them to be undeniable, we use the words assert or assertion.

To maintain (Fr. maintenir, to hold by force of hand) is to uphold and insist upon with earnestness, whatever we have once asserted; as, to maintain one's cause, to maintain an argument, to maintain the ground we have taken.—To vindicate (from vim and dicere) is to use language and measures of the strongest kind, in defense of ourselves and those for whom we act.

We assert with boldness and constancy; we maintain our assertions by adducing proofs, facts, or arguments; we are ready to vindicate our rights or interests by the utmost exertion of our powers.

To Asseverate. See To Affirm.

To Assist. See To Help.

To Assuage, see To Alleviate, also, To Mitigate.

Atheist, see Infidel.

At Last, At Length.

These words both denote that some end or result has been reached.

At length implies that a long period was spent in so doing; as, "after a voyage of more than three months, we at length arrived safe."—At last implies, that something has occurred (as interruptions, disappointments, &c.) which leads us to emphasize the idea of having reached the end; as, "in spite of every obstacle, we have at last arrived." But these interruptions, disappointments, &c., need not have occupied any great length of time. If a man had called repeatedly at the post-office while the mail was delayed for a single hour, he might say, "At last it has arrived," not referring to the delay as a long one, but as having finally come to an end. At last, therefore, is not necessarily the same as at length.

At Least. See However.

At Length. See At Last.

Atrocious, Flagitious, Flagrant.

Flagitious (from flagitium, an infamous crime) points to an act as grossly wicked and vile; as, a flagitious proposal.—Flagrant (from flagrans, flaming) marks the vivid impression made upon the mind by something strikingly wrong or erroneous; as, a flagrant misrepresentation, a flagrant violation of duty.—Atrocious (from atrox, cruel) represents the act as springing from a violent and savage spirit. If Lord Chatham, instead of saying "the atrocious crime of being a young man," had used either of the other two words, his irony would have lost all its point, in his celebrated reply to Sir Robert Walpole, as reported by Dr. Johnson.

Attachment, Affection.

The leading idea of affection is that of warmth and tenderness; the leading idea of attachment (Fr. attacher, to tie or fasten) is that of being bound to some object by strong and lasting ties. There is more of sentiment (and sometimes of romance) in affection, and more of principle in persevering attachment. We speak of the ardor of the one, and the fidelity of the other.

There is another distinction between the use and application of these words. The term attachment is applied to a wider range of objects than affection. A man may have a strong attachment to his country, to his profession, to his principles, and even to favorite places: in respect to none of these could we use the word affection.

To Attack, Assail, Assault, Invade.

These words all denote a violent onset; attack being the generic term, and the others specific forms of attack.

To attack is to commence the onset; to assail (Fr. assaillir, to spring at) is to make a sudden and violent attack; to assault (literally, to leap upon), is to attack with still greater vehemence; to invade (in and vado, to go), is to enter by force on what belongs to another. Thus, a person may attack by offering violence of any kind; he may assail by means of missile weapons; he may assault by direct personal violence; a king may invade by marching an army into a country. Figuratively, we may say, men attack with argument or satire; they assail with abuse or reproaches; they may be assaulted by severe temptations; the rights of the people may be invaded by the encroachments of the crown.

Attempt, Endeavor, Effort, Exertion, Trial.

These words agree in the idea of calling forth our powers into action.

Trial is the generic term; it denotes a putting forth of one's powers with a view to determine what they can accomplish; as, to make trial of one's strength.—An attempt is always directed to some definite and specific object; as, "the attempt and not the deed confounds us." Shakes.—An endeavor is a continued attempt; as, "the high endeavor and the glad success." Cowper.—An effort (from effero, to set forth) and exertion (from exsero, to stretch out) are a straining of the faculties in order to carry out an attempt, exertion being the stronger term; as, "to make one united effort, with the utmost exertion of our powers, for the attainment of the high object which is set before us."

To Attempt. See To Try.

To Attend, Listen, Hearken.

We attend, with a view to hear and learn; we listen with fixed attention, in order to hear correctly, or to consider what has been said; we hearken when we listen with a willing mind, and in reference to obeying. It is of great importance for the learner to attend to the rules that are laid down; it becomes the young to hearken to the counsel of their elders, and to listen to the admonitions of conscience.

> But, thy relation now! for I attend,
> Pleased with thy words."—Milton.
>
> Come, listen, listen, ladies gay,
> No haughty feats of arms I tell.—Scott.
>
> But hearken, lady,
> One thing I must entreat, your leave and sufferance.
> Beaumont & Fletcher.

To Attend. See To Accompany.

Attentive. See Youthful.

Attitude, Posture.

These words both describe the visible disposition of the limbs.

Posture (from pono, to place) relates to their position merely; attitude (from apto, to fit, connected with aptitude) refers to their fitness for some specific object. The object of an attitude is to set forth and exhibit some internal feeling; as, an attitude of wonder, of admiration, of grief, &c. It is, therefore, essentially and designedly expressive. Its object is the same with that of gesture, viz., to hold forth and represent emotion. Posture has no such design. If we speak of posture in prayer, or the posture of devotion, it is only the natural disposition of the limbs, without any intention to show forth or exhibit.

> 'T is the business of a painter in his choice of attitudes (posituræ) to foresee the effect and harmony of the lights and shadows.—Dryden.
>
> Never to keep the body in the same posture half an hour at a time.—Bacon. Medical Remains.

To Attribute. See To Ascribe.

Auction—sale by, sale at.

In America, the more prevalent expression has been "sales at auction," as if referring to the place where they are made. In England, the form has always been "sales by auction," i. e., by an increase of bids (Lat. auctione.) This latter form is more correct, and is now coming into use in some of our leading newspapers.

Auspicious. See Propitious.

Authentic, Genuine.

These words, as here compared, have reference to historical documents.

We call a document genuine when it can be traced back ultimately to the author or authors from whom it professes to emanate. We call a document authentic (in the primary sense of the term) when on the ground of its being thus traced back, it may be relied on as true and authoritative; and in this sense the term is used in respect to legal instruments. But in general literature, it has obtained a wider signification. We can often rely upon statements as true, without knowing the name of the person with whom they originated. Their claim to be believed may rest on collateral evidence of the most unquestionable nature; and such statements are accordingly spoken of as authentic. This secondary sense of the term is now the one most in use. Thus we speak of an authentic report of facts, authentic history, &c. Hence writers on the evidences of our religion, speak of the genuineness and the authenticity of the Sacred Scriptures; meaning by the former that the books have come down to us uncorrupt from their original sources; and by the latter that they may be relied upon as true and authoritative in all matters of faith and practice. Bishop Watson, who took the lead in making this distinction, remarks,—

> A genuine book is that which was written by the person whose name it bears, as the author of it. An authentic book is that which relates matters of fact as they really happened. A book may be genuine without being authentic, and a book may be authentic without being genuine. The history of the Island of Formosa is a genuine book: it was written by Psalmanazar; but it is not an authentic book (though it was long esteemed as such, and translated into different languages), for the author, in the latter part of his life, took shame to himself for having imposed upon the world, and confessed that it was a mere romance. Anson's Voyage may be considered as an authentic book: it probably contains a true narrative of the principal events recorded in it; but it is not a genuine book, having not been written by Walter, to whom it is ascribed, but by Robins.

Avaricious, Covetous, Parsimonious, Penurious, Miserly, Niggardly.

The avaricious eagerly desire wealth with a view to hoard it.—The covetous grasp after it at the expense of others, though not of necessity with a design to save, since a man may be covetous and yet a spendthrift.—The penurious, parsimonious and miserly, save money by disgraceful self-denial; and the niggardly, by meanness in their dealing with others. We speak of persons as covetous in getting, avaricious in retaining, parsimonious in expending, penurious or miserly in modes of living, niggardly in dispensing.

To Avenge, Revenge.

To avenge, in modern usage, is to inflict just punishment upon evil-doers in behalf of ourselves or others for whom we act; as, to avenge one's wrongs, to avenge the injuries of the suffering and innocent.—To revenge is to inflict pain or injury for the simple indulgence of resentful and malicious feelings. The former may at times be a duty, the latter is one of the worst exhibitions of human character.

Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold.
MILTON.

But his face
Deep scars of thunder had intrenched, and care
Sat on his faded cheek; but under brows
Of dauntless courage and considerate pride
Waiting revenge. MILTON.

To Aver. See To Affirm.

Averse, Reluctant, Adverse.

Averse (from a and verto, to turn from) expresses an habitual, though not of necessity, a very strong dislike; as, averse to active pursuits, averse to study.—Reluctant (from re and luctor, to strive against) is stronger, and implies an internal struggle as to making some sacrifice of interest or feeling; as, reluctant to yield, reluctant to make the necessary arrangements, a reluctant will, or consent.—Adverse (from ad and versus, turned against) denotes active opposition or hostility; as, adverse interests, adverse feelings, adverse plans or movements, the adverse party.

Aversion, Reluctance, Repugnance, Disgust, Antipathy.

Aversion (from a and verto, to turn from) denotes a fixed and habitual dislike, though not necessarily a very strong one; as, an aversion for business.—Reluctance (from re and luctor) and repugnance (from re and pugno) are stronger, and denote a mental strife or hostility against something proposed, (repugnance being the strongest); as, a reluctance to make the necessary sacrifices, and a repugnance to the submissions required.—Disgust (from dis and gustus, taste) is repugnance either of taste or moral feeling; as, a disgust for gross exhibitions of selfishness.—Antipathy (from Gr. ἀντί, and πάθος, an opposing affection of body or mind) is primarily a constitutional disgust or loathing of a thing, such as most persons feel for a snake. When used figuratively, it denotes a correspondent dislike for certain persons, modes of acting, &c.

Men have an aversion for what breaks in upon their habits; a reluctance and repugnance to what crosses their will; a disgust for what offends their sensibilities; and are often governed by antipathies for which they can give no good reason.

To Avoid, Shun.

Avoid is literally to leave a void space between ourselves and something else. It is, in a certain sense, negative, and simply denotes care taken not to come near or in contact; as, to avoid certain persons or places.—Shun (from Sax. ascunian, to flee from) is positive and denotes an habitual intention to keep clear of; as, to shun evil companions. Prudence may lead us to avoid; fear or disgust induces us to shun.

No man can pray from his heart to be kept from temptation, if he take no care of himself to avoid it.
MASON.

So chanticleer, who never saw a fox,
Yet shunned him as a sailor shuns the rocks.
DRYDEN.

To Avow. See To Confess.

Awe, Reverence, Dread, Veneration.

Reverence is a strong sentiment of respect and esteem, sometimes mingled slightly with fear; as, reverence for the divine law.—Awe is a mixed feeling of sublimity and dread in view of something great or terrible, but not necessarily implying love; as, awe at the Divine Presence.—Dread is strong personal fear in view of something terrible; as, dread of punishment.—Veneration is reverence in its strongest manifestations. It is the highest emotion we can exercise toward human beings.

Exalted and noble objects produce reverence; terrific objects awaken dread; a sense of the divine presence fills us with awe; a union of wisdom and virtue in one who is advanced in years, inspires us with veneration.

Awful. See Frightful.

Awkward, Clumsy, Uncouth.

Clumsy (from clump) is connected with lump or lumpish, and denotes the quality of heaviness, and unseemliness. This shows itself in the whole exterior of the thing in question.—Awkward (from awk, out of the way or irregular) has a special reference to outward deportment. A man is clumsy in his whole person, he is awkward in his gait and the movement of his limbs. Clumsiness is seen at the first view. Awkwardness is discovered only when a person begins to move. Hence the expressions, a clumsy appearance, and an awkward manner. When we speak figuratively of an awkward excuse, we think of a want of ease and grace in making it; when we speak of a clumsy excuse, we think of the whole thing as coarse and lumpish.—We apply the term uncouth (literally unknowing) to that which results from the want of instruction or training; as, uncouth manners, uncouth language.

Axiom, Maxim, Aphorism, Adage.

An axiom (Gr. an authoritative sentence) is a self-evident truth which is taken for granted as the basis of reasoning.—A maxim (from Lat. maximus, of the greatest importance) is a guiding principle ever to be received and admitted, especially in the practical concerns of life.—An aphorism (from the Gr. to separate) is a detached sentence expressing some weighty truth or sentiment.—An adage (from L. ad agendum apta, applicable to life) is a saying of long established authority and of universal application.

B.

Badly, Greatly.

In some parts of this country, not by the vulgar alone but by educated persons, the word badly is used for greatly. Instead of saying, "I wish greatly to see him," they say, "I wish to see him very badly." This is not only an error in language, but often becomes ridiculous, because the words seem to say of a friend, "I wish to see him in a very bad state of health," &c.

Balance, Remainder.

It is a peculiarity of many in this country, especially of those who are engaged in trade, to use the word balance in certain connections, as having the same sense with remainder. We may, indeed, properly speak of the balance of an account, because it is this which makes the two sides even. But to transfer this to the general concerns of life, and speak of the "balance of the week," "the balance of the evening," "the balance of the company," &c., meaning remainder, is a gross vulgarism, to be avoided by every one who does not mean to "smell of the shop."

To Baffle, Frustrate, Defeat.

We speak of a person or thing as baffled (from Fr. to mock or elude) by any thing that serves to cross or check by interruption or artifice; as, baffled in one's attempts, designs, plans, &c.—We use frustrated in such cases (from frustra, in vain) when an effectual stop is put, at least for a time, to all further progress; as, he was frustrated in all his efforts.—We use the word defeat (Fr. défaire, to make an end of)

when the frustration is absolute and final, as, the army was defeated in a pitched battle; he was defeated in argument.

The mere intricacy of a question should not discourage or baffle us.—LOCKE.

I could not live
To see your hopes made frustrate.—MASSINGER.

His designs were defeated, his desires thwarted, his offers refused.—BARROW.

BALL. See GLOBE.

BAGGAGE. See PLUNDER.

TO BANISH, EXILE, EXPEL.

The idea of a coercive removal from a place, is common to these terms.

A man is banished (from Ger. bannen, to put out of a community by a ban or civil interdict) when he is forced by the government of a country (be he a foreigner or a native) to leave its borders.—A man is exiled when he is driven into banishment from his native country and home. Thus to exile, is to banish, but to banish is not always to exile: the Tarquins were banished from Rome; Coriolanus was exiled.—To expel is forcibly to eject, and usually under circumstances of disgrace; as, to expel from a college; expelled from decent society.

Banished from Rome?
What's banished but set free
From daily contact with the things I loathe?
CROLY.

To thee behold an exiled band we come.
ROWE.

Sedition's civil broils
Expelled thee from thy native Crete.—WEST.

BANK-BILL, BANK-NOTE.

These words are used in America as identical in their meaning, both terms being applied to the circulating medium put forth by banks.

In England they are never thus confounded. A bank-note is the promissory note of a bank payable to the bearer on demand, and forms part of the currency; a bank-bill is made payable to order, and usually at some future specified time. It is therefore negotiable paper, and forms no part of the general circulation.

BANQUET. See FEAST.

TO BANTER, RALLY.

We banter (from Gr. mock or laugh at) in good humor, turning the laugh upon a person for something he has done or neglected to do. We rally (rouse up) when we attack a person with ridicule, raillery or sarcasm. This is always more pungent and often ill-natured.

If your companions at Cambridge banter you on your regularity, order, decency, and love of study, banter them in return on their want of these qualities.—LORD CHATHAM.

If you find yourself in a humor rather to rally and ridicule than to comfort me, I desire you would throw this letter into the fire.—ADDISON.

BARBARISM. See SOLECISM.

BARBAROUS. See FEROCIOUS.

BASE, VILE, MEAN.

These words, as expressing moral qualities, are here arranged in the order of their strength, the strongest being placed first.

Base marks a high degree of moral turpitude; vile and mean denote, in different degrees, the want of what is valuable or worthy of esteem. What is base excites our abhorrence; what is vile provokes our disgust or indignation; what is mean, awakens contempt. Base is opposed to high-minded; vile, to noble; mean, to liberal or generous. Ingratitude is base; sycophancy is vile; undue compliances are mean.

BASHFULNESS, MODESTY, DIFFIDENCE, SHYNESS.

Modesty arises from a low estimate of ourselves; bashfulness is an abashment or agitation of the spirits at coming into contact with others; diffidence (from dis and fido, to trust) is produced by an undue degree of self-distrust; shyness usually arises from an excessive self-consciousness, and a painful impression that every one is looking at us.

Modesty of deportment is becoming in all; bashfulness often gives rise to mistakes and blundering; diffidence in society frequently makes a man a burden to himself; shyness usually produces a reserve or distance which is often mistaken for haughtiness.

BATTLE, COMBAT, FIGHT, ENGAGEMENT.

These words agree in denoting a close encounter between contending parties.

Fight is a word of less dignity than the others. Except in poetry, it is more naturally applied to the encounter of a few individuals, and more commonly an accidental one; as, a street fight.—A combat (from Fr. com and battre, to beat mutually) is a close encounter, whether between few or many, and is usually premeditated.—A battle is commonly more general and prolonged.—An engagement supposes large numbers on each side, engaged or intermingled in the conflict.

The battle proved decisive in favor of the House of York, and nearly 40,000 people were killed in that engagement.—FAWKES.

The combat deepens; on, ye brave!
Who rush to glory or the grave.
T. CAMPBELL.

TO BE, EXIST.

The verb to be, except in a few rare cases like that of Shakespeare's "To be or not to be," is used simply as a copula to connect a subject with its predicate; as, man is mortal; the soul is immortal.—The verb, to exist (from exsto, to stand forth) is never properly used as a mere copula, but points to things that stand forth, or have a substantive being; as, "When the soul is freed from all corporeal alliance, then it truly exists." HUGHES. It is not, therefore, properly synonymous with to be when used as a copula, though occasionally made so by some writers for the sake of variety; as in the phrase "there exists [is] no reason for laying new taxes." We may, indeed, say, "a friendship has long existed between them, instead of saying "there has long been a friendship between them;" but in this case, exist is not a mere copula. It is used in its appropriate sense to mark the friendship as having been long in existence.

TO BECOME, GROW.

To become marks progress and transition into some other state. Thus, we may say, though formerly rich, he has now become poor, i. e., has come to be so; it is cold, and is becoming colder.—To grow is to become, by a gradual process, an idea not necessarily attached to "become." A man may become vile and degraded at once, by some single act; or he may grow, by vicious indulgence, into a low and degraded character.

BEAST, BRUTE.

When we use these words in a figurative sense, as applicable to human beings, we think of beasts (from bestia, a wild creature) as mere animals governed by animal appetite; and of brutes (from brutus, irrational or stupid) as being destitute of reason or moral feeling, and governed by unrestrained passion. Hence we speak of beastly appetites, beastly indulgences, &c., and of brutal manners, brutal inhumanity, brutal ferocity. So, also, we say of a drunkard, that he first made himself a beast, and then treated his family like a brute.

Medea's charms were there, Circean feasts,
With bowls that turned enamored youth to beasts.
DRYDEN.

Strange! that a creature rational, and cast
In human mold, should brutalize by choice
His nature.—COWPER.

BECAUSE, FOR, SINCE, AS, INASMUCH AS.

These particles are used, in certain connections, to assign the reason of a thing, or that "on account of" which it takes place.

Because (by cause) is the strongest and most emphatic; as, "I hid myself, because I was afraid."—For is not quite so strong; as, in Shakespeare, "I hate him for he is a Christian."—Since (seeing that) is less formal and more incidental than because; as, I will do it since you request me. It more commonly begins a sentence; as, Since your decision is made, I will say no more.—As is still more incidental than since, and points to some existing fact by way of assigning a reason. Thus we say, as I knew him to be out of town, I did not call.—Inasmuch as seems to carry with it a kind of qualification which does not belong to the rest. Thus, if we say, I am ready to accept your proposal, inasmuch as I believe it is the best you can offer, we mean, it is only with this understanding that we can accept it. Because would take away this qualification, and declare the readiness to be absolute as resting on acknowledged grounds.

Beautiful. See Fine.

To Become. See To Be.

To Beg, Ask, Request.

To ask (not in the sense of inquiring) is the generic term which embraces all these words.—To request is only a polite mode of asking.—To beg in its original sense was to ask with earnestness, and implied submission or at least deference. At present, however, in polite life beg has dropped its original meaning and has taken the place of both ask and request, on the ground of its expressing more of deference and respect. Thus, we beg a person's acceptance of a present; we beg him to favor us with his company; a tradesman begs to announce the arrival of new goods, &c., &c. Crabb remarks that according to present usage, "we can never talk of asking a person's acceptance of a thing, or of asking him to do us a favor." This is more true of society in England than in this country.

Behavior, Conduct.

Behavior (from be and have) is the mode in which we have or bear ourselves in the presence of others or toward them; conduct (from con and duco) is the mode of our leading ourselves forward in the concerns of life. Behavior respects our manner of acting in particular cases; conduct refers to the general tenor of our actions. We may say of soldiers, that their conduct had been praiseworthy during the whole campaign, and their behavior admirable in every instance when they met the enemy.

> Lest through thy wild behavior
> I be misconstrued in the place I go to.
> SHAKESPEARE.
>
> What in the conduct of our life appears
> So well designed. DRYDEN.

Below, Beneath.

A thing is below us when its position is simply lower than ours; it is beneath us when it is very far below, as if it were in the "nether" regions.

> "This said, he led them up the mountain's brow,
> And showed them all the shining fields below."
> "Trembling, I view the dread abyss beneath."

In speaking figuratively with a view to put a thing very low by way of contempt, we should use beneath not below; as, such conduct is beneath the dignity of a man; such charges are beneath the notice of a gentleman; a man of his character is beneath contempt.

Beneficence. See Benevolence.

Benefit. See Advantage.

Benevolence, Beneficence, Benignity, Munificence.

Benevolence (from bene, well, and volo, to wish or desire) marks a disposition made up of a choice and desire for the happiness of others.—Beneficence (from bene, well, and facio, to do) marks the working of this disposition in dispensing good on a somewhat broad scale.—Munificence (from munus, a gift, and facio, to make) shows the same disposition, but acting on a still broader scale, in conferring gifts and favors. These are not necessarily confined to objects of immediate utility. One may show his munificence in presents of pictures or jewelry, but this would not be beneficence.—Benignity marks the same disposition as shown to dependents or inferiors in station, age, &c.; it is condescending kindness.

Benevolence of heart; beneficence of life; munificence in the encouragement of letters; the benignity of divine Providence.

Benevolent, Beneficent.

Etymologically considered benevolent implies merely wishing well to others, and beneficent doing well. But by degrees the word benevolent has been widened to include not only feelings but actions. Thus we speak of benevolent operations, benevolent labors for the public good, Benevolent Societies. In like manner beneficent is now often applied to feelings. Thus we speak of the beneficent intentions of a donor. This extension of the terms enables us to mark nicer shades of meaning. Thus, the phrase benevolent labors, turns attention to the source of these labors, viz., benevolent feeling; while beneficent would simply mark them as productive of good. So beneficent intentions points to the feelings of the donor as bent upon some specific good act; while benevolent intentions, would only denote a general wish and design to do good.

Benignity. See Benevolence.

Bent, Bias, Inclination, Prepossession.

These words agree in describing a permanent influence upon the mind which tends to decide its actions.

Bent (from to bend) denotes a fixed tendency of the mind in a given direction. It is the widest of these terms, and applies to the will, the intellect, and the affections, taken conjointly; as, the whole bent of his character was toward evil practices.—Bias is literally a weight fixed on one side of a ball used in bowling, and causing it to swerve from a straight course. Used figuratively, bias applies particularly to the judgment, and denotes something which acts with a permanent force on the character through that faculty; as, the bias of early education, early habits, &c.—Inclination (from inclino, to lean,) is an excited state of desire or appetency; as, a strong inclination to the study of the law.—Prepossession (from præ and possideo, to take hold of beforehand) is a mingled state of feeling and opinion in respect to some person or subject, which has laid hold of and occupied the mind previous to inquiry. The word is commonly used in a good sense, an unfavorable impression of this kind being denominated a prejudice.

"Strong minds will be strongly bent, and usually labor under a strong bias; but there is no mind so weak and powerless as not to have its inclinations, and none so guarded as to be without its prepossessions."—CRABB.

To Bequeath, Devise.

These words both denote the giving or disposing of property by will.

Devise, in legal usage, is confined to the disposal of real estate, and he to whom it is given is called the devisee.—Bequeath is properly confined to the giving by will of personal property; the gift is called a legacy, and he who receives it, is called a legatee. In popular usage, the word bequeath is sometimes widened so as to embrace devise; but as stated by Bouvier, this is improperly done.

To Beseech, Entreat, Solicit, Implore, Supplicate.

These words agree in marking that sense of want which leads men to beg some favor.

To solicit (from sollicito, to stir up) is to make a request with some degree of earnestness and repetition, of one whom we address as a superior.—To entreat (from in and tracto, to treat with) implies greater urgency, usually enforced by adducing reasons or arguments.—To beseech (from Sax. gesecan, to seek earnestly) is still stronger, and belongs rather to the language of poetry and imagination.—To implore (from im and ploro, to cry out) denotes increased fervor of entreaty, as addressed either to equals or superiors.—To supplicate (from sub and plico, to bend down or prostrate one's self) expresses the extreme of entreaty, and usually implies a state of deep humiliation. Thus, a captive supplicates a conqueror to spare his life.

Men solicit by virtue of their interest with another; they entreat in the use of reasoning and strong representations; they beseech with importunate earnestness; they implore from a sense of overwhelming distress; they supplicate with a feeling of the most absolute inferiority and dependence.

Beside, Besides.

These words, whether used as prepositions or adverbs, have been considered strictly synonymous, from an early period of our literature; and have been freely interchanged by our best writers. There is, however, a tendency in present usage to make the following distinction between them.

(1.) That beside be used only and always as a preposition, with the original meaning "by the side of;" as to sit beside a fountain; or with the closely allied meaning "aside from" or "out of" (in a state deviating from); as, this is beside our present purpose; "Paul thou art beside thyself." The adverbial sense to be wholly transferred to the cognate word.

(2.) That besides as a preposition take the remaining sense "in addition to;" as, besides all this; besides the considerations here offered; "there was a famine in the land besides the first famine."—Gen. xxvii. And that it also take the adverbial sense of "moreover," "beyond," &c., which had been divided between the words; as, besides, there are other considerations which belong to this case.

The following passages may serve to illustrate this use of the words.

The lovely Thais sits beside thee.—Dryden.

Only be patient till we have appeased
The multitude, beside themselves with fear.
Shakespeare.

It is beside my present business to enlarge on this speculation.—Locke.

Besides this, there are persons in certain situations who are expected to be charitable, &c.—Bishop Porteus.

And, besides, the Moor
May unfold me to him; there stand I in peril.
Shakespeare.

He who does not know these things is but an ignorant man whatever he may know besides.—Tillotson.

The men said to Lot, Hast thou here any besides?—Gen. xix.

Besides. See Moreover.

Between, Among.

Between (from Sax. betweonan, by two, or by twain) applies properly to only two parties; as, a quarrel between two men, two nations; to be between two fires, &c.—Among (from the Sax. mengan, to mingle) denotes a mass or collection of things, and always supposes more than two; as, the prize money was equally divided among the ship's crew. It is, therefore, a gross blunder to speak of dividing a thing among two persons.

Sentinels, between two armies
With nothing better, in the chill night air,
Than their own thoughts to comfort them.
Wordsworth.

They heard,
And from his presence hid themselves among
The thickest trees, both man and wife.
Milton.

Bias. See Bent.

Blameless, Spotless, Faultless, Stainless.

We speak of a thing as blameless when it is free from blame, or the just imputation of fault; as, a blameless life or character. The others are stronger.—We speak of a thing as faultless, stainless, or spotless, only when we mean that it is absolutely without fault or blemish; as, a spotless or stainless reputation; a faultless course of conduct. The last three words apply only to the general character, while blameless may be used in reference to particular points; as, in this transaction he was wholly blameless. We also apply faultless to personal appearance; as, a faultless figure; which can not be done in respect to any of the other words.

To Blanch, Whiten.

To whiten is the generic term, denoting, to render white; as, to whiten the walls of a room, whited sepulchers. Usually (though not of necessity) this is supposed to be done by superinducing a white color upon the object in question.—To blanch, is to whiten by the removal of darker coloring matter; as, to blanch linen, to blanch almonds. So the cheek is blanched by fear; i. e., by the withdrawal of the blood, which leaves it white.

And sin's black dye seems blanched by age to virtue.
Dryden.

Striking her cliff, the storm confirms her power,
The waves but whiten her triumphant shore.—Prior.

Blaze, Flame.

A blaze and a flame are both produced by burning gas. We call it a blaze in so far as it gives light, and a flame in so far as it gives heat: the one shines, and the other burns.

Every house in the street was in a blaze on the night of the illumination; every house was in a flame on the night of the fire.

What groans of men shall fill the martial field!
How fierce a blaze his flaming pile shall yield.
Dryden.

The wild confusion and the swarthy glow
Of flames on high, and torches from below.
Byron.

Bliss. See Happiness.

Blunder, Error, Mistake, Bull.

An error (from erro, to wander) is a departure or deviation from that which is right or correct; as, an error of the press; an error of judgment.—A mistake (from mis and take) is the interchange or taking of one thing for another, through haste, inadvertence, &c.; as, a careless mistake.—A blunder (connected with flounder) is a mistake or error of the grossest kind. It supposes a person to flounder on in his course, either from carelessness, ignorance, or stupidity.—A bull is a verbal blunder containing a laughable incongruity of ideas.

An error may be corrected or forgiven; a mistake may be rectified or overlooked; a blunder is always considered blameable, and usually exposes a person to shame and ridicule.

Bodily. See Corporeal.

Bound, Certain.

To a limited extend, bound has been made in this country synonymous with certain or sure. Thus, it is said of a young man of talents entering on life, "he is bound to succeed;" of a candidate for political office, "he is bound to be elected;" of a young and growing village, "it is bound to become a large place." This is a revival of an old sense of the term, which has become obsolete or provincial in England, and has no sanction from Johnson, Richardson, or any of our leading lexicographers. As bound has its established sense, denoting obligation, it seems undesirable to bring again into use so very different a meaning of the word. Nor is it in favor of this usage, that we say, a ship is bound to a given place, since there is here reference to an engagement on the part of the owners to send it; but this by no means involves the idea of certainty as to its arrival. It seems desirable, therefore, in every point of view, to discourage so peculiar and grotesque a use of the word "bound."

Burden, Load.

A burden (from bear) is in the literal sense a weight to be borne; a load is something laid upon us to be carried. Hence, when used figuratively, there is usually a difference between the two words. Our burdens may be of such a nature that we feel bound to bear them cheerfully or without complaint. They may arise from the nature of our situation; they may be allotments of Providence; they may be the consequence of our errors. What is cast upon us as a load, we commonly carry with greater reluctance or sense of oppression. Men often find the charge of their own families to be a burden; but if to this be added a load of care for others, the pressure is usually severe and irksome.

Strive
In offices of love how we may lighten
Each other's burden, in our share of woe.
Milton.

And all that freedom's highest aim can reach,
Is but to lay proportioned loads on each.
Goldsmith.

But. See Except.

But, However, Still.

These words, as here compared, mark opposition in passing from one thought or topic to another.

But marks the opposition with a medium degree of strength; as, this is not winter, but it is almost as cold; he requested my assistance, but I shall not aid him at present.—However is weaker, and throws the opposition (as it were) into the background; as, this is not winter; it is, however, almost as cold; he requested my assistance; at present, however, I shall not afford him aid. The plan, however, is still under consideration and may yet be adopted.—Still is stronger than but, and marks the opposition more emphatically; as, your arguments are weighty, still they do not convince me. Still is here the imperative of the Sax., stillan, to set, and denotes "set that down as fixed and certain." See also HOWEVER.

BUTCHERY. See MASSACRE.

C.

CABAL, COMBINATION, FACTION.

An association for some bad purpose is the idea common to these terms.

A combination is an organized union of individuals for mutual support, in urging their demands or resisting the claims of others; as, a combination of workmen to procure higher prices.—A cabal is a secret association of a few individuals who seek by cunning practices to obtain office and power.—A faction (from factio, a thing wrought up) is a larger body than a cabal, employed for selfish purposes in agitating the community and working up an excitement with a view to change the existing order of things.

"Selfishness, insubordination, and laxity of morals give rise to combinations, which belong particularly to the lower orders of society. Restless, jealous, ambitious and little minds are ever forming cabals. Factions belong especially to free governments and are raised by busy and turbulent spirits for selfish purposes."—CRABB.

CALAMITY, DISASTER, MISFORTUNE, MISHAP, MISCHANCE.

Of these words, calamity is the strongest. It supposes a somewhat continuous state produced, not usually by the direct agency of man, but by natural causes, such as fire, flood, tempest, disease, &c.—Disaster (from dis and Fr. astre, a star) denotes literally ill-starred, and is some unforeseen and distressing event which comes suddenly upon us, as if from a hostile planet.—Misfortune is often due to no specific cause, it is simply the bad fortune of an individual; a link in the chain of events; an evil independent of his own conduct and not to be charged as a fault.—Mischance and mishap are misfortunes of a trivial nature occurring usually to individuals.

"A calamity is either public or private, but more frequently the former; a disaster is rather particular than private; it affects things rather than persons; journeys, expeditions, and military movements are commonly attended with disasters: misfortunes are usually personal; they immediately affect the interests of the individual. Mishaps and mischances are altogether of a domestic nature."—CRABB.

TO CALCULATE, COMPUTE, RECKON, COUNT.

These words indicate the means by which we arrive at a given result in regard to quantity.

We calculate with a view to obtain a certain point of knowledge; as, to calculate an eclipse.—We compute by combining given numbers in order to learn the grand result.—We reckon and count in carrying out the details of a computation.

These words are also used in a secondary and figurative sense.—"Calculate is rather a conjectural deduction from what is, as to what may be; computation is a rational estimate of what has been, from what is; reckoning is a conclusive conviction, a pleasing assurance that a thing will happen; counting indicates an expectation. We calculate on a gain; compute any loss sustained, or the amount of any mischief done; we reckon on a promised pleasure; we count the hours and minutes until the time of enjoyment arrives."—CRABB.

TO CALL, CONVOKE, SUMMON.

Call is the generic term; as, to call a public meeting.—To convoke (from con and voco, to call together) is to require the assembling of some organized body of men by an act of authority; as, the king convoked Parliament.—To summon (from sub and moneo, to place under a monition or injunction) is to require attendance by an act of stringent authority; as, to summon a witness.

Now call we our high court of parliament.
SHAKESPEARE.

CAN BUT, CANNOT BUT.

It is an error of many persons in this country to use the former of these phrases where the sense requires the latter.

If we say, "I can but perish if I go," "but" means only; and denotes that this is all or the worst, that can happen. When the Apostle Peter said, "We cannot but speak of the things which we have seen and heard," he referred to a moral constraint or necessity which rested upon him and his associates; and the meaning was, "We cannot (morally) do anything except thus speak." This idea of a moral necessity or constraint, is of frequent occurrence, and is also expressed in the phrase, "I cannot help it." Thus we say, "I cannot but hope." "I cannot but believe," "I cannot but believe," "I cannot but think," "I cannot but remark," &c., &c.; in all which cases it would be a gross error to use the phrase can but. It is an error, however, into which some of our writers frequently fall, who are otherwise distinguished for their accuracy.

CANDID, FAIR, OPEN, FRANK, INGENUOUS.

A man is fair when he puts things on a just or equitable footing; he is candid when he looks impartially on both sides of a subject, doing justice especially to the motives and conduct of an opponent; he is open and frank when he declares his sentiments without reserve; he is ingenuous when he does this from a noble regard for truth.

Fair dealing; candid investigation; an open temper; a frank disposition; an ingenuous answer or declaration.

CAPACITY. See ABILITY.

CAPRICIOUS. See ARBITRARY.

CAPTIOUS, CAVILING, PETULANT, FRETFUL.

One who is captious (from capio, to lay hold of) is ready to catch at the slightest faults; one who is caviling (from cavillor, to criticise) does it on trivial or imaginary grounds; one who is petulant (L. peto, to attack) is apt, from irritability, to make hasty but slight attacks; fretfulness is complaining impatience.

A captious disposition; a caviling review; petulant remarks; a fretful temper.

CARE, ANXIETY, SOLICITUDE, CONCERN.

These words express mental pain in different degrees.

Care (from cura) belongs primarily to the intellect, and becomes painful from overburdening thought.—Anxiety (from ango, to press upon, lit., to strangle) denotes a state of distressing uneasiness from the dread of evil.—Solicitude (from sollicito, to rouse or stir up) expresses the same feeling in a diminished degree.—Concern (from con and cerno, to look after) is opposed to indifference, and implies but little exercise of anxious thought.

Care respects equally the past, the present, and the future; solicitude and anxiety have reference chiefly to the future. We are careful about the means; solicitous and anxious about the end; we are solicitous to obtain a good, we are anxious to avoid an evil.

CATEGORY, PREDICAMENT.

Category and predicament are both popularly used to express the idea of condition or situation, but with this difference, that predicament supposes it to be a bad or unfortunate one. Hence to say, "I am in the same category with you," is not of necessity to say, "I am in the same predicament."

CAUTIOUS, WARY, CIRCUMSPECT.

A man is cautious (from caveo, to avoid) chiefly as the result of timidity; one may be wary (connected with ware and ward, to guard against,) i. e., watchful in a high degree against danger, and yet bold and active; a man who is circumspect (from circumspicio, to look round,) habitually examines things on every side in order to weigh and deliberate.

It is necessary to be cautious at all times; to be wary in cases of extraordinary danger; to be circumspect in matters of peculiar delicacy and difficulty.

Caviling. See Captious.

To Celebrate, Commemorate.

We commemorate (from commemoro, to bring up to memory) events which we desire to cherish in affectionate remembrance by appropriate rites; as, to commemorate the death of our Saviour.—We celebrate (from celebro, to treat with public honor,) by demonstrations of joy in appropriate ceremonies expressive of respect or affection; as, to celebrate the Lord's Supper; to celebrate the birth-day of Washington; to celebrate the birth-day of our Independence.

We are called upon to commemorate a revolution as surprising in its manner, as happy in its consequences.—Atterbury.

Cessation, Stop, Pause, Rest, Intermission.

Stop is the generic term, denoting a suspension of progressive motion; cessation (from cesso, to cease) is a ceasing from action, either temporary or final; pause (from Gr. παύω, to cease) is a temporary stopping with a view to go on; rest (from Sax. raest, to cease or lie down) is a stopping for the sake of relief or repose; intermission (from inter and mitto, to send or put between) is a stopping at intervals to recommence.

A cessation of hostilities; a stop put to evil practices; a pause in the midst of labor; rest after fatigue; an intermission of public exercises.

Chagrin, Vexation, Mortification.

These words agree in the general sense of pain produced by untoward circumstances.

Vexation (from vexo, to shake or agitate) is a feeling of disquietude or irritating uneasiness from numerous causes, such as losses, disappointments, &c.—Mortification (from mors, death, and facio, to make) is a stronger word, and denotes that keen sense of pain which results from wounded pride or humiliating occurrences.—Chagrin is literally the cutting pain produced by the friction of shagreen leather; in its figurative sense, it varies in meaning, denoting in its lower degrees simply a state of vexation, and in its higher degrees the keenest sense of mortification.

Vexation arises chiefly from our wishes and views being crossed; mortification from our self-importance being hurt; chagrin from a mixture of the two.—Crabb.

To Chasten, Punish, Chastise.

Punish and chasten differ in the object aimed at. The former is designed to uphold law by the infliction of penalty; the latter is intended, by kind correction to prevent the repetition of faults and to reclaim the offender.—Chastise in its earlier meaning, as found in the Scriptures, had the same sense as chasten. At present, however, it more commonly denotes to punish publicly with stripes and with a view to disgrace.

I follow thee, safe guide! the path
Thou leadest me; and to the hand of Heaven submit,
However chastening. Milton.

The name of Cassius honors this corruption,
And chastisement doth therefore hide its head.
Shakespeare.

Chief, Chieftain, Commander, Leader.

These words fluctuate somewhat in their meaning according to circumstances, but agree in the general idea of rule and authority.

The term chief (from Fr. chef, head) is now more usually applied to one who has the pre-eminence or rule in civil matters; as, the chief of the police, the chief of an Indian tribe.—A chieftain (sometimes a chief) is one who has the preëminence and lead in military concerns, especially among small clans or tribes.—A commander is one who has the rule and authority in warlike concerns; a leader is one who takes the command and gives directions in particular enterprises.

A chief needs sagacity and force of character; a chieftain requires skill and dexterity for trying emergencies; a commander should be distinguished for his foresight and energy; a leader needs a union of sagacity, penetration, and indomitable energy.

Chieftain. See Chief.

Choice. See Option, also Volition.

To Choose, Prefer, Elect.

To choose is the generic term, and denotes to take by an act of the will.—To prefer (from pre, before, and fero, to bring or place) is to choose one thing as compared with and more desirable than another.—To elect (from e, out of, and lego, to take) is to choose or select out of a body or mass which is presented for the purpose; and is more specifically applied to a selection of this kind for some office, employment, use, &c.

To choose a profession; to prefer private life to a public one; to elect members of Congress.

I may neither choose whom I would, nor refuse whom I dislike.—Shakespeare.

O spirit, that doth prefer
Before all temples the upright heart.

Clearness, Perspicuity.

Clearness has reference to our ideas, and springs from a distinct conception of the subject under consideration.—Perspicuity has reference to the mode of expressing our ideas, and belongs essentially to style. Hence we speak of a writer as having clear ideas, a clear arrangement, and perspicuous phraseology. We do at times speak of a person's having great clearness of style; but in such cases we are usually thinking of the clearness of his ideas as manifested in language. "Whenever men think clearly and are thoroughly interested, they express themselves with perspicuity and force."—Robertson.

Cloister, Monastery, Nunnery, Convent, Abbey, Priory.

Cloister (from clausus, enclosed) is the generic term, and denotes a place of seclusion from the world.—A monastery (from the Gr. μόνος, alone) is a place for men called monks.—A nunnery is always for women, called nuns.—A convent (from con and venio, to meet) is an assemblage or community of recluses.—An abbey and a priory are named from their heads, an abbot or prior.

Clumsy. See Awkward.

To Coalesce. See To Add.

To Coerce, Compel.

To compel (from cum and pello, to drive) denotes to urge on by force which can not be resisted. The term applies equally to physical and moral force; as, compelled by hunger; compelled by adverse circumstances; compelled by parental affection.—Coerce (from co and arceo, to press or drive) had at first only the negative sense of checking or restraining by force; as, to coerce subjects within the bounds of law. It has now gained a positive sense, viz., that of driving a person into the performance of some act which is required of him by another; as, to coerce compliance with the conditions of a contract; to coerce obedience. In this sense (which is now the prevailing one), coerce differs but little from compel, and yet there is a distinction between them. Coercion is usually accomplished by indirect means, as by the operation of law or the force of circumstances. Threats and intimidation are very often resorted to. Physical force is more rarely employed.

Collusion, Connivance.

A person who is guilty of connivance (con and niveo, to wink at) intentionally overlooks, and thus sanctions what he was bound to prevent.—A person who is guilty of collusion (con and ludo, to play) unites with others (playing into their hands) for fraudulent purposes. The connivance of public men at what is wrong is often the result of the basest collusion.

These miracles were done publicly in the face of the world, that there might be no room to suspect artifice or collusion.—Atterbury.

In many of these the directors were heartily concurring; in most of them they were encouraging, and sometimes commanding; in all they were conniving.—Burke.

Combat. See Battle, also Contest.

Combination. See Cabal.

To Comfort, Console, Solace.

These verbs all suppose some antecedent state of suffering or sorrow.

Console (from con and solor, to ease or soothe) is confined to the act of giving relief to the mind under affliction or sorrow, and points to some definite source of that relief; as, the presence of his friend consoled him; he was much consoled by this intelligence, etc.—Comfort (from con and fortis, strong or invigorating) points to relief afforded by the communication of positive pleasure, as well as the diminution of pain; as, "they brought the young man alive, and were not a little comforted."—Acts, xx.—Solace is from solatium, which means, according to Dumesnil, consolation inwardly felt or applied to the case of the sufferer. Hence, the verb to solace, denotes the using of things for the purpose of affording relief under sorrow or suffering; as, to solace one's self with work or with active employments.

Comfort, Consolation.

Comfort has two meanings, (1) strength and relief received under affliction, (2) positive enjoyment of a quiet, permanent nature, together with the sources thereof; as, the comfort of love; surrounded with comforts. This latter is the meaning now in general use; but it is with the former only that the word consolation is brought into comparison. As thus compared, consolation points to some specific source of relief for the afflicted mind; as, the consolations of religion. Comfort supposes the relief to be afforded by imparting positive enjoyment, as well as a diminution of pain.

"Consolation, or comfort, signifies some alleviation to that pain to which it is not in our power to afford the proper and adequate remedy; they imply rather an augmentation of the power of bearing, than a diminution of the burden."—Johnson.

Commiseration. See Sympathy.

To Commit, Intrust, Consign.

These words have in common the idea of transferring from one's self to the care and custody of another.

Commit is the widest term, and expresses only the general idea of delivering into the charge of another; as, to commit a lawsuit to the care of an attorney.—To intrust rises higher, and denotes the act of committing in the exercise of confidence or trust; as, to intrust a friend with the care of a child.—To consign (from con and signo, lit., to transfer under seal) is a more formal act, and regards the thing transferred, as placed chiefly or wholly out of one's immediate control; as, to consign a pupil to the charge of his instructor; to consign goods to an agent for sale.

These words are also used in a secondary or figurative sense; as, an author commits his thoughts to writing; he intrusts a friend with the secret of having done so; and finally consigns his work to the press.

All things committed to thy trust conceal.
Denham.

To Communicate, Impart, Reveal.

Communicate (from L., communis, in common with others) is the generic term, and denotes the allowing of others to partake or enjoy in common with ourselves.—Impart (from in and pars, part) is more specific;—it is giving to others a part of what we had held as our own, or making them our partners; as, to impart our feelings, to impart of our property, &c. Hence there is something more intimate in imparting intelligence than in communicating it.—To reveal (from revelo, to unveil) is to disclose something hidden or concealed; as, to reveal a secret.

Whatever can be enjoyed in common with others, is communicated; whatever can be shared by another, is imparted; whatever can be laid open or disclosed to another, is revealed.

Compact. See Covenant.

To Compare, Compare with, Compare to.

Things are compared with each other in order to learn their relative value or excellence. Thus, we compare Cicero with Demosthenes, for the sake of deciding which was the greater orator.—One thing is compared to another in order to show the likeness or similarity which exists between them. Thus it has been common to compare the eloquence of Demosthenes to a thunder-bolt, on account of its force, and the eloquence of Cicero to a conflagration, on account of its splendor.

"In point of learning, he is not to be compared with his rival candidate, though he is far superior to him in natural abilities." "Burke compares the parks of London to the lungs of the human body."

Compunction, Remorse, Contrition.

Remorse (from re-mordeo, to have a gnawing pain) is anguish of soul under a sense of guilt, and dread of punishment.—Compunction (from compungo, to pierce deeply) is the pain occasioned by a wounded and awakened conscience.—Neither of them implies true contrition (from con and tero, to wear out), which denotes the protracted and severe sorrow, appropriate to one who has been in a state of peculiar sinfulness.

We speak of the gnawings of remorse; of compunction at the remembrance of some act of trangression; of deep contrition in view of our past lives.

To Compute. See To Calculate.

To Conceal, Hide, Disguise, Dissemble, Secrete.

To hide is the generic term, which embraces all the rest.—To conceal (from con and celo, to withhold from sight) is simply not to make known what we wish to keep secret.—To disguise (from dis and guise, covering) and dissemble (from dis and simulo, to pretend) is to conceal by assuming some false appearance.—To secrete (from secerno, to separate) is to hide in some place of secrecy. A man may conceal facts, disguise his sentiments, dissemble his feelings, or secrete stolen goods.

But double griefs afflict concealing hearts.

TO CONFESS, ACKNOWLEDGE, AVOW.

Acknowledge is opposed to conceal. We acknowledge what we feel must or ought to be made known. [See ACKNOWLEDGE.]—Avow is opposed to withhold. We avow (from Fr. avouer, to make known) when we make an open and public declaration as against obloquy or opposition; as, to avow one's principles, to avow one's participation in some act.—Confess is opposed to deny. We confess (in the ordinary sense of the word) what we feel to have been wrong; as, to confess one's errors or faults.

We sometimes use confess and acknowledge, when there is no admission of our being in the wrong; as, "this I confess is my opinion;" "I acknowledge I have always thought so." But in these cases, we mean simply to imply, that others may perhaps think us in the wrong, and hence we use the words by way of deference to their opinions.

It was in this way that the early Christians were led to use the Latin confiteor and confessio fidei, to denote the public declaration of their faith in Christianity; and hence the corresponding use in English of the verb confess and the noun confession.

CONFLICT. See CONTEST.

TO CONFOUND. See TO ABASH.

TO CONFUSE. See TO ABASH.

TO CONFUTE, REFUTE.

These words rest on the old Latin verb futo, the same as fundo, to pour.

Refute is literally to pour (re) back; and hence denotes to repel by appropriate and decisive evidence; as, to refute an argument, charge, &c.—Confute is literally to pour (cum,) together, as when cold water is poured upon hot, thus serving to allay, bring down or neutralize completely. Hence as applied to arguments, (and the word is never applied, like refute, to charges,) it denotes to overwhelm by evidence which puts an end to the case, and leaves an opponent nothing to say; as, "the atheist is confuted by the whole structure of things around him."

But since no reason can confute ye,
I'll try to force you to your duty. HUDIBRAS.

Instead of racking fancy to refute,
Reform thy manners and the truth enjoy.
YOUNG.

TO CONGRATULATE, FELICITATE.

To felicitate (from L. felix, happy) is simply to wish a person joy.—To congratulate (from con and gratulor, to rejoice with) has the additional signification of uniting in the joy of him whom we congratulate. Hence they are by no means synonymous. One who has lost the object of his affections by her marriage to a rival, might perhaps felicitate that rival on his success, but could never be expected to congratulate with him on such an event.

"Felicitations are little better than compliments; congratulations are the expression of a genuine sympathy and joy."—Trench.

CONNIVANCE. See COLLUSION.

TO CONQUER, VANQUISH, SUBDUE, SUBJUGATE, OVERCOME.

These words agree in the general idea expressed by overcome, viz.: that of bringing under one's power by the exertion of force.

Conquer (from con and quero, to seek eagerly, con being intensive) is wider and more general than vanquish, denoting usually a succession of conflicts.—Vanquish (Fr., vaincre, from L. vincio, to bind) is more individual, and refers usually to a single conflict. Thus, Alexander conquered Asia in a succession of battles, and vanquished Darius in one decisive engagement.

Subdue (perhaps from sub and duco) implies a more gradual and continual pressure, but a surer and more final subjection. We speak of a nation as subdued when its spirit is at last broken, so that no further resistance is offered.—Subjugate (from sub, under, and jugum, a yoke) is to bring completely under the yoke of bondage. The ancient Gauls were never finally subdued by the Romans until they were completely subjugated.

These words, when used figuratively have correspondent meanings.—We conquer our prejudices or aversions by a succession of conflicts; but we sometimes vanquish our reluctance to duty by one decided effort: we endeavor to subdue our evil propensities by watchful and persevering exertions. Subjugate is more commonly taken in its primary meaning: and when used figuratively has usually a bad sense; as, his reason was completely subjugated to the sway of his passions.

TO CONSIST, CONSIST OF, CONSIST IN.

The verb consist is employed chiefly for two purposes, which are marked and distinguished by the prepositions used.

When we wish to indicate the parts which unite to compose a thing, we use of; as when we say, "Macaulay's Miscellanies consist chiefly of articles which were first published in the Edinburgh Review."—When we wish to indicate the true nature, object, or result of a thing, we use in; as, "Our safety consists in a strict adherence to duty." "There are some artists whose skill consists in a certain manner which they have affected." "A great beauty of letters does often consist in little passages of private conversation, and references to particular matters."—WALSH.

CONSPICUOUS. See DISTINGUISHED.

CONSTANCY. See FIRMNESS.

CONSTANT, CONTINUAL, PERPETUAL.

These words are sometimes used in an absolute and sometimes in a qualified sense.

Constant (from L. constans, standing to) denotes in its absolute sense unchangeably fixed; as, a constant mind or purpose. In its qualified sense, it marks something as a "standing" fact or occurrence; as, liable to constant interruptions, constantly called for.—Continual in its absolute sense coincides with continuous, which see. In its qualified sense, it describes a thing as occurring in steady and rapid succession; as, a round of continual calls; continually changing.—Perpetual (from perpetuus, unceasing) denotes in its absolute sense, what literally never ceases or comes to an end; as, perpetual motion. In its qualified sense, it is used hyperbolically, and denotes that which rarely ceases; as, perpetual disturbance; perpetual noise; perpetual intermeddling.

CONSTERNATION. See ALARM.

CONSTRAINT, COMPULSION.

Constraint (from con and stringo, to bind) implies strong binding force; as, the constraint of necessity; the constraint of fear.—Compulsion (from com and pello, to drive) implies the exertion of some urgent impelling force; as, driven by compulsion. The former prevents us from acting agreeably to our wishes; the latter forces us to act contrary to our will. A soldier in the ranks moves with much constraint; and is often subject to much compulsion to make him move as desired. Compulsion is always produced by some active agent; a constraint may be laid upon us by the forms of civil society, or by other outward circumstances.—CRABB.

Commands are no constraints. If I obey them I do it freely. MILTON.

CONSUMPTION. See DECLINE.

CONTAGION. See INFECTION.

CONTAGIOUS, INFECTIOUS.

These words have been used in very diverse senses; but, in general, a contagious disease has been considered as one which is caught from another by contact, by the breath, by bodily effluvia, &c.; while an infectious disease supposes some entirely different cause acting by a hidden influence, like the miasma of prison-ships, of marshes, &c., infecting the system with disease.

This distinction, though not universally admitted by medical men, as to the literal meaning of the words, certainly applies to them in their figurative use. Thus we speak of the contagious influence of evil associates; the contagion of bad example, the contagion of fear, &c., when we refer to transmission by proximity or contact. On the other hand we speak of infection by bad principles, &c., when we consider anything as diffused abroad by some hidden influence.

TO CONTEMN, DESPISE, SCORN, DISDAIN.

Contemn is the generic term; to despise (literally, to look down upon) is to regard or treat as mean, unbecoming, or worthless; to scorn is stronger, expressing a quick, indignant contempt: disdain (from dedignor, to regard as unworthy) is still stronger, denoting either a generous abhorrence of what is base, or unwarrantable pride and haughtiness.

Let not your ears despise my tongue forever,
Which shall possess them with the heaviest sound
That ever yet they heard. SHAKESPEARE.

This my long sufferance, and my day of grace,
They who neglect and scorn shall never taste.
MILTON.

Tell him, Cato
Disdains a life which he has power to offer.
ADDISON.

TO CONTEMPLATE, MEDITATE, INTEND.

We meditate (from meditor, to muse on) a design when we are looking out or waiting for the means of its accomplishment; we contemplate it (from contemplor, to regard attentively) when the means are at hand, and our decision is nearly or quite made; to intend (from intendo, to strain toward) is stronger—we have decided to act when an opportunity may offer.

A general meditates an attack upon the enemy; he contemplates undertaking it at the earliest convenient season; and in the meantime conceals his intention with the utmost care.

CONTEMPTIBLE, DESPICABLE, PITIFUL, PALTRY.

Despicable is stronger than contemptible, as despise is stronger than contemn. It implies keen disapprobation with a mixture of anger. A man is despicable chiefly for low actions which mark his life, such as servility, baseness or mean adulation. A man is contemptible for mean qualities which distinguish his character, especially those which show him to be weak, foolish or worthless. Treachery is despicable, egotism is contemptible.—Pitiful and paltry (connected perhaps with palter) are applied to cases which are beneath anger, and are simply contemptible in a high degree. Anything that shows meanness or timidity is pitiful; anything that is low, shuffling or marked by equivocation, is paltry. Thus we speak of a pitiful excuse, a pitiful pretense, pitiful weakness; and of a paltry subterfuge, a paltry evasion, a paltry equivocation. The distinction between the two words is not, however, a marked one, and they are frequently interchanged.

CONTEMPTIBLE. See CONTEMPTUOUS.

CONTEMPTUOUS, CONTEMPTIBLE.

These words, from their similarity of sound, are sometimes erroneously interchanged, as when a person speaks of having "a very contemptible opinion" of another.

Contemptible is applied to that which is the object of contempt; as, contemptible conduct, a contemptible fellow. Contemptuous is applied to that which indicates contempt; as, a contemptuous look, a contemptuous remark, contemptuous treatment. Hence, we may speak of a thing, (an observation for example,) as contemptuous or as contemptible; meaning in the former case, that it expresses contempt, and in the latter case that it deserves contempt.

Rome, the proudest part of the heathen world, entertained the most contemptuous opinion of the Jews.
ATTERBURY.

TO CONTENT. See TO SATIATE.

CONTENTION, STRIFE.

A struggle between two parties, is the idea common to these two words.

Strife is a struggle for mastery; contention is a struggle for the possession of some desired object, or the accomplishment of some favorite end. Neither of the words is necessarily used in a bad sense, since there may be a generous strife or contention between two friends, as to which shall incur danger or submit to sacrifices. Ordinarily, however, these words denote a struggle arising from bad passions. In that case, strife usually springs from a quarrelsome temper; and contention from a selfish spirit which seeks its own aggrandizement, or because it is fearful lest others should obtain too much.

By these acts of hateful strife, hateful to all,
How hast thou disturbed heaven's blessed peace.
MILTON.

Contention bold, with iron lungs,
And slander, with her hundred tongues. MOORE.

CONTEST, CONFLICT, COMBAT, ENCOUNTER.

Contest is the broadest term, and had originally no reference to actual fighting. It was, on the contrary, a legal term from L. contestor, to call witnesses; and hence came to denote first a struggle in argument, and then a struggle for some common object between opposing parties, usually one of considerable duration, and implying successive stages or acts. Conflict is from the L. confligo, to come to blows; and denotes literally a close personal engagement, in which sense it is applied to actual fighting. It is, however, more commonly used in a figurative sense to denote strenuous or direct opposition; as, a mental conflict, conflicting interests or passions, a conflict of laws.—An encounter (L. contra) is a direct meeting face to face. Usually it is a hostile meeting, and is then very nearly coincident with conflict; as, an encounter of opposing hosts. Sometimes it is used in a looser sense; as, "this keen encounter of our wits." SHAKES.—Combat (from Fr. combattre, to beat mutually) is commonly applied to actual fighting; but may be used figuratively in reference to a strife of words or a struggle of feeling.

CONTIGUOUS. See ADJOINING.

CONTINGENT. See ACCIDENTAL.

CONTINUAL. See CONSTANT, also CONTINUOUS.

TO CONTINUE. See TO PERSEVERE.

CONTINUOUS, CONTINUAL.

Both these words are from con and tineo, to hold together.

Continuous is the stronger, and denotes that the continuity or union of parts is absolute and uninterrupted; as, a continuous sheet of ice; a continuous flow of argument. So Daniel Webster speaks of "a continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England."—Continual, in most cases, marks a close and unbroken succession of things, rather than absolute continuity. Thus we speak of continual showers, implying a repetition with occasional interruptions; we speak of a person as liable to continual calls, or as subject to continual applications for aid, &c. To say "it rained continually during the day," would not of necessity imply, that there was no intermission whatever: to express that we should be apt to use continuously. It is common to say, "there are continual rains in the tropics at certain seasons." If continuous were used, it would imply that there was absolutely no cessation at all during the whole period, which is rarely if ever the case.

Contract. See Covenant.

Contrition, Repentance.

Contrition (literally bruising) is a continuous state of grief and self-condemnation; repentance is an act in which, with sorrow for our sins, we renounce them. Contrition has all the pain of repentance, without the relief it affords.

The contrition of Judas ended in remorse and suicide; that of Peter led to true repentance, and a renewed consecration to his Master's service.

My future days shall be one whole contrition.
Dryden.

Who by repentance is not satisfied,
Is not of heaven nor earth; for these are pleased;
By penitence the Eternal's wrath 's appeased.
Shakespeare.

Conversation, Talk.

There is a looser sense of these words, in which they are synonymous; there is a stricter sense in which they differ.

Talk is usually broken, familiar and versatile.—Conversation is more continuous and sustained, and turns ordinarily upon topics of higher interest. Children talk to their parents or to their companions; men converse together in mixed assemblies. Dr. Johnson once remarked, of an evening spent in society, that there had been a great deal of talk, but no conversation. "Talkers," says Lord Bacon, "are commonly vain, and credulous withal; for he that talketh what he knoweth, will also talk what he knoweth not."

Convert, Proselyte, Pervert.

A convert is one who turns from what he believes to have been a decided error of faith or practice. Such a change may relate to religion, politics, or other subjects. Properly considered, it is not confined to speculation alone, but affects the whole current of one's feelings, and the tenor of his actions. As such a change carries with it the appearance of sincerity, the term convert is usually taken in a good sense. —Proselyte is a term of more ambiguous use and application. It was first applied to an adherent of one religious system who had transferred himself externally to some other religious system; and is also applied to one who makes a similar transfer in respect to systems of philosophy or speculation. The term has little or no reference to the state of the heart.—Pervert is a term of recent origin, designed to express the contrary of convert, and to stigmatize a person as drawn off or perverted from the true faith. It has been more particularly applied by members of the Church of England, to those who have joined the Roman Catholic Church.

To Convince, Persuade.

To convince is an act of the understanding; to persuade, of the will or feelings. The one is effected by argument, the other by motives. There are cases, however, when persuade may seem to be used in reference only to the assent of the understanding; as when we say, "I am persuaded it is so;" "I can not persuade myself of the fact." But in such instances, there is usually or always a degree of awakened feeling, which has had its share in producing the assent of the understanding.

"Conviction is the effect of substantial evidence, and is solid and permanent in its nature; persuasion, depending on our feelings, is exposed to various changes, and may vary both in the degree and in the object. Conviction answers in our minds to positive certainty; persuasion answers to probability."—Crabb.

Corporeal, Bodily, Corporal.

Bodily is opposed to mental; as, bodily affections.—Corporeal refers to the interior animal structure; as, corporeal substance or frame.—Corporal, as now used, refers more to the exterior; as, corporal punishment. To speak of corporeal punishment is now a gross error.

To Correspond, Correspond with, Correspond to.

The verb, to correspond is used in two very diverse senses. In the one case it denotes the carrying on of intercourse by means of letters, and it is then always to be followed by with; as, to correspond with a friend. In the other case it denotes, that things stand off against each other in such a manner as to be mutually correspondent, and the word is then to be followed by to; as, "this corresponds to what I predicted."

Courage, Bravery, Fortitude, Intrepidity, Gallantry, Valor.

Courage (Low Latin, coragium, from cor, the heart) is that firmness of spirit and swell of soul which meets danger without fear.—Bravery (Low Latin, bravium, from Gr. βραβειον, the reward of victory) is daring and impetuous courage, like that of one who has the reward continually in view, and displays his courage in daring acts.—Fortitude (from fortis, strong) has often been styled passive courage, and consists in the habit of encountering danger and enduring pain with a steadfast and unbroken spirit.—Valor (from valeo, to have force) is courage exhibited in war, and can not be applied to single combats; it is never used figuratively. —Intrepidity (from intrepidus, without trembling) is firm, unshaken courage.—Gallantry (perhaps from the Celtic gal, gay and animated) is adventurous courage, which courts danger with a high and cheerful spirit. A man may show courage, fortitude, or intrepidity in the common pursuits of life, as well as in war. Valor, bravery, and gallantry are displayed in the contest of arms. Valor belongs only to battle; bravery may be shown in single combat; gallantry may be manifested either in attack or defense; but in the latter case, the defense is usually turned into an attack.

Covenant, Contract, Compact, Stipulation.

These words all denote a mutual agreement between two parties.

Covenant (from convenio, to come together) is now chiefly used in a religious sense; as, the covenant of works or of grace, a church covenant; the Solemn League and Covenant.—Contract (from contraho, to bring together) is the word most used in the business of life. Crabb and Taylor are wrong in saying, that a contract must always be in writing. There are parol and implied contracts as well as written ones, and these are equally enforced by law. In legal usage, the word covenant has an important place as connected with contracts.—A compact (from cum and pango, to bind firmly together) is only a stronger and more solemn contract. The term is chiefly applied to political alliances. Thus, our Federal Constitution is a compact between the States; and no individual State can without consent of Congress enter into a compact with any other State or foreign power.—A stipulation (from stipulatio) is one of the articles or provisions of a contract. It is said by Vossius to be from stipula, a straw, because parties who bought land among the Latins, at an early period, held a straw in their hands which represented the whole land.

Coward, Craven, Poltroon, Dastard.

Coward is from Fr. couard, supposed to be from Low Latin codardus, referring to the tail, and denoting to slink back like terrified beasts with the tail between the legs.—A craven

(from crave) is literally one who begs off, or shrinks at the approach of danger.—A poltroon (supposed by Richardson to be from pollice truncus, one deprived of his thumb to avoid military duty, an offense so common as to occasion severe laws against it) is a mean-spirited coward.—Dastard (from Sax. adastrigan, to dismay utterly) has become one of the strongest terms of reproach in our language.

A coward, a most devout coward, religious in it!
SHAKESPEARE.

Is it fit this soldier keep his oath?
—He is a craven and a villain else!
SHAKESPEARE.

For who but a poltroon possessed with fear,
Such haughty insolence can tamely bear?
DRYDEN.

CRIME, SIN, VICE.

Sin is the generic term embracing wickedness of every kind.—Crime (L. crimen, from Gr. κρίνω, to condemn) is strictly a violation of law either human or divine, but in present usage the term is more often applied to actions contrary to the laws of the state.—Vice (L. vitium, a spot or blemish) is more distinctively that which springs from the inordinate indulgence of the natural appetites, which are in themselves innocent. Thus, intemperance, unchastity, duplicity, &c., are vices; while murder, forgery, &c., which spring from the indulgence of selfish passions, are crimes.

It is a great sin to swear unto a sin,
But greater sin to keep a sinful oath.
SHAKESPEARE.

Undergo with me one guilt, one crime
Of tasting.
MILTON.

Ungoverned appetite a brutish vice.
MILTON.

Some mark of virtue on its outward parts.

CROWD. See THRONG.

CUNNING, ARTFUL, SLY, WILY, CRAFTY.

These epithets agree in expressing an aptitude for attaining some end by peculiar and secret means.

Cunning is usually low; as, a cunning trick.—Artful is more ingenious and inventive; as, an artful device.—Sly implies a turn for what is double or concealed; as, sly humor, a sly evasion.—Crafty denotes a talent for dextrously deceiving; as, a crafty manager.—Wily describes a talent for the use of stratagems; as, a wily politician.

"A cunning man often shows his dexterity in simply concealing. An artful man goes further and exerts his ingenuity in misleading. A crafty man mingles cunning with art, and so shapes his actions as to lull suspicions. The young may be cunning, but the experienced only can be crafty. Slyness is a vulgar kind of cunning; the sly man goes cautiously and silently to work. Wiliness is a species of cunning or craft, applicable only to cases of attack and defense."—CRABB.

DAILY, DIURNAL.

Daily is Saxon, and diurnal (from diurnus) is Latin. The former is used in reference to the ordinary concerns of life; as, daily wants, daily cares, daily employments. The latter is appropriated chiefly by astronomers, but is sometimes used by poets as a word of greater dignity. It is applied especially to what belongs to the astronomical day; as, the diurnal revolution of the earth.

Man hath his daily work of body or mind
Appointed, which declares his dignity,
And the regard of heaven on all his ways.
MILTON.

DAINTY, DELICACY.

These words are here compared as denoting articles of food.

The term delicacy (from delicate) is applied to a nice article of any kind, and hence to articles of food which are particularly attractive. Dainty is stronger, and denotes some exquisite article of cookery.

A hotel may be provided with all the delicacies of the season, and its table richly covered with dainties.

These delicacies
I mean of taste, sight, smell, herbs, fruits and flowers,
Walks and the melody of birds.
MILTON.

A table furnished plenteously with bread,
And dainties, remnants of the last regale.
COWPER.

DAMAGE. See MISCHIEF.

DANGER, PERIL, HAZARD, RISK, JEOPARDY.

Danger is the generic term and implies some contingent evil in prospect.—Peril is instant or impending danger; as, in peril of one's life.—Hazard (lit., a die or throw) arises from something fortuitous or beyond our control; as, the hazard of the seas.—Risk (lit., daring) is doubtful or uncertain danger, often incurred voluntarily; as, to risk an engagement.—Jeopardy (lit., Fr. jeu perdu, a lost game) is extreme danger.

Danger of a contagious disease; the perils of shipwreck; the hazards of speculation; the risk of daring enterprises; a life brought into jeopardy.

DARKNESS, DIMNESS, OBSCURITY, GLOOM.

Darkness arises from a total, and dimness from a partial want of light. A thing is obscure when so overclouded or covered as not to be easily perceived. As the shade or obscurity increases, it deepens into gloom. What is dark is hidden from view; what is obscure is difficult to perceive or penetrate; the eye becomes dim with age; an impending storm fills the atmosphere with gloom.

When taken figuratively, these words have a like use; as, the darkness of ignorance—dimness of discernment—obscurity of reasoning—gloom of superstition.

TO DAUNT. See TO DISMAY.

DEAD. See LIFELESS.

DEATH, DECEASE, DEMISE, DEPARTURE, RELEASE.

Death applies to the termination of every form of existence both animal and vegetable; the other words only to the human race. Decease (decessus) is the term used in law for the removal of a human being out of life in the ordinary course of nature. Demise was formerly confined to the decease of princes, but is now sometimes used of distinguished men in general; as, the demise of Mr. Pitt.—Departure and release are peculiarly terms of Christian affection and hope.

A violent death is not usually called a decease. Departure implies a friendly taking leave of life. Release implies a deliverance from a life of suffering or sorrow.

TO DEBASE. See TO ABASE.

TO DEBATE. See TO ARGUE, also TO DISCUSS.

DEBILITY, INFIRMITY, IMBECILITY.

An infirmity belongs, for the most part, to particular members, and is often temporary; as, of the eyes, &c. Debility is more general, and prevents, while it lasts, the ordinary functions of nature. Imbecility attaches to the whole frame and renders it more or less powerless. Debility may be constitutional or may be the result of superinduced causes; imbecility is always constitutional; infirmity is accidental, and results from sickness or a decay of the frame.

These words, in their figurative uses, have the same distinctions; we speak of infirmity of will, debility of intellect, and an imbecility which affects the whole man.

Decay. See Decline.

Decease. See Death.

Deceit. See Deception.

Deceiver, Impostor.

A deceiver operates by stealth and in private upon individuals; an impostor practices his arts on the community at large. The one succeeds by artful falsehoods, the other by bold assumption.

The faithless friend and the fickle lover are deceivers; the false prophet and the pretended prince are impostors.

> Men were deceivers ever:
> One foot in sea, and one on shore;
> To one thing constant never.
> SHAKESPEARE.

> But now when time has made the imposture plain,
> What new delusion charms your cheated eyes again?
> DRYDEN.

Deception, Deceit, Fraud, Imposition.

Deception usually refers to the act, and deceit to the habit of the mind; hence we speak of a person as skilled in deception and addicted to deceit. The practice of deceit springs altogether from design, and that of the worst kind; but a deception does not always imply aim and intention, since it may be undesigned or accidental.

An imposition is an act of deception practiced upon some one to his annoyance or injury; a fraud implies the use of stratagem, with a view to some unlawful gain or advantage.

Decision. See Determination.

Decided, Decisive.

We call a thing decisive when it has the power or quality of deciding; as, a decisive battle; we speak of it as decided when it is so fully settled as to leave no room for doubt; as, a decided preference, a decided aversion. Hence, a decided victory is one about which there is no question; a decisive victory is one which ends the contest.—Decisive is applied only to things; as, a decisive sentence, a decisive decree, a decisive judgment. Decided is applied equally to persons and things. Thus we speak of a man as decided in his whole course of conduct; and as having a decided disgust, or a decided reluctance to certain measures.

"A politic caution, a guarded circumspection, were among the ruling principles of our forefathers in their most decided conduct."—BURKE. "The sentences of superior judges are final, decisive and irrevocable."—BLACKSTONE.

Decision, Determination, Resolution.

Each of these words has two meanings, one implying the act of deciding, determining or resolving; and the other a habit of mind as to so doing. It is in the last sense that the words are here compared.

Decision (from de and cido) is a cutting short. It implies that several courses of action have been presented to the mind, and that the choice is now finally made. It supposes, therefore, a union of promptitude and energy.—Determination (bringing to terminus or end) is the natural consequence of decision. It is the settling of a thing with a fixed purpose to adhere.—Resolution is the necessary result in a mind which is characterized by firmness. It is a spirit which scatters (resolves) all doubt, and is ready to face danger or suffering in carrying out one's determinations. Martin Luther was equally distinguished for his prompt decision, his steadfast determination, and his inflexible resolution.

Decisive. See Decided.

Decline, Decay, Consumption.

Decline (from de and clino, to turn away or lean aside) marks the first stage in a downward progress; decay (from de and cado, to fall) indicates the second stage, and denotes a tendency to ultimate destruction; consumption (from consume, or waste away) marks a steady decay from an internal exhaustion of strength.

The health may experience a decline from various causes at any period of life; it is naturally subject to decay with the advance of old age; consumption may take place at almost any period of life, from disease which wears out the constitution.—By a gradual decline states and communities lose their strength and vigor; by progressive decay they are stripped of their honor, stability and greatness; by a consumption of their resources and vital energy they are led rapidly on to a completion of their existence.

To Decorate. See To Adorn.

Decorum, Dignity.

Decorum in accordance with its etymology, (L., decorus) is that which is becoming in outward act or appearance; as, the decorum of a public assembly.—Dignity (from dignitas, greatness) springs from an inward elevation of soul producing a correspondent effect on the manners; as, dignity of personal appearance.

> He kept with princes due decorum,
> Yet never stood in awe before 'em. SWIFT.

> Name to me yon Achaian chief for bulk
> Conspicuous, and for port. Taller indeed
> I may perceive than he, but with these eyes
> Saw never yet such dignity and grace.
> COWPER'S ILIAD.

To Decrease, Diminish.

Things usually decrease (from de and cresco, to grow) or fall off by degrees, and from within, or through some cause which is imperceptible; as, the flood decreases; the cold decreases; their affection has decreased. Things commonly diminish (from diminuo, to become smaller) or are diminished by an action from without, or one which is apparent; as, the army was diminished by disease; his property is diminishing through extravagance; their affection has diminished since their separation. The turn of thought, however, is often such that these words may be interchanged.

> Never such joy was since the world began,
> As in the ark, when Noah and his behold
> The olive leaf, which certainly them told
> The flood decreased.
> DRAYTON. NOAH'S FLOOD.

> Crete's ample fields diminish to our eye;
> Before the Boreal blasts the vessels fly.
> POPE'S ODYSSEY.

Decree. See Law.

To Decry, Depreciate, Detract, Disparage.

Decry and depreciate refer to the estimation in which a thing is held, the former seeking to cry it down, and the latter to run it down in the opinion of others.—Detract (from de and traho, to draw away) and disparage (from Low Latin, disparago, to put below one's true level) refer to merit or value, which the former assails with caviling, &c., while the latter wilfully underrates and seeks to degrade it. Men decry their rivals and depreciate their measures. The envious detract from the merit of a good action, and disparage the motives of him who performs it.

Deduction. See Induction.

To Defame. See To Asperse.

To Defeat. See To Baffle.

Defect, Fault.

Defect (from de and factum, left undone) is negative, denoting the absence of that which is necessary to a thing's completeness or perfection; fault (from fallo, to deceive, or fall short in duty) is positive, denoting something improper or wrong. The faults of a friend are too often palliated or explained away into mere defects.

> Trust not yourself; but, your defects to know,
> Make use of every friend—and every foe.—POPE.

> He that but conceives a crime in thought,
> Contracts the danger of an actual fault.
> DRYDEN.

To Defend, Protect.

To defend (from de and fendo), is literally to ward off; to protect (from pro and tego) is to cover over so as to secure against approaching danger. We defend those who are attacked; we protect those who are liable to injury or invasion. A fortress is defended by its guns, and protected by its wall.

> And here th' access, a gloomy grove defends,
> And here th' unnavigable lake extends.
> DRYDEN.

> Leave not the faithful side
> That gave thee being, still shades thee and protects.
> MILTON.

Deference, Reverence, Respect.

Deference (from de and fero, to defer) marks an inclination to yield one's opinion, and to acquiesce in the sentiments of another in preference to one's own.—Respect (from respicio, to look back upon) marks the estimation that we have for another, which makes us look to him as worthy of high confidence for the qualities of his mind and heart.—Reverence (from re and vereor, to fear) denotes a slight mingling of fear with a high degree of respect and esteem.

Age, rank, dignity, and personal merit call for deference; respect should be paid to the wise and good; reverence is due to God, to the authors of our being, and to the sanctity of the laws.

Definition, Explanation, Description.

A definition (lit., tracing of limits) is designed to settle a thing in its compass and extent; an explanation (lit., making plain) is intended to remove some obscurity or misunderstanding, and is therefore more extended and minute; a description enters into striking particulars with a view to interest or impress by graphic effect. It is not therefore true, though often said, that description is only an extended definition.

Logicians distinguish definitions into essential and accidental. An essential definition states what are regarded as the constituent parts of the essence of that which is to be defined; and an accidental definition lays down what are regarded as circumstances belonging to it, viz., properties or accidents, such as causes, effects, &c.—Fleming.

Delicious, Delightful.

Delicious refers to the pleasure derived from certain of the senses, particularly the taste and smell; as, delicious food, a delicious fragrance. Delightful may also refer to most of the senses; as, delightful music; a delightful prospect; delightful sensations; but has a higher application to matters of taste, feeling and sentiment; as, a delightful abode, conversation, employment; delightful scenes, &c.

> In his last hours his easy wit display:
> Like the rich fruit he sings, delicious in decay.
> Smith.

> No spring, nor summer, on the mountain seen,
> Smiles with gay fruits or with delightful green.
> Addison.

To Deliver, Give Forth, Discharge, Liberate, Pronounce, Utter.

Deliver (from Fr. delivrer, from L. liber, free) denotes, literally, to set free. Hence the term is extensively applied to cases where a thing is made to pass from a confined state to one of greater freedom or openness. Hence it may, in certain connections, be used as synonymous with any or all of the above-mentioned words, as will be seen from the following examples:—One who delivers a package gives it forth; one who delivers a cargo discharges it; one who delivers a captive liberates him; one who delivers a message or a discourse utters or pronounces it; when a platoon of soldiers deliver their fire, they set it free or give it forth.

To Delude. See To Mislead.

Delusion, Illusion.

These words both imply some deception practiced upon the mind.

An illusion (from illudo, to make sport of) is a false show, a mere cheat on the fancy or senses. It is, in other words, some idea or image presented to the bodily or mental vision which does not exist in reality.—A delusion (from deludo, to lead astray) is a false judgment usually affecting the real concerns of life. It is, in other words, an erroneous view of something which exists indeed, but has by no means the qualities or attributes ascribed to it. Thus we speak of the illusions of fancy, the illusions of hope; illusive prospects, illusive appearances, &c. In like manner, we speak of the delusions of stock-jobbing, the delusions of political jugglers, delusive appearances in trade, of being deluded by a seeming excellence. "A fanatic, either religious or political, is the subject of strong delusions; while the term illusion is applied solely to the visions of an uncontrolled imagination, the chimerical ideas of one blinded by hope, passion, or credulity, or lastly, to spectral and other ocular deceptions, to which the word delusion is never applied."—Whately.

To Demean, Degrade.

These words have sometimes been interchanged by our leading English writers, demean being considered as connected with the adjective mean. Thus we find in Shakespeare:—

> Now, out of doubt, Antipholus is mad,
> Else he would never so demean himself.

This, however, was by no means the established usage among our early writers; by whom, to a great extent, the word was taken to be connected with mien and demeanor; as in Chaucer:—

> Come on with me demeane you liche a maid
> With shamefast drede, for ye shal speke I wis
> With her that is the myrrour, joy and blisse:
> But somewhat strange and sad of her demeane
> She is.

This use of the word has long been established as the only one admissible; and it is a gross error now to speak of a man's demeaning [i. e., degrading] himself by improper conduct.

Demise. See Death.

To Demolish, Overturn, Destroy, Dismantle, Raze.

That is overturned or overthrown which had stood upright; that is destroyed (from de and struo, to scatter) whose component parts are scattered; that is demolished (from de and moles, a pile) which had formed a mass or structure; that is dismantled (from dis and mantle, a covering) which is stripped of its covering; as, a vessel of its sails, or a fortress of its bastions, &c.; that is razed which is brought down smooth and level to the ground. An ancient pillar is overturned or overthrown as the result of decay; a city is destroyed by an invasion of its enemies; a building is sometimes demolished to make way for warlike operations; a fortress may be dismantled from motives of prudence, in order to render it defenseless; a city may be razed by way of punishment, that it may be left as a monument of public vengeance.

To Deplore, Mourn, Lament, Bewail, Bemoan.

Mourn (lit., to be sad) is the generic term, denoting a state of grief or sadness. To lament (L. lumentor, to cry out) is literally to express grief by outcries, and denotes an earnest and strong expression of sorrow. To deplore (from de and ploro, to weep over) marks a deeper and more prolonged emotion. To bewail (from be and wail) and to bemoan (from be and moan) are appropriate only to cases of poignant distress, in which the grief finds utterance either in wailing or in moans and sobs.

A man laments his errors, and deplores the ruin they have brought on his family; mothers bewail or bemoan the loss of their children.

Deponent, Affiant.

These are legal terms describing a person who makes a written declaration under oath, with a view to establish certain facts.

An affiant (from ad and fido, to confirm by one's faith) is one who makes an affidavit, or declaration under oath, in order to establish the truth of what he says. A deponent (from de and pono, to lay down as true) is one who makes a deposition, or gives written testimony under oath, to be used in the trial of some case before a court of justice.

Deposition, Affidavit.

Affidavit is the wider term. It denotes the statement of an individual reduced to writing and sworn or affirmed to before some officer who has authority to administer an oath. Thus an individual makes an affidavit (as laying the ground of asking an injunction) that he is liable to suffer some injury, &c., from another. So a sea-captain makes an affidavit of something extraordinary he has witnessed at sea.—A deposition is the testimony of a witness who is unable to attend a trial, reduced to writing in due form of law, and sworn or affirmed by the deponent. It must be taken before a magistrate under such circumstances, that both parties may have an opportunity to attend and ask questions.

Depraved. See Abandoned.

Depravity, Depravation, Corruption.

Depravity (from de and pravus, wicked) is a vitiated state of mind or feeling; as, the depravity of the human heart, depravity of public morals.—Depravation (from the same) points to the act or process of making depraved, and hence to the end thus reached; as, a gradual depravation of principle; a depravation of manners, of morals, of the heart, &c.—Corruption (from con and rumpo, to break asunder) is the only one of these words which applies to physical substances, and in that connection denotes the process by which their component parts are dissolved. Hence, when figuratively used, it denotes an utter vitiation of principle or feeling.

Depravity applies only to the mind and heart; we can speak of a depraved taste, but not of depravity of taste. The other two words have a wider use: we can speak of the depravation or the corruption of taste and public sentiment.—Depravity is more or less open; corruption is more or less disguised in its operations. What is depraved requires to be reformed; what is corrupt requires to be purified.

To Depreciate. See To Decry.

Derangement. See Insanity.

To Deride, Ridicule, Mock, Taunt.

A man may ridicule (from rideo, to laugh at) without any unkindness of feeling: his object may be to correct; as, to ridicule the follies of the age.—He who derides (from de and rideo, to make an object of laughter) is actuated by a severe and contemptuous spirit; as, to deride one for his religious principle.—To mock (lit., to imitate by way of deriding) is stronger, and denotes open and scornful derision; as, to mock at sin.—To taunt (lit., to pierce with bitter words) is to reproach with the keenest insult; as, to taunt one for his misfortunes.

Ridicule consists more in words than in actions; derision and mockery evince themselves in actions as well as words; taunts are always expressed in words of extreme bitterness.

To Desert. See Abandon.

Design, Intention, Purpose.

Design (from de and signo, to mark out) has reference to something definitely aimed at.—Intention (from intendo, to strain after) points to the feelings or desires with which a thing is sought.—Purpose (from pro and pono, to set before one's self) has reference to a settled choice or determination for its attainment. "I had no design to injure you," means, it was no part of my aim or object. "I had no intention to injure you," means, I had no wish or desire of that kind. "My purpose was directly the reverse," makes the case still stronger.

No prudent man lays his designs only for a day, without any prospect to the remaining part of his life. Tillotson.

I wish others the same good intention, and greater successes. Temple.

Change this purpose,
Which being so horrible, so bloody, must
Lead on to some foul issue. Shakespeare.

To Desire, Request.

To desire (L. desidero) is to feel a wish or want.—To request (L. re and quæro, to seek) is to ask for its gratification. A man desires food, and requests to have it prepared. Desire may be used for request when the relations of the parties are such that the expression of a wish is all that is felt to be necessary to secure compliance. A man desires his friend to write often; a merchant desires his clerk to be more careful in future. In this latter case, from the relations of the parties, desire is stronger than request; it implies a command or injunction.

Device, Contrivance.

Device (from Fr. deviser, to invent) implies more of inventive power; and contrivance (from Fr. con and trouver, to find out) more of skill and dexterity in execution. A device usually has reference to something worked out for exhibition or show; a contrivance usually respects the arrangement or disposition of things with reference to securing some end. Devices were worn by knights-errant on their shields; contrivances are generally used to promote the practical convenience of life. The word device is often used in a bad sense; as, a crafty device; contrivance is almost always used in a good sense; as, a useful contrivance.

Diction, Style, Phraseology.

Style relates both to language and thought; diction to language only; phraseology to the mechanical structure of sentences or the mode in which they are phrased. The style of Burke was enriched with all the higher graces of composition; his diction was varied and copious; his phraseology, at times, was careless and cumbersome.

"Diction is a general term applicable alike to a single sentence or a connected composition. Errors in grammar, false construction, a confused disposition of words, or an improper application of them, constitutes bad diction; but the niceties, the elegancies, the peculiarities, and the beauties of composition, which mark the genius and talent of the writer, are what is comprehended under the name of style."—Crabb.

To Differ, Differ with, Differ from.

Differ with; differ from.—Differ with is used in reference to opinions; as, "I differ with my friend on that point." In all other cases, expressing simple unlikeness, differ from is used; as, "These two persons or things differ entirely from each other." This distinction is fully established in England, and, to a great extent, in America.

"I differ with the honorable gentleman on that point."—Lord Brougham.

"If the honorable gentleman differs with me on that subject, I differ as heartily with him, and shall always rejoice to differ."—Mr. Canning.

Diligence, Industry.

Industry has the wider sense of the two, implying an habitual devotion to labor for some valuable end, as knowledge, property, &c. Diligence (from diligo, to prefer or love) denotes earnest application to some specific object or pursuit, which more or less directly has a strong hold on one's interests or feelings. A man may be diligent for a time, or in seeking some favorite end, without meriting the title of industrious. Such was the case with Fox, while Burke was eminent not only for diligence, but indus- try; he was always at work, and always looking out for some new field of mental effort.

The sweat of industry would dry and die,
But for the end it works to. SHAKESPEARE.

Diligence and accuracy are the only merits which an historical writer may ascribe to himself.—GIBBON.

To Diminish. See To Decrease.

Dimness. See Darkness.

Direction, Control, Command.

These words, as here compared, have reference to the exercise of power over the actions of others.

Control is negative, denoting power to restrain; command is positive, implying a right to enforce obedience; directions are commands containing instructions how to act. A shipmaster has the command of his vessel; he gives directions to the seamen as to the mode of sailing it; and exercises a due control over the conduct of the passengers.

Directly, Immediately, Instantly.

Directly denotes, without any delay or diversion of attention; immediately implies, without any interposition of other occupation; instantly implies without any intervention of time. Hence, "I will do it directly," means, "I will go straightway about it."—"I will do it immediately," means, "I will do it as the very next thing."—"I will do it instantly or instantaneously," allows not a particle of delay.

Dirty. See Nasty.

Disability, Inability.

Inability is an inherent want of power to perform the thing in question; disability arises from some deprivation or loss of the needed competency. One who becomes deranged is under a disability of holding his estate; and one who is made a judge, of deciding in his own case. A man may decline an office on account of his inability to discharge its duties; he may refuse to accept a trust or employment on account of some disability which prevents him from entering into such engagements.

To Disappoint. See To Tantalize.

Disaster. See Calamity.

Disbelief, Unbelief.

Unbelief is a mere failure to admit; disbelief is a positive rejection. One may be an unbeliever in Christianity from ignorance or want of inquiry; a disbeliever has the proofs before him, and incurs the guilt of setting them aside. Unbelief is usually open to conviction; disbelief is already convinced as to the falsity of that which it rejects.

Men often tell a story in such a manner that we regard every thing they say with unbelief.

Familiarity with the worst parts of human nature often leads us into a disbelief in many good qualities which really exist among men.

To Discern. See To Perceive.

Discernment, Penetration, Discrimination.

Discernment (from dis and cerno, to distinguish) is accuracy and keenness of mental vision; penetration (from penetro, to enter into) is the power of seeing deeply into a subject in spite of every thing that intercepts the view; discrimination (from discrimen, a distinction) is a capacity of tracing out minute distinctions and the nicest shades of thought. A discerning man is not easily misled; one of a penetrating mind sees a multitude of things which escape others; a discriminating judgment detects the slightest differences.

To Discover, Invent.

We discover (from dis and cover, to lay open) what existed before but remained unknown; we invent (from invenio, to find out) by forming combinations which are either entirely new or which attain their end by means unknown before. Columbus discovered America; Whitney invented the cotton-gin. Newton discovered the law of gravitation; Galileo invented the telescope.

Discrimination. See Discernment.

To Discuss, Examine, Debate.

We speak of examining a subject (from examino, to weigh) when we ponder it with care, in order to discover its real state or the truth respecting it.—We speak of discussing a topic (from discutio, to shake asunder) when we examine it thoroughly in its distinct parts.—We speak of debating a point (from Fr. débattre, to beat, or contend about) when we discuss it in mutual argumentation between opposing parties.

Discussion often serves more for amusement than for any solid purpose; examination is of great practical utility in the direction of our conduct; debate often elicits important truths from the conflict of mind, which might otherwise have been overlooked.

To Disdain. See To Contemn.

Disdain. See Haughtiness.

Disease, Disorder, Distemper, Malady.

Disease is the leading medical term.—Disorder means the same, though perhaps with some slight reference to an irregularity of the system.—Distemper (lit., bad temperament) is now used by physicians only of the diseases of animals.—Malady (lit., a bad condition) is not a medical term, and is less used than formerly in literature.

A disease is usually deep-seated and permanent, or at least prolonged; a disorder is often slight, partial and temporary; malady has less of a technical sense than the other terms, and refers more especially to the suffering endured. In a figurative sense we speak of a diseased mind; of disordered faculties; and of mental maladies.

To Dismay, Daunt, Appall.

Dismay (lit., loss of strength) denotes a state of deep and gloomy apprehension.—To daunt (lit., overpower) supposes something more sudden and startling.—To appall (lit., strike pale) is the strongest term, implying a sense of terror which overwhelms the faculties.

So flies a herd of beeves, that hear, dismayed,
The lions roaring through the midnight shade.
POPE.

Jove got such heroes as my sire, whose soul
No fear could daunt, nor earth nor hell control.

Now the last ruin the whole host appalls;
Now Greece has trembled in her wooden walls.
POPE.

Disposition, Inclination, Tendency.

These words agree in describing a prevalent and controlling state of the human mind.

A man's disposition is the prevailing spirit or governing purpose of his mind.—His inclinations (lit., leanings) are excited states of desire or appetency.—Tendency (lit., straining) is a strong determination or proclivity toward some particular mode of action. Our inclinations are variable; our natural tendencies are apt ultimately to prevail; but a disposition formed and sustained on the side of virtue will give us the control of both.

Dispute. See Altercation.

To Dissemble. See To Conceal.

Dissembler, Hypocrite.

A dissembler conceals what he is.—A hypocrite feigns to be what he is not. When André passed within the American lines in a citizen's dress, he was a dissembler; Arnold, whom he went to visit, had long been a hypocrite.

Thou liest, dissembler; on thy brow
I read distracted horrors figured in thy looks.
FORD.

Fair hypocrite, you seek to cheat in vain;
Your silence argues you ask time to reign.

Distinguished, Eminent, Conspicuous, Celebrated, Illustrious.

A man is eminent when he stands high as compared with those around him; conspicuous when he is so elevated as to be seen and observed; distinguished when he has something which makes him stand apart from others in the public view; celebrated when he is widely spoken of with honor and respect; illustrious when a splendor is thrown around him which confers the highest dignity. A man eminent for professional skill; distinguished for his public services; conspicuous for his achievements; celebrated for his deeds of beneficence; illustrious for his virtues.

Doctrine, Precept.

Doctrine (from doceo, to teach) denotes whatever is recommended as a speculative truth to the belief of others.—Precept (from precipio, to take, or assume in advance) is a rule laid down to be obeyed. Doctrine supposes a teacher; precept supposes a superior with a right to command. The doctrines of the Bible; the precepts of our holy religion.

> Unpracticed he to fawn or seek for power
> By doctrines fashioned to the varying hour.
> Goldsmith.

> Experience, slow preceptress, teaching oft
> The way to glory by miscarriage foul,
> Must prompt him.—Cowper.

Dogma, Tenet.

A tenet (from teneo, to hold) is that which is maintained as true with great firmness; as, the tenets of our holy religion. A dogma (Gr. settled doctrine or article of faith) is that which is laid down with authority as indubitably true; as, the dogmas of the church. A tenet rests on its own intrinsic merits or demerits; a dogma rests on what is regarded as competent power to decide and determine. Dogma, has in our language acquired, to some extent, a repulsive sense, from its carrying with it the idea of authority or undue assumption. This is more fully the case with its derivatives, dogmatical and dogmatism.

> The dogmas of the Romish church are admitted by none but such as admit its authority: the tenets of republicans, levelers, and freethinkers, have been unblushingly maintained both in public and private.—Crabb.

Droll, Laughable, Comical.

Laughable is the generic term, denoting anything calculated to excite laughter; comical denotes something humorous of the kind exhibited in comedies; droll stands lower on the scale, being derived from the French drôle, a buffoon or antic, who awakened laughter by queer tricks, &c.

A laughable incident; a comical adventure; a droll story.

> They 'll not show their teeth in way of smile,
> Though Nestor swear the jest be laughable.
> Shakespeare.

> A comic subject loves a humble voice.
> Roscommon.

> Democritus dear droll, revisit earth,
> And with our follies glut thy heightened mirth.
> Prior.

Drunkenness, Intoxication, Inebriation.

Drunkenness refers more to the habit of excessive drinking; intoxication and inebriation to specific acts.

The first two words are extensively used in a figurative sense; a person is intoxicated with success, and is drunk with joy. "This plan of empire was not taken up in the first intoxication of unexpected success."—Burke.—"Passion is the drunkenness of the mind."—South.

E.

Eager, Earnest.

Eager (lit., sharp, keen-set) marks an excited state of desire or passion; thus a child is eager for a plaything, a hungry man is eager for food, a covetous man is eager for gain. Crabb is too strong, however, in saying, "Eagerness is mostly faulty, it cannot be too early restrained." He might more properly have said, "It is liable to frequent abuses, and is used in a bad as well as good sense."—Earnest (lit., reaching out, yearning) denotes a permanent state of mind, feeling or sentiment. It is always taken in a good sense; as, a preacher is earnest in his appeals to the conscience; an agent is earnest in his solicitations.

> Of actions eager, and intent of thought,
> The chiefs your honorable danger sought.
> Dryden's Ovid.

> On that prospect strange,
> Their earnest eyes they fixed; imagining,
> For one forbidden tree, a multitude
> Now risen, to work them further woe or shame.
> Milton.

Earnest. See Eager.

Earnest, Pledge.

These words are here compared as used in their figurative sense.

An earnest, like first-fruits, gives assurance that more is coming of the same kind; a pledge, like money deposited, affords security and ground of reliance for the future. Washington gave earnest of his talent as a commander by saving his troops after Braddock's defeat; his fortitude and that of his soldiers during the winter at Valley Forge, were a pledge of their ultimate triumph.

> Which leader shall the doubtful victory bless,
> And give an earnest of the war's success.
> Waller.

> That voice their liveliest pledge
> Of hope in fears and dangers. Milton.

Economy, Frugality, Parsimony.

Economy avoids all waste and extravagance, and applies money to the best advantage; frugality cuts off all indulgences, and proceeds on a system of rigid and habitual saving; parsimony is frugality carried to an extreme, involving meanness of spirit and a sordid mode of living. Economy is a virtue, and parsimony a vice. Frugality may lean to the one or the other, according to the motives from which it springs.

> I have no other notion of economy, than that it is the parent to liberty and ease.—Swift.

> The boundaries of virtues are indivisible lines: it is impossible to march up close to the frontiers of frugality, without entering the territories of parsimony. —Arbuthnot's John Bull.

Edict. See Law.

Education, Instruction, Teaching, Breeding.

Education (from educo) is properly to draw forth; and implies, not so much the communication of knowledge as the discipline of the intellect, the establishment of the principles, and the regulation of the heart.—Instruction (from instruo, to equip) is that part of education which furnishes the mind with knowledge.—Teaching is the same, being simply more familiar.—Breeding relates to the manners and outward conduct.

> "What," says Dr. Trench, "is education? is it a furnishing of a man from without with knowledge and facts and information? or is it a drawing forth from within and a training of the spirit of the true humanity which is latent within him? Is the process of education the filling of the child's mind, as a cistern is filled with water brought in buckets from some other source, or the opening up of its own fountains? It is to draw out, and not to put in. To draw out what is in the child, the immortal spirit which is there, this is the end of education; and so much the word declares. The putting in is indeed most needful, that is, the child must be instructed as well as educated, and the word instruction just means furnishing; but not instructed instead of educated. He must first have powers awakened in him, measures of spiritual value given him; and then he will know how to deal with the facts of this outward world: then instruction in these will profit him; but not without the higher training, still less as a substitute for it."—Study of Words.

Effect, Consequence, Result.

These words indicate things which arise out of some antecedent or follow as a consequent.

Effect (from efficio, to produce) is the strongest term, and denotes that which springs directly from something which can properly be termed a cause.—A consequence (from con and sequor, to follow) is more remote, not being strictly caused nor yet a mere sequence, but flowing out of and following something on which it truly depends.—A result (from re and sulto, to bound back) is still more remote and variable, like the rebound of an elastic body which falls in very different directions. A consequence may be compared to the track which follows in the wake of a ship and is occasioned by her motion. A result may be compared to the action produced on a ball when thrown against the side of a house. This will vary according to the force of the throw, the hardness of the wall, and the elasticity of the ball. We may foresee the effects of a measure, may conjecture its consequences, but can rarely discover its final results.

> The lightning is far off, yet soon as seen,
> We may behold the terrible effects
> That it produceth. MASSINGER.
>
> Shun the bitter consequence, for know,
> The day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt die.
> MILTON.
>
> Then of their session ended, they bid cry
> With trumpets' regal sound the grand result.
> MILTON.

EGOTISM, SELF-CONCEIT, VANITY.

Self-conceit is an overweening opinion of one's talents and capabilities; egotism is the acting out of self-conceit or self-importance in words and exterior conduct; vanity is inflation of mind arising from the idea of being thought highly of by others.

"A self-conceited man sees by intuition what another learns by experience and observation; he knows in a day what others want years to acquire; he learns of himself what others are contented to get by means of instruction."—"The egotistical man makes himself the darling theme of contemplation; he admires and loves himself to that degree that he can talk of nothing else."—"Vanity shows itself by its eagerness to catch the notice of others."—CRABB.

TO ELECT. See TO CHOOSE.

ELEGANCE, GRACE.

Elegance (from eligo, to choose out) implies something of a select style of beauty, which is usually produced by art, skill, or training; as, elegance of manners, composition, handwriting, &c.; elegant furniture, an elegant house, &c.—Grace, as the term is here used, refers to bodily movements, and is a lower order of beauty. It may be a natural gift; thus, the manners of a peasant-girl may be graceful, but can hardly be called elegant.

> These choicely culled, and elegantly arranged,
> Shall form a garland for Narcissa's tomb:
> A peradventure, of no fading flowers.
> YOUNG.
> Grace was in all her steps, heaven in her eye,
> In all her gestures dignity and love. MILTON.

TO EMBARRASS, PUZZLE, PERPLEX.

We are puzzled (from the root of pose, to bring to a stand) when our faculties are confused by something we do not understand.—We are perplexed (from per and plexus, entangled, as if tied up) when our feelings as well as judgment are so affected that we know not how to decide or act.—We are embarrassed (from Fr., embarras, a bar or restraint) when there is some bar or hinderance upon us which impedes our powers of thought, speech, or motion. A school-boy is puzzled by a difficult sum; a reasoner is perplexed by the subtleties of his opponent; a youth is sometimes so embarrassed by the presence of strangers, as to lose his presence of mind.

EMOTION, FEELING, AGITATION.

Feeling is the weaker term, and may be of the body or the mind.—Emotion is of the mind alone, being the excited action of some inward susceptibility or feeling; as, an emotion of pity, terror, &c.—Agitation may be bodily or mental, and usually arises in the latter case from a vehement struggle between contending desires or emotions. See PASSION.

"Agitations have but one character, viz., that of violence; emotions vary with the objects that awaken them. There are emotions either of tenderness or anger, either gentle or strong, either painful or pleasing."—CRABB.

EMULATION, COMPETITION, RIVALRY.

Competition (from cum and peto, to seek) is the struggle of two or more persons for the same object.—Emulation is an ardent desire for superiority arising from competition, but not implying, of necessity, any improper feeling.—Rivalry is a personal contest, and almost, of course, gives rise to envy, resentment, or detraction.

"Competition and emulation have honor for their basis; rivalry is but a desire for selfish gratification. Competition and emulation animate to effort; rivalry usually produces hatred. Competition and emulation seek to merit success; rivalry is contented with obtaining it."—CRABB.

ENCOMIUM. See EULOGY.

ENCOUNTER. See CONTEST.

ENDEAVOR. See ATTEMPT.

ENDEAVOR, EFFORT, EXERTION, STRUGGLE.

Endeavor is the widest term.—An effort (from e and fero, to put forth) is a vigorous endeavor or taxing of our powers on some special occasion.—An exertion (lit., straining) is a peculiarly earnest and prolonged effort.—A struggle is a violent and exhausting effort (lit., a twisting or contortion of the body.) "Ordinary endeavors will not now avail; every possible effort must be made; we must strain all our exertions, and struggle to the utmost."

"A tradesman uses his best endeavors to please his customers; a combatant makes desperate efforts to overcome his antagonist; a candidate for public honors uses great exertions to surpass his rivals."—CRABB.

ENMITY. See RANCOR.

ENORMOUS, IMMENSE, EXCESSIVE.

We speak of a thing as enormous (from e and norma, a rule) when it overpasses its ordinary law of existence, and becomes, so to speak, abnormal in its magnitude, degree, &c.; as, a man of enormous strength, a deed of enormous wickedness.—Immense and excessive are figurative terms used to intensify, and are somewhat indefinite in their degree of strength.

Enormous size, an enormous crime; an immense expenditure; excessive prodigality. "Complaisance becomes servitude when it is excessive."—ROCHEFOUCAULD.

ENTHUSIASM, FANATICISM.

Enthusiasm was formerly used for heat of imagination, especially in religion; but this sense is now more commonly confined to fanaticism, which denotes wild and extravagant notions on this subject, often leading to the most dangerous delusions. The term fanaticism is also sometimes extended to other subjects besides religion.

The enthusiasm of genius; enthusiastic attachment to the fine arts. The fanaticism of opposing religious sects. "Fanaticism is to superstition what rage is to anger."—VOLTAIRE.

EPITHET, TITLE.

The name epithet was formerly extended to nouns which give a title or describe character (as liar, &c.), but is now confined wholly to adjectives. Some rhetorical writers (as Whately) restrict it still further, considering the term epithet as belonging only to a limited class of adjectives, viz., those which add nothing to the sense of their noun, but simply hold forth some quality necessarily implied therein, as, the bright sun, the lofty heavens, &c. But neither Johnson, Richardson, nor Webster has imposed this restriction, which certainly does not prevail in general literature.

Epitome. See Abridgment.

Epoch, Era.

These two words have been greatly interchanged, but are now undergoing a separation which may thus be stated:

Epoch (from Gr. ἐπί and ἔχω, to hold or rest) denotes a resting place, or period in the progress of events, where some important occurrence takes place. Thus we speak of the Christian epoch, or period of Christ's coming into the world; we speak of the epoch of the Reformation, the epoch of maritime discovery, &c.—An era (of disputed derivation) is a point from which chronologers reckon their dates. It is usually (but not always) some epoch; as, the Christian era, the Mohammedan era, &c. Hence, era is applied in a secondary sense to those epochs which become the starting-points of subsequent events, though not of chronology. Thus, we speak of the era of the Reformation, when we think of it as opening the way for a new series of events; of the eras in geology, &c. Had we been thinking, simply, of the time at which these events took place, we should have called them epochs.

Equity. See Justice.

Equivocal, Ambiguous.

We call an expression ambiguous (from Gr. ἀμφί, around, and ἄγω, to lead) when it has one general meaning, and yet contains certain words which may be taken in two different senses; or certain clauses which can be so connected with other clauses, as to divide the mind between different views of part of the meaning intended.—We call an expression equivocal (from L. equa, and vox) when taken as a whole, it conveys a given thought with perfect clearness and propriety, and also another thought with equal propriety and clearness. Such were the responses often given by the Delphic oracle; as that to Crœsus when consulting about a war with Persia, "If you cross the Halys you will destroy a great empire." This he applied to the Persian empire which lay beyond that river; and having crossed, destroyed his own empire in the conflict. What is ambiguous is a mere blunder of language; what is equivocal is usually intended to deceive, though it may occur at times from mere inadvertence. Equivocation, however, is applied only to cases where there is a design to deceive.

Estimate, Estimation, Esteem.

The noun estimate, like its verb, supposes chiefly an exercise of judgment in determining the amount, importance, or magnitude of things, with their other exterior relations; as, an estimate of expenses incurred, a true estimate of life, &c.—Esteem (from estimo, to value) is a moral sentiment made up of respect and attachment—the valuation of a person as possessing useful qualities or real worth. Thus we speak of the esteem of the wise and good, as a thing greatly to be desired. Estimation seems to waver between the two. In our version of the Scriptures it is used simply for "estimate:" as, "if he be poorer in thy estimation."—Levit., xxvii. 8. In other cases, it verges toward esteem; as, "I know him to be of worth and worthy estimation."—Shak. It will probably settle down at last on this latter sense.

Esteem is the value we place upon some degree of worth. It is higher than simple approbation, which is a decision of judgment. It is the commencement of affection.—Cogan.

> No; dear as freedom is and in my heart's
> Just estimation prized above all price.
> Cowper.

To Estimate. See To Appreciate.

To Estimate, Esteem.

Both these words imply an exercise of the judgment.

Estimate has reference especially to the external relations of things, such as amount, magnitude, importance, &c. It usually involves computation or calculation; as, to estimate the loss or gain of an enterprise. Esteem (from estimo, to set a value on) has reference to the true character or standing of a thing—its intrinsic value or merits. Thus, we esteem it an honor to be inhabitants of a free country. When thus applied to things, it nearly coincides with consider, differing from the latter only as implying, that we value the thing in question. When applied to persons, esteem is used in a moral sense, and implies a mingled sentiment of respect and attachment. Thus, we esteem a man for his uniform integrity; we esteem a lawyer for his candor and fairness; we esteem a magistrate for his devotion to the public good. See also, To Appreciate.

Eternal. See Everlasting.

Eucharist. See Sacrament.

Eulogy, Encomium, Panegyric.

The idea of praise is common to all these words.

The word encomium is used as to both persons and things, and denotes warm praise. Eulogium and eulogy apply only to persons, and are more prolonged and studied. A panegyric (from Gr., full assembly) was originally a set speech in a full assembly of the people, and hence denotes a more formal eulogy, couched in terms of warm and continuous praise.

We may bestow encomiums on any work of art, or production of genius, without reference to the performer; we bestow eulogies, or pronounce a eulogium upon some individual distinguished for his merit or public services; we pronounce a panegyric either before an assembly, who are met for the occasion, or as the spontaneous expression of our feelings in our ordinary intercourse with others.

To Evade. See To Prevaricate.

Event, Occurrence, Incident, Circumstance.

An event (from e and venio, to come out of) denotes that which arises from a preceding state of things. Hence, we speak, of watching the event; of tracing the progress of events. It never stands insulated, but marks an effect or result.—An occurrence (from ob and curro, to strike upon) has no reference to any antecedents, but simply marks that which meets us in our progress through life, as if by chance, or in the course of divine providence. The things which thus meet us, if important, are usually connected with antecedents; and hence event is the leading term. In our Declaration of Independence, it is said, "When in the course of human events, it becomes necessary," &c. Here, "occurrences" would be out of place.—An incident (from in and cado, to fall in) is that which falls into a state of things to which it does not primarily belong; as, the incidents of a journey. The term is usually applied to things of secondary importance.—A circumstance is one of the circumstantia, or things surrounding us in our path of life. These may differ greatly in importance; but they are always outsiders which operate upon us from without, exerting greater or less influence according to their intrinsic importance.

A person giving an account of a campaign, might dwell on the leading events which it produced; might mention some of its striking occurrences; might allude to some remarkable incidents, which attended it; and might give the details of the favorable or adverse circumstances which marked its progress.

Everlasting, Eternal.

Eternal denotes that which has neither beginning nor end; everlasting is sometimes used in our version of the Scriptures in the sense of eternal; as, "Thou art from everlasting," but in modern usage, everlasting is confined to the future, and denotes that which is without end.

Whether we shall meet again I know not;
Therefore our everlasting farewell take:
Forever and forever, farewell, Cassius.
SHAKESPEARE.

EXAMPLE, INSTANCE.

This comparison relates to cases in which we give "instances" or "examples" of things.

An instance (from in and sto, to stand) denotes the single case then "standing" before us: if there be others like it, the word does not express this fact. On the contrary, an example (from exemplum) is one of an entire class of like things, and should be a true representative or sample of that class. Hence, an example proves a rule or regular course of things; an instance simply points out what may be true only in the case presented. A man's life may be filled up with examples of the self-command and kindness which marked his character; and may present only a solitary instance of haste or severity. Hence, the word "example" should never be used to describe what stands single and alone. We do, however, sometimes apply the word instance to what is really an example, because we are not thinking of the latter under this aspect, but solely as a case which "stands before us."

EXAMPLE. See PRECEDENT.

TO EXASPERATE. See TO IRRITATE.

EXCEPT, BUT.

Both these words are used in excluding, but with this difference, that except does it more pointedly. "I have finished all the letters except one," is more marked than "I have finished all the letters but one."

The same remarks apply to excepting, and with the exception of; as, "excepting a single case, nothing more remains to be attended to."

"With the exception of one individual, I have no complaint to make against the members of that family. See also UNLESS.

"People come into the world in Turkey the same way they do here; and yet, excepting the royal family, they get but little by it."—COLLIER.

TO EXCITE, INCITE.

When we excite (from ex and cito, to rouse) we rouse into action feelings which were less strong; when we incite (from in and cito, to rouse) we urge forward to acts correspondent to the feelings awakened. Demosthenes excited the passions of the Athenians against Philip, and thus incited the whole nation to unite in the war against him.

Antony by his speech over the body of Cæsar so excited the feelings of the populace, that Brutus and his companions were compelled to flee from Rome; many, however, were incited to join their standard not only by their love of liberty but their hopes of plunder.

TO EXPECT, THINK, BELIEVE.

Expect (from ex and specto, to look out for,) has always a reference to the future. It may be used either seriously or familiarly; as, a person expects to die, or he expects to survive, but in either case, it always has reference to a coming event.—Think and believe have reference to the past and present as well as to the future; as, "I think the mail has arrived," "I believe he is at home." We have, in this country, a very common use of expect which is a confusion of the two; as, "I expect the mail has arrived," "I expect he is at home." This blunder, which is far too common among even educated persons, ought to be studiously avoided by every one.

EXPLICIT, EXPRESS.

Explicit (from ex and plico, to unfold) denotes something which is set forth in the plainest language, so that it can not be misunderstood; as, an explicit promise.—Express (from exprimo, to form by pressure) is stronger than explicit: it adds force to clearness.

An express promise or engagement is not only unambiguous, but stands out (expressed) in bold relief, with the most binding hold on the conscience.

An explicit statement; a clear and explicit notion; explicit directions; no words can be more explicit. An express command, an express prohibition. FACILITY, EXPERTNESS, READINESS.

These words, as here compared, have in common the idea of performing any act with ease and promptitude.

Facility (from facilis, easy) supposes a natural or acquired power of dispatching a task with lightness and dexterity.—Expertness is facility acquired by long continued practice.—Readiness marks the promptitude with which any thing is done. A merchant needs great facility in dispatching business; a banker, great expertness in casting accounts; both need great readiness in passing from one employment to another.

The facility which we get of doing things, by a custom of doing, makes them often pass in us without our notice.—LOCKE.

The army was celebrated for the expertness and valor of the soldiers.

A readiness to obey the known will of God is the surest means to enlighten the mind in respect to duty.

FACT. See CIRCUMSTANCE.

FACTION. See CABAL.

FACTITIOUS, UNNATURAL.

A thing is unnatural when it departs in any way from its simple or normal state; it is factitious (from factito, to make or do frequently) when it is wrought out or wrought up by labor and effort; as, a factitious excitement. There is much that is unnatural in Europe, but far more that is factitious in America.

An unnatural demand for any article of merchandise is one which exceeds the ordinary rate of consumption; a factitious demand is one created by active exertions for the purpose. An unnatural alarm is one greater than the occasion requires; a factitious alarm is one wrought up with care and effort.

FALLACY, SOPHISTRY.

A fallacy is an argument which professes to be decisive, but in reality is not; sophistry is also false reasoning, but of so specious and subtle a kind as to render it difficult to expose its fallacy. Many fallacies are obvious, but the evil of sophistry lies in its consummate art.

"Men are apt to suffer their minds to be misled by fallacies which gratify their passions. Many persons have obscured and confounded the nature of things by their wretched sophistry: though an act be never so sinful, they will strip it of its guilt."—SOUTH.

Falsehood. See Falsity.

Falsity, Falsehood, Lie.

Falsity denotes the state or quality of being false. A falsehood is a false declaration designedly made. A lie is a gross, unblushing falsehood. It is a vulgar error to speak of "telling a falsity." It is an equal error to say, "I perceive the falsehood of your declaration or statement."

The falsity of a person's assertion may be proved by the evidence of others, and thus the charge of falsehood be fastened upon im.

Can you on him such falsities obtrude?
And as a mortal the most wise delude?
SANDYS.

Famous, Renowned, Illustrious.

Famous (from fama, fame) is applied to a person or thing widely spoken of as extraordinary; renowned (from Fr., re, again, and nommer, to name) is applied to those who are named again and again with honor; illustrious, to those who have dazzled the world by the splendor of their deeds or their virtues. Napoleon was famous; Alexander was renowned; Washington was illustrious.

Henry the Fifth too famous to live long.

Fanciful, Fantastical, Visionary.

We speak of that as fanciful which is irregular in taste and judgment; we speak of it as fantastical (from fantasy) when it violates all propriety as well as regularity; we speak of it as visionary, when it is wholly unfounded in the nature of things.

Fanciful notions are the product of a heated fancy, without any support in reason or truth; fantastical schemes or systems are made up of oddly-assorted fancies, often of the most whimsical kind; visionary expectations are those which can never be realized in fact.

Fancy. See Imagination.

Fantastical. See Fanciful.

Fastidious, Squeamish.

We call a person fastidious (from fastus, pride) when his taste or feelings are offended by trifling defects or errors; we call him squeamish (i. e. qualmish, having a stomach that is easily turned) when he is excessively nice or critical on minor points, and also when he is over-scrupulous as to questions of duty.

Whoever examines his own imperfections will cease to be fastidious; whoever restrains his caprice and scrupulosity will cease to be squeamish.—CRABB.

To Fatigue. See To Jade.

Fault, Failing, Foible.

A fault is positive, something definite and marked which impairs excellence; a failing is negative, some weakness or falling short in a man's character, disposition or habits; a foible is a less important weakness, which we overlook or smile at. A man may have many failings, and yet commit but few faults; or his faults and failings may be few, while his foibles are obvious to all.

I have failings in common with every human being, besides my own peculiar faults: but of avarice I have generally held myself guiltless. FOX.

Feast, Banquet, Festival, Carousal.

A feast sets before us viands superior in quantity, variety, and abundance; a banquet is a luxurious feast; a festival is the joyful celebration by good cheer of some agreeable event. A feast which was designed to be a festival, may be changed into a banquet. Carousal is unrestrained indulgence in frolic and wine.

Female, Feminine.

We apply female to the sex, as opposed to male; and feminine to the characteristics of the sex, as opposed to masculine. Hence we speak of the female character, dress, habits, manners, &c.; and of feminine pursuits, employments, &c. In a female school, feminine accomplishments should be particularly taught.

Once more her haughty soul the tyrant bends,
To prayers and mean submissions she descends;
No female arts or aids she left untried,
Nor counsels unexplored, before she died. DRYDEN.

Her graceful innocence. MILTON.

Ferocious, Fierce, Savage, Barbarous.

When these words are applied to human feelings or conduct, ferocious describes the disposition; fierce, the haste and violence of an act; barbarous, the coarseness and brutality by which it was marked; savage, the cruel and unfeeling spirit which it showed. A man is ferocious in his temper, fierce in his actions, barbarous in the manner of carrying out his purposes, savage in the spirit and feelings expressed in his words or deeds.

Fertile, Fruitful.

Fertile implies the inherent power of production; fruitful, the act. The prairies of the West are fertile by nature, and will soon be turned by cultivation into a fruitful field. The same distinction prevails when these words are used figuratively. A man of fertile genius has by nature great readiness of invention; one whose mind is fruitful has resources of thought and a readiness of application which enable him to think and act to effect.

Thy very weeds are beautiful, thy waste
More rich than other climes' fertility.
BYRON, of Italy.

Adonis's gardens,
That one day bloomed, and fruitful were the next.
SHAKESPEARE.

Fervor, Ardor.

Fervor (from ferveo) is a boiling heat; and ardor (from ardeo) is a burning heat. Hence, in metaphor, we commonly use fervor and its derivatives when we conceive of thoughts or emotions under the image of ebullition, or as pouring themselves forth. Thus we speak of the fervor of passion, fervid declamation, fervid importunity, fervent supplication, fervent desires, &c.—Ardent is used when we think of any thing as springing from a deep-seated glow of soul; as, ardent friendship, ardent zeal, ardent devotedness. "Burning with ardor for the fight." Hence Milton's application of this term to angels:

Nor delayed the winged saint,
After his charge received; but, from among Thousand celestial ardors, where he stood
Veil'd with his gorgeous wings' upspreading light,
Flew through the midst of heaven.

Festival. See Feast.

Fiction, Fabrication.

Fiction is opposed to what is real; fabrication to what is true. Fiction is designed commonly to amuse, and sometimes to instruct; a fabrication is always intended to mislead and deceive. In the novels of Walter Scott we have fiction of the highest order. The poems of Ossian, as published by Mackenzie, were chiefly fabrications.

Fierce. See Ferocious.

Fight. See Battle.

Filthy. See Nasty.

Final, Conclusive, Ultimate.

Final (finis) is now appropriated to that which brings with it an end; as, a final adjustment, the final judgment, &c.—Conclusive (lit., shutting up) implies the closing of all future discussion, negotiation, &c.; as, a conclusive argument or fact, a conclusive arrangement.—In using ultimate, we have always reference to something earlier or preceding; as when we say, a temporary reverse may lead to an ultimate triumph. The statements which a man finally makes at the close of a negotiation, are usually conclusive as to his ultimate intentions and designs.

Fine, Beautiful.

When used as a word of praise, fine (being opposed to coarse) denotes no "ordinary thing of its kind." It is not as strong as beautiful, in reference to the single attribute implied in the latter term; but when we speak of a fine woman, we embrace a greater variety of parulars: viz., all the qualities which become a woman—breeding, sentiment, tact, &c. The term is equally comprehensive when we speak of a fine garden, landscape, horse, poem, &c., and though applied to a great variety of objects, the word has still a very definite sense, denoting a high degree of characteristic excellence, though not the very highest. Americans are considered by the English as overdoing in the use of this word We call a thing fine, when the English, according to their present usage, would call it nice.

Finical, Spruce, Foppish.

These words are applied to persons who are studiously desirous to cultivate finery of appearance.

One who is spruce is elaborately nice in dress; one who is finical shows his affectation in language and manner as well as dress; one who is foppish seeks to distinguish himself by the cut of his clothes, the tawdriness of his ornaments, and the ostentation of his manner.

"A finical gentleman clips his words and screws his body into as small a compass as possible, to give himself the air of a delicate person; a spruce gentleman strives not to have a fold wrong in his frill or cravat, nor a hair of his head to lie amiss; a foppish gentleman seeks, by extravagance in the cut of his clothes, and by the tawdriness in their ornaments, to render himself distinguished for finery."—Crabb.

Firmness, Constancy.

Firmness belongs to the will, and constancy to the affections and principles; the former prevents us from yielding, and the latter from fluctuating. Without firmness a man has no character; "without constancy," says Addison, "there is neither love, friendship, nor virtue in the world."

Still with thy firmness steel my breast.—Blacklock.

In this small isle, amidst the widest seas,
Triumphant constancy has fixed her seat. Prior.

To Fix, Arrange, or Put in order.

Fix denotes to set firmly; as, to fix the eye on some one; his teeth were fixed; and hence arises the vulgarism to be in a "fix" or a "bad fix." It is a gross, but prevailing error in our country, to give this word the sense of arrange or to put in order; as, to fix a clock, to fix the fire, to fix one's hair, to fix up, &c. Nothing strikes a visitor from England so ludicrously as the perpetual recurrence of such phrases; and unless we are ready to go the whole length of "chicken fixings," we should banish all such expressions from good society, and use the word only in its true sense as given above.

To Fluctuate, Vacillate, Waver.

Fluctuate (from fluctus, a wave) is applied both to things and persons, and denotes that they move as they are acted upon. The stocks fluctuate; a man fluctuates between conflicting influences.—Vacillate (from vacillo, to sway to and fro) and waver apply only to persons, and represent them as acting themselves. A man vacillates when he goes backward and forward in his opinions and purposes, without any fixity of mind or principles. A man wavers when he shrinks back or hesitates at the approach of difficulty or danger.

One who is fluctuating in his feelings is usually vacillating in resolve, and wavering in execution.

Foible. See Fault.

To Follow (v. t.), Pursue.

To follow (v. t.) denotes simply to go after; to pursue denotes to follow with earnestness, and with a view to attain some definite object; as, a hound pursues the deer. So a person follows a companion whom he wishes to overtake on a journey; the officers of justice pursue a felon who has escaped from prison.

What could I do
But follow strict invisibly thus led? Milton.

Impelled with steps unceasing to pursue
Some fleeting good, that mocks me with the view;
That like the circle bounding earth and skies,
Allures from far, yet as I follow flies.
Goldsmith.

To Follow (v. i.), Succeed, Ensue.

To follow (v. i.) means simply to come after, as a crowd followed; to succeed means to come after in some regular series or succession, as day succeeds to day, and night to night. To ensue means to follow by some established connection or principle of sequence. As wave follows wave, revolution succeeds to revolution; and nothing ensues but accumulated wretchedness.

Force, Strength.

Strength (from strain) looks rather to power as an inward capability or energy. Thus we speak of the strength of timber, bodily strength, mental strength, strength of emotion, &c. Force, on the other hand, looks more to the outward; as, the force of momentum, force of circumstances, force of habit, &c. We do, indeed, speak of strength of will and force of will; but even here the former may lean toward the internal tenacity of purpose, and the latter toward the outward expression of it in action. But, though the two words do in a few cases touch thus closely on each other, there is, on the whole, a marked distinction between our use of force and strength.

Force is the name given in mechanical science to whatever produces or can produce motion.—Nichol.

Thy tears are of no force
To mollify this flinty man. Hayward.

More huge in strength than wise in works he was.
Spenser.

Adam and first matron Eve
Had ended now their orisons and found
Strength added from above, new hope to spring
Out of despair. Milton.

Forgetfulness, Oblivion.

Forgetfulness is Saxon, and oblivion is Latin. The former has reference to persons and marks a state of mind; the latter has reference to things, and indicates a condition into which they are sunk. We blame a man for his forgetfulness; we speak of some old custom as buried in oblivion. The expressions could not be interchanged. We can not speak of men as characterized by oblivion; nor do we usually speak of things as buried in forgetfulness; or if we do it is in reference to the persons who forget, and not to the state of being forgotten.

And steep my senses in forgetfulness.
Shakespeare.

And blind oblivion swallowed cities up.
Shakespeare.

The swallowing gulf
Of dark forgetfulness and deep oblivion.
Shakespeare.

Forgiveness, Pardon.

Forgiveness is Saxon, and pardon Norman, both denoting to give back. The word pardon being early used in our Bible, has, in religious matters, the same sense as forgiveness; but in the language of common life there is a difference between them, such as we often find between corresponding Saxon and Norman words. Forgive points to inward feeling, and supposes alienated affection; when we ask forgiveness, we primarily seek the removal of anger. Pardon looks more to outward things or consequences, and is often applied to trifling matters, as when we beg pardon for interrupting a man or for jostling him in a crowd. The civil magistrate also grants a pardon, and not forgiveness. The two words are, therefore, very clearly distinguished from each other, in most cases which relate to the common concerns of life.

Exchange forgiveness with me, noble Hamlet;
Mine and my father's death come not upon thee,
Nor thine on me. Shakespeare.

What better can we do than prostrate fall
Before him reverent, and there confess
Humbly our faults, and pardon beg; with tears
Watering the ground? Milton

Formal, Ceremonious.

When applied to things, these words usually denote a mere accordance with the rules of form or ceremony; as, to make a formal call, to take a ceremonious leave. When applied to a person or his manners, they are used in a bad sense; a person being called formal who shapes himself too much by some pattern or set form, and ceremonious when he lays too much stress on the conventional laws of social intercourse. Formal manners render a man stiff or ridiculous; a ceremonious carriage puts a stop to the ease and freedom of social intercourse.

Formal in apparel,
In gait and countenance surely like a father.
Shakespeare.

You are too senseless obstinate, my lord;
Too ceremonious and traditional.
Shakespeare.

To Forsake. See To Abandon.

To Forswear. See To Perjure.

Fortification. See Fortress.

Fortitude. See Courage.

Fortress, Fortification, Castle, Citadel.

A fortress is constructed for military purposes only, and is permanently garrisoned; a fortification is built to defend harbors, cities, &c.; a castle is a fortress of early times which was ordinarily a palatial dwelling; a citadel is the stronghold of a fortress or city, &c.

The castle of Macduff I will surprise.
Shakespeare.

I'll to my charge, the citadel, repair.
Dryden.

God is our fortress, in whose conquering name
Let us resolve to scale their flinty bulwarks.
Shakespeare.

Fortuitous. See Accidental.

Fortunate, Successful, Prosperous.

A man is fortunate when (so to speak) he is favored of fortune, and has unusual blessings fall to his lot; successful when he gains what he aims at; prosperous when he succeeds in those things which men commonly desire. One may be fortunate in some cases where he is not successful; he may be successful, but, if his plans are badly formed, he may for that reason fail to be prosperous.

No, there is a necessity in fate,
Why still the brave bold man is fortunate.
Dryden.

He observed the illustrious throng,
Their names, their fates, their conduct, and their care,
In peaceful senate and successful war. Dryden.

We now return
To claim our just inheritance of old,
Surer to prosper than prosperity
Could have assured us. Milton.

Foul. See Nasty.

To Found. See To Predicate.

Fracture, Rupture.

These words denote different kinds of breaking, according to the objects to which they are applied.

Fracture (from frango) is applied to hard substances; as, the fracture of a bone. Rupture (from rumpo) is applied to soft substances; as, the rupture of a blood-vessel. The same distinction applies to the words when used in a figurative or secondary sense; as, "To be an enemy and once to have been a friend, does it not embitter the rupture?"—South.

And o'er the high-piled hills of fractured earth,
Wide dashed the waves. Thomson.

Frank. See Ingenuous.

Fraud. See Deception.

Freak. See Whim.

Freedom. See Liberty.

Freethinker. See Infidel.

Frenzy. See Insanity..

Fretful, Peevish, Cross.

These words all indicate an unamiable working and expression of temper.

Peevish marks more especially the inward spirit; a peevish man is always ready to find fault.—Fretful points rather to the outward act, and marks a complaining impatience; sickly children are apt to be fretful.—Crossness is peevishness mingled with vexation or anger.

She is peevish, sullen, froward,
Proud, disobedient, stubborn, lacking duty.
Shakespeare.

Are you positive and fretful?
Heedless, ignorant, forgetful? Swift.

The lighter sort of malignity turneth but to a crossness or aptness to oppose; but the deeper sort, to envy or mere mischief. Bacon.

Friendly. See Amicable.

Fright. See Alarm.

Frightful, Dreadful, Awful.

These words all express fear. In frightful it is a sudden emotion; in dreadful it is deeper and more prolonged; in awful the fear is mingled with the emotion of awe, which subdues us before the presence of some invisible power. An accident may be frightful; the approach of death is dreadful to most men; the convulsions of the earthquake are awful.

Death was denounced; that frightful sound
Which even the best can hardly bear. Dryden.

The rigid interdiction which resounds
Yet dreadful in mine ear. Milton.

Nor have feared
Thy awful brow, more awful thus retired,
Fairest resemblance of thy Maker fair! Milton.

Froward. See Perverse.

Frugality. See Economy.

Fruitful. See Fertile.

Fruitless. See Useless.

To Frustrate. See To Baffle.

Fury. See Anger.

G.

To Gain, Win.

Gain implies only that we get something by exertion; win that we do it in competition with others. A person gains knowledge or gains a prize simply by striving for it; he wins a victory or wins a prize by taking it from others in a struggle between them.

Compute the gains of this ungoverned zeal,
Ill suits his cloth the praise of railing well.
Dryden.

Loyalty is still the same,
Whether it win or lose the game:
True as the dial to the sun,
Although it be not shined upon. Hudibras.

To Gain. See To Obtain.

Gallant, Courageous, Brave.

Courageous is generic, denoting an inward spirit (cor) which rises above fear; brave is more outward, marking a spirit which braves or defies danger; gallant rises still higher, denoting bravery on extraordinary occasions in a spirit of adventure. A courageous man is ready for battle; a brave man courts it; a gallant man dashes into the midst of the conflict.

The king-becoming graces,
Devotion, patience, courage, fortitude,
Shakespeare.

With firm resolve my steady bosom steel,
Bravely to suffer though I deeply feel.
Churchill.

The gallant man, though slain in fight he be,
Yet leaves his nation safe, his children free.
Pope.

Gallantry. See Courage, also Heroism.

To Gape. See To Gaze.

Garrulous, Talkative, Loquacious.

A garrulous person (from garrio, to prate) indulges in long, prosy talk, with frequent repititions and lengthened details.—Talkative implies simply a great desire to talk; and loquacious (from loquor, to talk) a great flow of words at command. A child is talkative; a lively woman is loquacious; an old man in his dotage is garrulous.

Every absurdity has a champion to defend it; for Error is always talkative. Goldsmith.

Thersites only clamored in the throng,
Loquacious, loud, and turbulent of tongue. Pope.

Pleased with that social, sweet garrulity,
The poor disbanded vet'ran's sole delight.
Somerville.

Gayety. See Liveliness.

To Gaze, Gape, Stare.

To gaze is to look with fixed and prolonged attention, awakened by excited interest or elevated emotion; to gape is to look fixedly with feelings of ignorant wonder; to stare (lit., strain the eyes) is to look with the fixedness of insolence or of idiocy. The lover of nature gazes with delight on the beauties of the landscape; the rustic gapes with wonder at the strange sights of a large city; the idiot stares on those around with a vacant look.

So checking his desire with trembling heart,
Gazing he stood, nor would nor could depart.
Dryden.

Studying his looks and watching at the board,
He gapes to catch the droppings of my lord.
Pitt.

But fixing on the maid his horrid eye,
He stares and shakes, and finds it vain to fly.
Dryden.

General, Common, Universal.

Common (from communis) denotes primarily that in which many share; and hence, that which is often met with.—General is stronger, denoting that it pertains to a majority of the individuals which compose a genus or whole.—Universal, that it pertains to all without exception. To be able to read and write is so common an attainment in this country that we may pronounce it general, though by no means universal.

Generosity. See Magnanimity.

Generous. See Liberal.

Genius, Talent.

Genius (lit., born with us) implies high and peculiar gifts of nature impelling the mind to certain favorite kinds of mental effort, and producing new combinations of ideas, imagery, &c.—Talent supposes general strength of intellect, with a peculiar aptitude for being molded and directed to specific employments, and valuable ends and purposes. Hence, according to Crabb, the name talent, the highest measure among the Greeks, for the value of money. Genius is connected more or less with the exercise of imagination, and reaches its ends by a kind of intuitive power. Talent depends more on high mental training and a perfect command of all the faculties, memory, judgment, sagacity, &c. Hence we speak of a genius for poetry, painting, &c., and a talent for business or diplomacy. Among English orators, Lord Chatham was distinguished for his genius; William Pitt for his preëminent talents, and especially his unrivaled talent for reply.

Gentile. See Pagan.

Gentle, Tame, Mild, Meek.

Gentle describes the natural disposition; tame, that which is subdued by training; mild implies a temper which is, by nature, not easily provoked; meek, a spirit which has been schooled to mildness by discipline or suffering. The lamb is gentle; the domestic fowl is tame; John the Apostle was mild; Moses was meek.

Her voice was ever soft,
Gentle and low; an excellent thing in woman.
Shakespeare.

A most poor man made tame to fortune's blows.
Shakespeare.

If that mild and gentle God thou be,
Who dost mankind below with pity see. Dryden.

Humbly their faults, and pardon begged, with tears
Watering the ground, and with their sighs the air
Frequenting, sent from hearts contrite in sign
Of sorrow unfeigned, and humiliation meek.
Milton.

Genuine. See Authentic.

To Get. See To Obtain.

Gift, Present, Donation.

These words, as here compared, denote something gratuitously imparted to another out of one's property.

A gift is usually from one who is in some respects a superior, and is designed for the relief or benefit of him who receives it.—A present (Low Lat. presento) is ordinarily from an equal or inferior, and is always intended as a compliment or expression of kindness.—Donation (from L. dono, to give) is a word of more dignity, denoting, properly, a gift of considerable value, and ordinarily a gift made either to some public institution, or to an individual on account of his services to the public; as, a donation to a college, a hospital or a charitable society.

But oh! thou bounteous Giver of all good,
Thou art of all thy gifts thyself the crown.
Cowper.

Say, heavenly muse, shall not thy sacred vein
Afford a present to the infant God. Milton.

To Give, Confer, Grant.

To give is the generic word, embracing all the rest.—To confer was originally used of persons in power, who gave permanent grants or privileges; as, to confer the order of knighthood; and hence it still denotes the giving of something which might have been withheld; as, to confer a favor.—To grant is to give in answer to a petition or request, or to one who is in some way dependent or inferior.

Glad, Delighted, Gratified.

Delighted expresses a much higher degree of pleasure than glad.—Gratified always refers to a pleasure conferred by some human agent, and the feeling is modified by the consideration that we owe it in part to another. A person may be glad or delighted to see a friend, and gratified at the attention shown by his visits.

Glad of a quarrel, strait I clap the door:
Sir, let me see you and your works no more.
Pope.

So on they fared delighted still to join
In mutual converse. Milton.

To Gleam, Glimmer, Glitter.

To gleam denotes a faint but distinct emission of light.—To glimmer describes an indistinct and unsteady light.—To glitter, a brightness that is intense, but varying. The morning light gleams upon the earth; a distant taper glimmers through the mist; a dew-drop glitters in the sun.

At last a gleam
Of dawning light turned thitherward in haste
His traveled steps. Milton.

And from the walls of heaven
Shoots far into the bosom of dim night
A glimmering dawn. Milton.

Yet oft before his infant eyes would run
Such forms as glitter in the muse's ray. Gray.

To Glimmer. See To Gleam.

To Glitter. See To Gleam.

Globe, Sphere, Orb, Ball.

Globe denotes a round, and usually a solid body; sphere is the term applied in astronomy to such a body, and hence to the circuit of such bodies in the heavens; orb is used, especially in poetry, for globe or sphere, and also (contracted from orbit) for the pathway of a heavenly body; ball in this connection, is applied to the heavenly bodies, conceived of as thrown or impelled through space.

Thus, roaming with adventurous wing the globe,
From scene to scene excursive.—Mallet.

Kindly, perhaps, He now afflicts us here,
To guide our views to a sublimer sphere.
Jenyns.

Thousands of suns beyond each other blaze,
Orbs roll o'er orbs, and glow with mutual rays.
Jenyns.

Gloom. See Darkness.

Gloomy. See Moody.

Good-natured, Good-tempered, Good-humored.

Good-natured denotes a disposition to please and be pleased. Good-tempered a habit of mind which is not easily ruffled by provocations or other disturbing influences. Good-humored is applied to a spirit full of ease and cheerfulness, as displayed in one's outward deportment and in social intercourse.

A good-natured man recommends himself to all by the spirit which governs him. A good-humored man recommends himself particularly as a companion; a good-tempered man is rarely betrayed into anything which can disturb the serenity of the social circle.

Grace. See Elegance.

Grace, Mercy.

These words, though often interchanged, have a distinctive and peculiar meaning which belongs to each.

Grace, in the strict sense of the term, is spontaneous favor to the guilty or undeserving; mercy is kindness or compassion to the suffering or condemned. It was the grace of God that opened a way for the exercise of mercy toward men.

Oh! momentary grace of mortal men,
Which we more hunt for than the grace of God.
SHAKESPEARE.

But infinite in pardon was my Judge,
That I who first brought death on all, and graced
The source of life. MILTON.

The quality of mercy is not strained;
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven,
Upon the place beneath. It is twice blessed;
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes.
SHAKESPEARE.

Grand, Magnificent, Sublime.

Grand, in reference to objects of taste, is applied to that which expands the mind by a sense of vastness and majesty: magnificent is applied to any thing which is imposing from its splendor; sublime describes that which is awful and elevating. A cataract is grand; a rich and varied landscape is magnificent; an overhanging precipice is sublime.

"Grandeur admits of degrees and modifications; but magnificence is that which has already reached the highest degree of superiority naturally belonging to the object in question."—CRABB.

Grandeur. See Sublimity.

To Grant. See To Give.

Gratified. See Glad.

To Gratify, Indulge, Humor.

Gratify is the generic term, and has reference simply to the pleasure communicated. To indulge a person, implies that we concede something to his wishes or his weaknesses which he could not claim, and which had better, perhaps, have been spared. To humor is to adapt ourselves to the varying moods, and, perhaps, caprices of others. We gratify a child by showing him the sights of a large city; we indulge him in some extra expense on such an occasion; we humor him if he is taken ill when away from home.

Grave, Sober, Serious, Solemn.

Sober supposes the absence of all exhilaration of spirits, and is opposed to flighty; as, sober thought. Serious implies considerateness or reflection, and is opposed to jocose or sportive; as, serious and important concerns. Grave denotes a state of mind, appearance, &c., which results from the pressure of weighty interests, and is opposed to hilarity of feeling or vivacity of manner; as, a grave remark; grave attire. Solemn is applied to a case in which gravity is carried to its highest point; as, a solemn admonition, a solemn promise.

The sober follies of the wise and great. POPE.

There's nothing serious in mortality;
All is but toys. SHAKESPEARE.

Youth on silent wings is flown;
Graver years come rolling on. PRIOR.

There reigned a solemn silence over all.
SPENSER.

Greatly. See Badly.

Greeting. See Salutation.

Grief. See Affliction.

Grief, Sorrow, Sadness.

Sorrow is the generic term; grief is sorrow for some definite cause—one which commenced, at least, in the past; sadness is applied to a permanent mood of the mind. Sorrow is transient in many cases; but the grief of a mother for the loss of a favorite child too often turns into habitual sadness.

"Grief is sometimes considered as synonymous with sorrow; and in this case we speak of the transports of grief. At other times it expresses more silent, deep, and painful affections, such as are inspired by domestic calamities; particularly by the loss of friends and relatives; or by the distress, either of body or mind, experienced by those whom we love and value."—COGAN.

To Grow. See To Become.

To Grow. See To Raise.

To Guess, Think, Reckon.

Guess is lit., to cast or cast forward in one's mind. Hence, it denotes to attempt to hit upon at random; as, to guess at a thing when blindfolded; to conjecture or form an opinion on hidden or very slight grounds; as, to guess a riddle, to guess out the meaning of an obscure passage. It is a gross vulgarism to use the word guess, not in its true and specific sense, but simply for think or believe; as, "I guess the mail has arrived;" "I guess he is at home." It is equally vulgar to use reckon in the same way; as, "I reckon the mail has arrived;" "I reckon he is at home." These words are the shibboleth of the North and the South in this country. It would be better for each (in order to avoid so gross a vulgarism) to drop entirely its peculiar and abused term, substituting therefore some such word as think, believe, imagine, fancy, &c.

Grudge. See Pique.

H.

Habit, Custom.

Habit is an internal principle which leads us to do easily, naturally, and with growing certainty, what we do often; custom is external, being habitual use or the frequent repetition of the same act. The two operate reciprocally on each other. The custom of giving produces a habit of liberality; habits of devotion promote the custom of going to church. Custom also supposes an act of the will, selecting given modes of procedure; habit is a law of our being, a kind of "second nature" which grows up within us.

Upheld by old repute
Consent or custom. MILTON.

How use doth breed a habit in a man.
SHAKESPEARE.

Hall. See Vestibule.

Hamlet. See Village.

Hand, At hand, On hand.

We speak of a person being at hand, i. e., near by and thus virtually present. We speak also of a merchant's having goods on hand. Some persons confound the two, and speak of being "on hand" at a given time or place, meaning present. This confusion of things so entirely dissimilar, "smells of the shop."

Handsome, Pretty.

Pretty applies to things comparatively small, which please by their delicacy and grace; as, a pretty girl, a pretty flower, a pretty cottage. —Handsome rises higher, and is applied to objects on a larger scale. We admire what is handsome, we are pleased with what is pretty. The word is supposed to be connected with hand; and thus to have acquired the idea of training, cultivation, symmetry, and proportion which enters so largely into our conception of handsome. Thus Drayton makes mention of handsome players, meaning those who are well trained; and hence we speak of a man's having a handsome address, which is the result of culture; of a handsome horse or dog, which implies well proportioned limbs; of a handsome face to which (among other qualities) the idea of proportion and a graceful contour are essential; of a handsome tree, and a handsome house or villa. So, from this idea of proportion or suitableness, we have in a different connection the expressions, a handsome fortune, a handsome offer.

Happiness, Felicity, Blessedness, Bliss.

Happiness is generic, and is applied to almost every kind of enjoyment except that of the animal appetites; felicity is a more formal word, and is used more sparingly in the same general sense, but with elevated associations; blessedness is applied to the most refined enjoyment arising from the purest social, benevolent, and religious affections; bliss denotes still more exalted delight, and is applied more appropriately to the joy anticipated in heaven.

Oh happiness, our being's end and aim. POPE.

Others in virtue place felicity;
But virtue joined with riches and long life,
In corporal pleasures he, and careless ease.
MILTON.

His overthrow heaped happiness upon him;
For then and not till then he felt himself,
And found the blessedness of being little.
SHAKESPEARE.

Dim sadness did not spare
That time celestial visages; yet mixed
With pity, violated not their bliss. MILTON.

HARANGUE, SPEECH, ORATION.

Speech is generic; an oration is an elaborate and prepared speech; a harangue is a vehement appeal to the passions, or a noisy, disputatious address. A general makes a harangue to his troops on the eve of a battle; a demagogue harangues the populace on the subject of their wrongs.

Gray-haired men, and grave with warriors mixed
Assemble, and harangues are heard, but soon,
In factious opposition. MILTON.

HARD. See ARDUOUS, also SOLID.

HARDENED. See OBDURATE.

HARM. See MISCHIEF.

HARMONY, MELODY.

Harmony results from the concord of two or more musical strains which differ in pitch and quality; the term may also be applied to sounds which are not musical. Melody denotes the pleasing alternation and variety of musical and measured sounds, as they succeed each other in a single verse or strain.

The harmony of things,
As well as that of sounds, from discord springs.
DENHAM.

Lend me your songs, ye nightingales: Oh pour
The mazy running soul of melody
Into my varied verse! THOMSON.

HARSHNESS. See ACRIMONY.

HASTE, HURRY, SPEECH, DISPATCH.

Haste denotes quickness of action and a strong desire (lit., heat) for getting on; hurry (connected with curro, to run) includes a confusion and want of collected thought not implied in haste; speed denotes the actual progress which is made; dispatch, the promptitude and rapidity with which things are done. A man may properly be in haste, but never in a hurry. Speed usually secures dispatch.

Our lines reformed and not composed in haste,
Polished like marble, would like marble last.
WALLER.

For whom all this haste
Of midnight march, and hurried meeting here.
MILTON.

Speed! to describe whose swiftness number fails.
MILTON.

So saying, with dispatchful looks in haste
She turns, on hospitable thoughts intent.
MILTON.

TO HATE, ABHOR, DETEST, ABOMINATE, LOATHE.

Hate (connected with heat) is the generic word, and implies that one is inflamed with extreme dislike. We abhor (from ab and horeo, to shudder at) what is deeply repugnant to our sensibilities or feelings. We detest (from de and testor, to bear witness against) what contradicts so utterly our principles and moral sentiments that we feel bound (as it were) to lift up our voice against it. What we abominate (from ab and omen) does equal violence to our moral and religious sentiments. What we loathe (lit., regard with nausea) is offensive to our own nature and excites unmingled disgust.

Our Saviour is said to have hated the deeds of the Nicolaitanes; his language shows that he loathed the lukewarmness of the Laodiceans; he detested the hypocrisy of the Scribes and Pharisees; he abhorred the suggestions of the tempter in the wilderness.

HATRED. See ODIUM.

HAUGHTINESS, ARROGANCE, DISDAIN.

Haughtiness (from Fr. haut, high) denotes the expression of conscious and proud superiority; arrogance (from ad and rogo, to make claim) is a disposition to claim for one's self more than is justly due, and enforce it to the utmost; disdain (from dedignor, to reject as unworthy) is the exact reverse of condescension toward inferiors, since it expresses and desires others to feel how far below ourselves we consider them. A person is haughty in disposition and demeanor; arrogant in his claims of homage and deference; disdainful even in accepting the deference which his haughtiness leads him arrogantly to exact.

TO HAVE. See TO POSSESS.

HAZARD. See DANGER.

TO HEARKEN. See TO ATTEND.

HEARTY, CORDIAL, SINCERE.

Hearty implies honesty and simplicity of feelings and manners; cordial (from cor, the heart) refers to the warmth and liveliness with which the feelings are expressed; sincere (lit., without mixture) implies that this expression corresponds to the real sentiments of the heart. A man should be hearty in his attachment to his friends, cordial in his reception of them to his house, and sincere in his offers to assist them.

But the kind hosts their entertainment grace,
With hearty welcome and an open face;
In all they did you might discern with ease,
A willing mind and a desire to please. DRYDEN.

He with looks of cordial love,
Hung over her enamored. MILTON.

Pardon my tears, 'tis joy which bids them flow,
A joy which never was sincere till now.
DRYDEN.

HEATHEN. See PAGAN.

TO HELP, AID, ASSIST.

These words all agree in the idea of affording relief or support to a person under difficulties.

Help turns attention especially to the source of relief. If I fall into a pit, I call for "help;" and he who helps me out, does it by an act of his own.—Aid turns attention to the other side, and supposes co-operation on the part of him who is relieved; as, "he aided me in getting out of the pit;" "I got out by the aid of a ladder which he brought me."—Assist (from ad and sto, to stand by) has a primary reference to relief afforded by a person, who "stands by" in order to relieve. It denotes both help and aid. Thus, we say of a person who is weak, "I assisted him up-stairs," or "he mounted the stairs by my assistance." When we say, "he mounted by the assistance of his staff," the word "staff" is used figuratively.

When help is used as a noun, it points less distinctively and exclusively to the source of relief, or in other words agrees more closely with aid. Thus, we say, "I got out of a pit by the help of my friend."

HERETIC, SCHISMATIC, SECTARIAN.

A heretic is one whose errors are doctrinal, and usually of a malignant character, tending to subvert the true faith. A schismatic is one who creates a schism or division in the church on points of faith, discipline, practice, &c., usually for the sake of personal aggrandizement. A sectarian is one who originates or promotes a sect or distinct organization which separates from the main body of believers. Hence the expression, "a sectarian spirit," has a slightly bad sense, which does not attach to "denominational."

HEROISM, COURAGE, FORTITUDE, BRAVERY, VALOR, INTREPIDITY, GALLANTRY.

Courage is generic, denoting fearlessness of danger; fortitude is passive courage, the habit of bearing up nobly under trials, dangers, and sufferings; bravery and valor are courage in battle or other conflicts with living opponents; intrepidity is firm courage, which shrinks not amid the most appalling dangers; gallantry is adventurous courage, dashing into the thickest of the fight. Heroism may call into exercise all these modifications of courage. It is a contempt of danger, not from ignorance or inconsiderate levity, but from a noble devotion to some great cause, and a just confidence of being able to meet danger in the spirit of such a cause.

HID, SECRET, COVERT.

Hidden may denote either known to no one; as, a hidden disease; or intentionally concealed; as, a hidden purpose of revenge.—A secret must be known to some one, but only to the party or parties concerned; as, a secret conspiracy.—Covert (covered) literally denotes what is not open or avowed; as, a covert plan; but is often applied to what we mean shall be understood without openly expressing it; as, a covert allusion. Secret is opposed to known, and hidden to concealed.

Thus the sire of gods and men below:
What I have hidden, hope not thou to know.
DRYDEN.

My heart which by a secret harmony,
Still moves with thine, joined in connection sweet.

History, Chronicle, Annals.

History is a methodical record of the important events which concern a community of men, usually so arranged as to show the connection of causes and effects. A chronicle is a record of such events, when it conforms to the order of time as its distinctive feature. Annals are a chronicle divided out into distinct years.

Justly Cæsar scorns the poet's lays;
It is to history he trusts for praise. POPE.

No more yet of this;
For 't is a chronicle of day by day,
Not a relation for a breakfast. SHAKESPEARE.

We are assured by many glorious examples in the annals of our religion. ROGERS.

Homage, Fealty.

Homage was originally the act of a feudal tenant by which he declared himself, on his knees, to be the hommage (homo) or bondsman of the lord; hence the term is used to denote reverential submission or respect. Fealty (from L. fidelitas) was originally the fidelity of such a tenant to his lord, and hence the term denotes a faithful and solemn adherence to the obligations we owe to superior power or authority. We pay our homage to men of preëminent usefulness and virtue, and profess our fealty to the principles by which they have been guided.

Go, go, with homage yon proud victors meet!
Go, lie like dogs beneath your masters' feet!

However, At least, Nevertheless, Yet.

These words, as here compared, have an adversative sense in reference to something referred to in the context.

However is the most general, and leads to a final conclusion or decision. Thus we say, "the truth, however, has not yet fully come out," i. e., such is the speaker's conclusion in view of the whole case. So also we say, "However, you may rely on my assistance to that amount," i. e., at all events, whatever may happen, this is my final decision.—At least is adversative in another way. It points out the utmost concession that can possibly be required, and still marks the adversative conclusion; as, "at least, this must be done;" "whatever may be our love of peace, we must at least maintain the rights of conscience."—Nevertheless denotes that though the concession be fully made, it has no bearing on the question; as, "nevertheless, we must go forward."—Yet signifies, that however extreme the supposition or fact conceded may be, the consequence which might naturally be expected does not and will not follow; as, "though I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee." "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him."

Humility, Modesty, Diffidence.

Diffidence is a distrust of our powers, combined with a fear lest our failure should be censured, since a dread of failure unconnected with a dread of censure is not usually called diffidence. It may be carried too far, and is not always (like modesty and humility) a virtue.—Modesty, without supposing self-distrust, implies an unwillingness to put ourselves forward, and an absence of all over-confidence in our own powers.—Humility consists in rating our claims low, in being willing to waive our rights, and take a lower place than might be our due. It does not require of us to underrate ourselves. The humility of our Saviour was perfect, and yet he had a true sense of his own greatness.

Be silent, always, when you doubt your sense;
And speak though sure with seeming diffidence.
POPE.

Modesty is a kind of shame or bashfulness proceeding from the sense a man has of his own defects compared with the perfections of him whom he comes before. SOUTH.

Humility is like a tree, whose root, when it sets deepest in the earth rises higher, and spreads fairer, and stands surer and lasts longer, and every step of its descent is like a rib of iron. BP. TAYLOR.

Idiom, Dialect.

The idioms of a language belong to its very structure; its dialects are varieties of expression ingrafted upon it in different localities or by different professions. Each county of England has some peculiarities of dialect, and so have most of the professions, while the great idioms of the language are everywhere the same. See Language.

Idle, Indolent, Lazy.

A propensity to inaction is expressed by each of these words; they differ in the cause and degree of this characteristic.

Indolent (from in and doleo, to avoid pain or effort) denotes an habitual love of ease, a settled dislike of movement or effort; idle is opposed to busy, and denotes a dislike of continuous exertion. An idle person may be active in his way, but is reluctant to force himself to what he does not like. Lazy is only a stronger and more contemptuous term for indolent.

"An indolent man fails in activity from a defect either of mind or body; and trifling exertions of any kind are sufficient, even in prospect, to deter him from attempting to move."

"Laziness is opposed to industry, and is frequent among those who are compelled to work for others; it is a habit of body superinduced upon one's condition."—CRABB.

Ignorant, Illiterate.

Ignorant denotes want of knowledge, either as to a single subject or information in general; illiterate refers to an ignorance of letters, or of knowledge acquired by reading and study. In the Middle Ages, a great proportion of the higher classes were illiterate, and yet were far from being ignorant, especially in regard to war and other active pursuits.

In such business
Action is eloquence, and the eyes of the ignorant
More learned than the ears. SHAKESPEARE.

In the first ages of Christianity, not only the learned and the wise, but the ignorant and illiterate embraced torments and death.—TILLOTSON.

Illiterate. See Ignorant.

Illness, Sickness.

Originally, sickness was the English term for a continuous disease, as in our version of the Scriptures, &c. Within the present century, there has been a tendency in England to use illness exclusively in this sense, and to confine sickness more especially to a sense of nausea, or "sickness of the stomach." Hence it is there common to say of a friend, "he has been ill for some weeks," "He has had a long illness." This practice is gaining ground in America to some extent; but as the Scriptures, the Book of Common Prayer, and most of the great English writers use "sick" and "sickness" in these cases, it is probable the change will be slow in its progress if ever made.

Imagination, Fancy.

These words have, to a great extent, been interchanged by our best writers, and considered as strictly synonymous. A distinction, however, is now made between them which more fully exhibits their nature. Properly speaking they are different exercises of the same general power—the plastic or creative faculty.

Imagination consists in taking parts of our conceptions and combining them into new forms and images more select, more striking, more delightful, terrible, &c., than those of ordinary nature. It is the higher exercise of the two. It creates by laws more closely connected with the reason; it has strong emotion as its actuating and formative cause; it aims at results of a definite and weighty character. Milton's fiery lake, the debates of his Pandemonium, the exquisite scenes of his Paradise, are all products of the imagination.—Fancy moves on a lighter wing; it is governed by laws of association which are more remote, and sometimes arbitrary or capricious. Hence the term fanciful, which exhibits fancy in its wilder flights. It has for its actuating spirit feelings of a lively, gay, and versatile character; it seeks to please by unexpected combinations of thought, startling contrasts, flashes of brilliant imagery, &c. Pope's Rape of the Lock is an exhibition of fancy, which has scarcely its equal in the literature of any country.

This, for instance, Wordsworth did in respect of the words "imagination" and "fancy." Before he wrote, it was, I suppose, obscurely felt by most that in "imagination" there was more of the earnest, in "fancy" of the play of the spirit, that the first was a loftier faculty and gift than the second; yet for all this the words were continually and not without loss, confounded. He first, in the preface to his Lyrical Ballads, rendered it henceforth impossible that any one, who had read and mastered what he has written on the two words, should remain unconscious any longer of the important difference between them. TRENCH.

To imagine in this high and true sense of the word, is to realize the ideal, to make intelligible truths descend into the forms of sensible nature, to represent the invisible by the visible, the infinite by the finite. In this view of it, imagination may be regarded as the differentia of man—the distinctive mark which separates him a grege mutorum. That the inferior animals have memory, and what has been called passive imagination is proved by the fact that they dream—and that in this state impressions made on them in their waking hours are reproduced. But they show no trace of that higher faculty or function which transcends the sphere of sense, and which out of elements supplied by things seen and temporal, can create new objects, the contemplation of which lifts us to the infinite and the unseen, and gives us thoughts which wander through eternity. High art is highly metaphysical, and whether it be in poetry or music, or painting or inscription, the triumph of the art lies not in presenting us with an exact transcript of things that may be seen or heard or handled in the world around us, but in carrying us across the gulf which separates the phenomenal from the real, and placing us in the presence of the truly beautiful, and surrounding us with an atmosphere more pure than that which the sun enlightens. IMPERTINENT, OFFICIOUS, RUDE.

A person is officious who obtrudes his offices or assistance where they are not needed; he is impertinent (from in and pertinens, not belonging to one) when he intermeddles in things with which he has no concern. The former shows a want of tact; the latter a want of breeding, or, more commonly, a spirit of sheer impudence.—A person is rude (from rudis, rough, unpolished) when he violates the proprieties of social life either from ignorance or wantonness.

"An impertinent man will ask questions for the mere gratification of curiosity; a rude man will burst into the room of another, or push against his person, in violation of all decorum; one who is officious is quite as unfortunate as he is troublesome—when he strives to serve, he has the misfortune to annoy."—CRABB.

Impudence is an unblushing kind of impertinence, and may be manifested in words, tones, gestures, looks, &c. Effrontery rises still higher, and shows a total unconcern for the opinions of those present, and a disregard for all the forms of civil society. Sauciness discovers itself toward particular individuals, in certain relations; as in the case of servants who are saucy to their masters, or children who are saucy to their teachers.

INCOMPETENT, INCAPABLE.

Incompetent is a relative term, denoting a want of the requisite qualifications for performing a given act, service, &c.; incapable is absolute in its sense and meaning, denoting want of power, either natural or moral. We speak of a man as incompetent to a certain task, of an incompetent judge, &c. We say of an idiot, that he is incapable of learning to read; and of a man distinguished for his honor, that he is incapable of a mean action.

INCONGRUOUS. See INCONSISTENT.

INCONSISTENT, INCONGRUOUS, INCOMPATIBLE.

Things are incongruous when they are not suited to each other, so that their union is unbecoming; inconsistent when they are opposed to each other, so as to render it improper or wrong; incompatible when they can not coexist, and it is therefore impossible to unite them. Habitual levity of mind is incongruous with the profession of a clergyman; it is inconsistent with his ordination vows; it is incompatible with his permanent usefulness.

Incongruity attaches to the modes and qualities of things; incompatibility attaches to their essential attributes; inconsistency attaches to the actions, sentiments, &c., of men.

TO INCREASE, ENLARGE, EXTEND.

Enlarge implies to make larger or broader in size. Extend (from ex and tendo, to stretch forth) marks the progress of enlargement beyond wider boundaries. Increase (from in and cresco, to grow) denotes enlargement, by growth and accession, as in the case of plants. A kingdom is enlarged by the addition of new territories; the mind is enlarged by knowledge. A kingdom is extended when its boundaries are carried to a greater distance from the center. A man's riches, honors, knowledge, &c., are increased by accessions which are made from time to time.

INDUCTION, DEDUCTION.

In induction we observe a sufficient number of individual facts, and, on the ground of analogy, extend what is true of them to others of the same class, thus arriving at general principles or laws. This is the kind of reasoning in physical science. In deduction we begin with a general truth, and seek to connect it with some individual case by means of a middle term, or class of objects known to be equally connected with both. Thus we bring down the general into the individual, affirming of the latter the distinctive qualities of the former. This is the syllogistic method. By induction Franklin established the identity of lightning and electricity; by deduction he inferred that dwellings might be protected by lightning-rods.

INFECTION, CONTAGION.

Medical writers in Europe do not, most of them, allow there is any difference between contagion and infection. In America, the distinction referred to under CONTAGION is, to a considerable extent, admitted. In general literature, this distinction is well established. We use contagion and contagious in respect to things which spread by intercourse or imitation; as, the contagious influence of example; while we apply infection and infectious to a more hidden and diffusive power; as, the infection of vice; the infectious influence of evil principles.

INFECTIOUS. See CONTAGIOUS.

INFERENCE, CONCLUSION.

An inference (from in and fero) is lit., that which is brought in; and hence, a deduction or induction from premises—something which follows as certainly or probably true.—A conclusion (from concludo, to shut up) is stronger than inference; it shuts us up to the result, and terminates inquiry. In a chain of reasoning we have many inferences which lead to the ultimate conclusion.

"An inference is a proposition which is perceived to be true, because of its connection with some known fact." TAYLOR'S ELEMENTS OF THOUGHT.

"When something is simply affirmed to be true, it is called a proposition; after it has been found to be true, by several reasons or arguments, it is called a conclusion." TAYLOR'S ELEMENTS OF THOUGHT.

INFIDEL, UNBELIEVER, FREETHINKER, DEIST, ATHEIST, SKEPTIC.

An infidel is properly one who denies Christianity and the truth of the Scriptures. Some have endeavored to widen the sense of infidel so as to embrace atheism and every form of unbelief, but this has failed. A freethinker is now only another name for an infidel. An unbeliever is not necessarily a *dis*believer or infidel, because he may still be inquiring after evidence to satisfy his mind; the word, however, is more commonly used in the worst sense. A deist believes in one God and a divine providence, but rejects revelation. An atheist denies the being of God. A skeptic is one whose faith in the reliability of evidence is weakened or destroyed, so that religion, to the same extent, has no practical hold on his mind.

INFIRMITY. See DEBILITY.

INFORMER. See INFORMANT.

INGENUITY, CLEVERNESS.

Ingenuity is a form of genius, and cleverness of talent. The former implies invention, the latter a peculiar dexterity and readiness of execution. Sir James Mackintosh remarks, that the English overdo in the use of the words clever and cleverness, applying them loosely to almost every form of intellectual ability. Thus they speak of a clever article in a magazine; a clever review; a clever speech in Parliament; of a book very cleverly written; of great cleverness in debate; and in accordance with this use of language, Mr. Macaulay would be called a very clever writer of history, and Mr. Fox a very clever debater.

Ingenuous, Open, Frank.

One who is open, speaks out at once what is uppermost in his mind; one who is frank does it from a natural boldness or dislike of self-restraint; one who is ingenuous is actuated by a noble candor and love of truth, which makes him willing to confess his faults, and make known all his sentiments without reserve.

"A frank man is not frank to all, nor on all occasions; he is frank to his friends, or he is frank in his dealings with others: but the open man lets himself out like a running stream to all who choose to listen, and communicates trivial or important matters with equal eagerness." Crabb.

If an ingenuous detestation of falsehood be but carefully and early instilled, that is the true and genuine method to obviate dishonesty. Locke.

Iniquitous, Wicked, Nefarious.

Wicked is the generic term; iniquitous is stronger, denoting a violation of the rights of others usually by fraud or circumvention. Nefarious (from nefas, a crime of the deepest dye) is still stronger, implying a breach of the most sacred obligations.

Go and succeed! the rivals' aims despise;
For never, never, wicked man was wise.
Pope.

Till God at last
Wearied with their iniquities, withdraw
His presence from among them. Milton.

But to worse purpose many times
To flourish o'er nefarious crimes,
And cheat the world. Butler.

Innuendo, Insinuation.

An innuendo supposes a representation so framed as to point distinctly (lit., by nodding) at something beyond, which is injurious to the character, &c., of the person aimed at. An insinuation turns on no such double use of language; but consists in artfully winding into the mind imputations of an injurious nature without making any direct charge: and is therefore justly regarded as one of the basest resorts of malice and falsehood.

To Inquire. See To Question.

Inquisitive, Curious, Prying.

Curious denotes a feeling, and inquisitive a habit. We are curious when we desire to learn something new; we are inquisitive (from in and quæro, to seek) when we set ourselves to gain it by inquiry or research. Prying implies inquisitiveness when carried to an extreme; and is more commonly used in a bad sense, as indicating a desire to penetrate into the secrets of others.

Ah, curiosity, first cause of all our ill,
And yet the plague which most torments us still!
Stirling.

Insanity, Lunacy, Madness, Derangement, Alienation, Aberration, Mania, Delirium, Frenzy, Monomania, Dementia.

Insanity is the generic term for all such diseases; lunacy has now an equal extent of meaning, though once used to denote periodical insanity; madness has the same extent, though originally referring to the rage created by the disease; derangement, aberration, alienation, are popular terms for insanity; delirium, mania, and frenzy denote excited states of the disease; dementia denotes the loss of mental power by this means; monomania is insanity upon a single subject.

Insinuation. See Innuendo.

Insolent, Insulting.

In the word insolent, we have a curious instance of the change and progress of our language. This word in its primitive sense (from L. insolens) simply denoted unusual; and to act insolently, was to act in violation of the established rules of social intercourse. He who did this was insolent; and thus the word has become one of the most offensive in our language; indicating a spirit of bloated pride or unbridled passion. Insulting (from insulto, to leap at or upon) denotes a personal attack either in words or actions indicative either of scorn or triumph.

Insolent is he that despiseth in his judgment all other folks as in regarde of his value, of his conning, of his speking and of his bering. Chaucer.

To Interpose, Intermeddle, Interfere.

A man may often interpose with propriety in the concerns of others; he can never intermeddle without being impertinent or officious; nor can he interfere without being liable to the same charge, unless he has rights which are interfered with.

In respect to this distinction, Trench remarks:

In our practical use, interference is something offensive. It is the pushing in of himself between two parties on the part of a third who was not asked, and is not thanked for his pains, and who, as the feeling of the word implies, had no business there; while interposition is employed to express the friendly, peace-making mediation of one whom the act well became, and who, even if he was not specially invited thereunto, is still thanked for what he has done. How real an increase is it in the wealth and capabilities of a language thus to have discriminated such words as these, and to be able to express acts outwardly the same by different words, as we would praise or blame them! Invasion, Incursion, Irruption, Inroad.

Invasion is the generic term, denoting a forcible entrance into a foreign country.—Incursion (from incurro, to run in) signifies a hasty and sudden invasion.—Irruption (from irrumpo, to break in) denotes a particularly violent invasion.—Inroad (from in and ride) includes the idea of frequent or repeated invasion.

The nations of th' Ausonian shore
Shall hear the dreadful rumor from afar,
Of armed invasion, and embrace the war.
DRYDEN.

Now the Parthian king hath gathered all his host
Against the Scythian, whose incursions wild
Have wasted Sogdiana. MILTON.

Next followed a wild irruption of barbarians from the northern hive. ADDISON.

By proof we feel
Our power sufficient to disturb his heaven,
And with perpetual inroads to alarm,
Though inaccessible his fatal throne. MILTON.

TO INVENT. See TO DISCOVER.

INVENTORY. See LIST.

TO INVOLVE, IMPLY.

Imply (from implico, to enfold or wrap up) is opposed to express or set forth; thus, an implied engagement is one fairly to be understood from the words used or the circumstances of the case, though not set forth in form.—Involve (from involvo, to enwrap) goes beyond the mere interpretation of things into their necessary relations; and hence, if one thing involves (lit., inwraps) another, it so contains it that the two must go together by an indissoluble connection. War, for example, involves wide-spread misery and death; the premises of a syllogism involve the conclusion, so that this kind of reasoning is a simple process of evolution.

Where a malicious act is proved, a malicious intention is implied. SHERLOCK.

We can not demonstrate these things so as to show that the contrary necessarily involves a contradiction. TILLOTSON.

IRE. See ANGER.

IRKSOME, WEARISOME, TEDIOUS.

These epithets describe objects which give pain or disgust.

Irksome (from Scot. irk, to weary) is applied to something which disgusts by frequent repetition; as, an irksome task.—Wearisome (from to wear) denotes that which wearies or wears us out by severe labor; as, a wearisome employment.—Tedious (from L. taedet, it disgusts) is applied to something which tires us out by the length of time occupied in its performance; as, a tedious speech.

Irksome duties or employments. "Wearisome nights are appointed to me."—JOB.

Pity only on fresh objects stays,
But with the tedious sight of woes decays.
DRYDEN.

IRRATIONAL. See ABSURD.

TO IRRITATE, PROVOKE, EXASPERATE.

These words express different stages of excited or angry feeling.

Irritate (from irrito, to rouse or excite) denotes an excitement of quick and slightly angry feeling; as, irritated by a hasty remark.—To provoke (from provoco, to call forth) implies the awakening of some open expression of decided anger; as, a provoking insult.—Exasperate (from exaspero, to roughen) denotes a provoking of anger in its unrestrained exercise. Whatever comes across our feelings irritates; whatever excites anger provokes; whatever raises anger to a very high point exasperates.

"Susceptible and nervous people are most easily irritated; proud people are quickly provoked; hot and fiery people are soonest exasperated."—CRABB.

IRRUPTION. See INVASION.

J.

TO JADE, FATIGUE, TIRE, WEARY.

Fatigue is the generic term; tire (from Sax. teorian, to consume or waste) denotes fatigue which wastes the strength; weary implies that a person is worn out by exertion; jade (connected with jade, a wearied horse) refers to the weariness created by a long and steady repetition of the same act or effort. A little exertion will tire a child or a weak person; a severe or protracted task wearies equally the body and the mind; the most powerful horse becomes jaded on a long journey by a continual straining of the same muscles.

Wearied with labor of body or mind; tired of work, tired out by importunities; jaded by incessant attention to business.

JEALOUS, SUSPICIOUS.

Suspicious is the wider term. We suspect a person when we distrust his honesty and imagine he has some bad design.—We are jealous (from Low Lat. zelosus, burning with emotion) when we suspect him of aiming to deprive us of what is our own, and what we dearly prize. Iago began by awakening the suspicions of Othello, and converted them at last into the deadliest jealousy.

"Suspicion may be excited by some kind of accusation, not supported by evidence sufficient for conviction, but sufficient to trouble the repose of confidence."—COGAN.

"Jealousy is a painful apprehension of rivalship in cases that are peculiarly interesting to us."—COGAN.

TO JEER. See TO SNEER.

JEOPARDY. See DANGER.

TO JEST, JOKE.

One jests in order to make others laugh; one jokes to please himself. A jest is always at the expense of another, and is often ill-natured; a joke is a sportive sally designed to promote good humor without wounding the feelings of its object.

"Jests are, therefore, seldom harmless; jokes frequently allowable. The most serious subject may be degraded by being turned into a jest."—CRABB.

But those who aim at ridicule
Should fix upon some certain rule,
Which fairly hints they are in jest.
SWIFT.

Who court it from the mean and base;
They love the cellar's vulgar joke,
And lose their hours in ale and smoke.

TO JOKE. See TO JEST.

JOURNEY, TOUR, EXCURSION, PILGRIMAGE.

The word journey suggests the idea of a somewhat prolonged traveling for a specific object, leading a person to pass directly from one point to another. In a tour we take a roundabout course from place to place, more commonly for pleasure, though sometimes on business. An excursion (lit., running forth) is never on business, but always for pleasure, health, &c. In a pilgrimage we travel to a place hallowed by our religious affections, or by some train of sacred or tender associations.

A journey on important business; the tour of Europe; an excursion to the lakes; a pilgrimage to the rock of Plymouth.

JUDGE, UMPIRE, ARBITRATOR, REFEREE.

A judge, in the legal sense, is a magistrate appointed to determine questions of law. An umpire is a person selected to decide between two or more who contend for a prize. An arbitrator is one chosen to allot to two contestants their portion of a claim, usually on grounds of equity and common sense. A referee is one to whom a case is referred for final adjustment. Arbitrations and references are sometimes voluntary and sometimes appointed by a court.

JUDGMENT. See TASTE.

JUSTICE, EQUITY, LAW.

Justice and equity are the same; but human laws, though designed to secure justice, are of necessity imperfect, and hence what is strictly legal is at times far from being equitable or just. Here a court of equity comes in to redress the grievances. It does so as distinguished from courts of law; and as the latter are often styled courts of justice, some have fancied that there is in this case a conflict between justice and equity. The real conflict is against the working of the law: this a court of equity brings into accordance with the claims of justice. It would be an unfortunate use of language which should lead any one to imagine he might have justice on his side while practicing iniquity (inequity).

JUSTICE, RECTITUDE.

Rectitude, in its widest sense, is one of the most comprehensive words in our language, denoting absolute conformity to the rule of right in principle and practice. Justice refers more especially to the carrying out of law, and has been considered by moralists as of three kinds: (1.) Commutative justice, which gives every man his own property, including things pledged by promise, &c. (2.) Distributive justice, which gives every man his exact deserts. (3.) General justice, which carries completely out all the ends of law, though not in every case through the precise channels of commutative or distributive justice; as we see often done by a parent or a ruler in his dealings with those who are subject to his control.

K.

TO KEEP, RETAIN, PRESERVE.

Keep is the generic term, and is often used where retain or preserve would too much restrict the meaning; as, to keep silence, &c. Retain (from re, against, and teneo, to hold) denotes that we keep or hold things, as against influences which might deprive us of them, or reasons which might lead us to give them up; as, to retain vivacity in old age, to retain counsel in a lawsuit, to retain one's servant after a reverse of fortune. Preserve (from præ, beforehand, and servo, to keep or watch over) denotes that we keep a thing against agencies which might lead to its being destroyed or broken in upon; as, to preserve one's health amid many exposures, to preserve appearances, &c.

Be obedient and retain
Unalterably firm his love entire.
MILTON.

See where the patriot shines, whose prudent care
Preserves his country by protracted war.
PITT.

TO KILL, MURDER, ASSASSINATE.

To kill does not necessarily mean any more than to deprive of life. A man may kill another by accident or in self-defense without the imputation of guilt. To murder is to kill with malicious forethought and intention. To assassinate is to murder suddenly and by stealth. The sheriff may kill without murdering; the duelist murders, but does not assassinate his antagonist; the assassin kills and murders in the meanest and most ignoble manner.

The fiery young hero who had overcome the Curiatii, being upbraided by his sister for having slain her lover, in the height of his resentment kills her. ADDISON.

Murders and executions are always transacted behind the scenes in the French theater. ADDISON.

On this vain hope, adulterers, thieves rely,
And to this altar vile assassins fly.
JENYNS.

KIND. See OBLIGING.

KIND. See SORT.

KINGLY, REGAL.

Kingly is Saxon, and refers especially to the character of a king; regal is Latin, and now relates more to his office. The former is chiefly used of dispositions, feelings and purposes which are king-like; as, kingly sentiments, kingly condescension; "a kingly heart for enterprises."—SIDNEY. The latter is more applied to external state, pomp, &c.; as, regal state, regal title, &c. This distinction is not observed by our early writers, but is gaining ground.

I am far better born than is the king;
More like a king, more kingly in my thoughts.
SHAKESPEARE.

With them comes a third of regal port,
With faded splendor wan, who by his gait
And fierce demeanor seems the prince of hell.
MILTON.

L.

LABYRINTH, MAZE.

A labyrinth among the ancients was a building constructed with a multitude of winding passages, so that a person could hardly avoid being lost. Hence, figuratively, the word denotes any thing extremely intricate; as, the labyrinth of the human heart. Maze (lit., whirlpool) denotes the perplexity and confusion in which the mind is thrown by unexpected or inexplicable events; as, a maze of thought.

My soul is on her journey; do not now
Divert or lead her back, to lose herself
I' th' maze and winding labyrinths o' th' world.
DENHAM.

The ways of Heaven are dark and intricate,
Puzzled with mazes and perplexed with error;
Our understanding searches them in vain.
ADDISON.

LACONIC, CONCISE.

The term laconic is derived from the Lacones or Spartans, who affected to give short, pithy answers. Laconic, then, implies few words. Concise, (from concido, to cut short,) implies only the necessary words. A work may be a long one, and yet the language be concise; a reply can not be long, and yet laconic. Laconic carries with it the idea of incivility or affectation; conciseness is liable to no such imputation, but may sometimes lead to obscurity through a want of more filling out.

I grow laconic even beyond laconicism. POPE.

BEN JONSON.

TO LAG. See TO LOITER.

TO LAMENT. See TO DEPLORE.

LAMPOON, SATIRE.

The appropriate object of satire is found in the vices and follies of the times. It is usually general, and designed to expose and reform. A lampoon is a bitter personal satire, dictated by malignant feelings, and intended only to distress and degrade. Most of the pieces published by Pope under the name of satires were a string of lampoons.

Libel and satire are promiscuously joined together in the notions of the vulgar, though the satirist and libeler differ as much as the libeler and murderer. In the consideration of human life, the satirist never falls upon persons who are not glaringly faulty, and the libeler on none but who are conspicuously commendable. TATTLER, No. 92.

Like her, who missed her name in a lampoon,
And grieved to find herself decayed so soon.
DRYDEN.

LANGUAGE, SPEECH, TONGUE, IDIOM, DIALECT.

Language (L. lingua, the tongue) is generic, denoting any mode of conveying ideas; as, the language of the deaf and dumb, &c.; speech (lit., a shooting forth) is the language of articulate sounds; tongue (lit., a shoot or extension) is the Saxon term for the language of a particular people; as, the English tongue. Idiom denotes the forms of construction peculiar to a language; dialects are varieties of expression which spring up in different parts of a country; or in different professions, &c.

LASTING, PERMANENT, DURABLE.

Lasting is more commonly applied to things abstract, which from their very nature endure; as, a lasting remembrance, effect, &c. Permanent (from per and maneo, to remain throughout) applies chiefly to things established and designed to remain unchanged; as, a permanent situation, a permanent change, &c. Durable (from duro, to continue firm or enduring) is applied to material substances or fabrics, so far as they resist agencies which tend to destroy them; as, a durable foundation, &c.

Frauds, fears and fury, have possessed the state,
And fixed the causes of a lasting hate. DRYDEN.

Their joys sincere and with no sorrow mixed,
Eternity stand permanent and fixed. DRYDEN.

LAUGHABLE. See DROLL, also LUDICROUS.

LAVISH. See PROFUSE.

LAW. See JUSTICE.

LAW, STATUTE, COMMON-LAW, REGULATION, EDICT, DECREE.

Law is generic, and denotes, in this connection, whatever is commanded by one who has a right to require obedience. A statute is a particular law drawn out in form, and distinctly enacted and proclaimed. Common-law is a rule of action founded on long usage and the decisions of courts of justice. A regulation is a limited and often temporary law, intended to secure some particular end or object. An edict is a command or law issued by a sovereign, and is peculiar to a despotic government. A decree is a permanent order either of a court or of the executive government.

LEADER. See CHIEF.

TO LEARN, TEACH.

Learn originally had the sense of teach, in accordance with the analogy of the French and other languages, and hence we occasionally find it with this sense in Shakespeare and Spenser. This usage has now passed away. To learn is to receive, and to teach is to give instruction. He who is taught learns, not he who teaches.

Learn, wretches; learn the motions of the mind,
And the great moral end of human kind.
DRYDEN.

I am too sudden bold;
To teach a teacher ill beseemeth me.
SHAKESPEARE.

LEARNING. See LITERATURE.

TO LEAVE. See TO QUIT.

LEAVE, LIBERTY, PERMISSION, LICENSE.

Leave denotes that he who obtains it may decide whether to use it or not; as, leave of absence. Liberty supposes that all obstructions in the way of his using it are removed and set aside; as, liberty of access. Permission implies a formal consent given by one who had the right to refuse it; as, permission to depart. License denotes that this consent extends to a mode of acting for which special permission is required; as, a license to print. An orator asks leave to speak; liberty is granted him; he construes this permission into a license to abuse his opponents, and acts accordingly.

LEVITY, VOLATILITY, FLIGHTINESS.

All these words relate to outward conduct.

Levity (from levis, light) springs from a lightness of mind which produces a disregard of the proprieties of time and place. Volatility (from volito, to flit about) is a degree of levity which causes the thoughts to fly from one object to another, without resting on any for a moment. Flightiness is volatility carried to an extreme which often betrays its subject into gross impropriety or weakness.

Levity of deportment, of conduct, of remark; volatility of temper, of spirits; flightiness of mind or disposition.

LIABLE, SUBJECT.

Liable (from Fr. lier, to bind) denotes something external which may befall us; subject (from sub and jacio, to put under) refers to evils which arise chiefly from internal necessity, and are likely to do so. Hence the former applies more to what is accidental, the latter to things from which we often or inevitably suffer. Every one, from his temperament, is subject to certain diseases, while he is liable to be attacked by many others.

But what is strength without a double share
Of wisdom? vast, unwieldy, burthensome,
Proudly secure, yet liable to fall
By weakest subtleties. MILTON.

All human things are subject to decay,
And when fate summons, monarchs must obey.
DRYDEN.

LIBERAL, GENEROUS.

Liberal is free born, and generous is high born. The former is opposed to the ordinary feelings of a servile state and implies largeness of spirit in giving, judging, acting, &c. The latter expresses that nobleness of soul which is peculiarly appropriate to those of high rank—a spirit that goes out of self, and finds its enjoyment in consulting the feelings and happiness of others. Generosity is measured by the extent of the sacrifices it makes, liberality by the warmth of feeling which it manifests.

The liberal are secure alone,
For what we frankly give for ever is our own.
GRANVILLE.

A generous virtue of a vigorous kind,
Pure in the last recesses of the mind. DRYDEN.

TO LIBERATE. See TO DELIVER.

LIBERTY. See LEAVE.

LIBERTY, FREEDOM.

These words, though often interchanged, are distinct in some of their applications.

Liberty has reference to previous restraint, freedom to the simple, spontaneous exercise of our powers. A slave is set at liberty; his master had always been in a state of freedom. A prisoner under trial may ask liberty [exemption from restraint] to speak his sentiments with freedom [the spontaneous and bold utterance of his feelings]. The liberty of the press is our great security for freedom of thought.

Yet know, withal,
Since thy original lapse, true liberty
Is lost, which always with right reason dwells.
MILTON.

Oh Freedom, first delight of human kind!
Slaves are made citizens by turning round.
DRYDEN.

LICENSE. See LEAVE.

LIE, UNTRUTH.

A man may state what is untrue from ignorance or misconception, but to say he lies is to charge him with the highest dishonor. Hence the word untruth is sometimes used as a softened expression when we do not wish to make the charge of lying in the grossest form.

When I hear my neighbor speak that which is not true, and I say to him, This is not true, or this is false, I only convey to him the naked idea of his error; this is the primary idea; but if I say it is a lie, the word lie carries also a secondary idea; for it implies both the falsehood of the speech, and my reproach and censure of the speaker. WATTS.

TO LIE, TO LAY.

Lay is a transitive verb, and has for its preterit laid; as, "He told me to lay it down, and I laid it down." Lie is intransitive, and has for its preterit lay; as, "He told me to lie down, and I lay down." Some persons blunder by using laid for the preterit of lie; as, "He told me to lie down, and I laid down." So persons often say, "The ship laid at anchor," "they laid by during the storm;" "the book laid on the shelf," &c. It is only necessary to remember, in all such cases, that laid is the preterit of lay, and not of lie. This would save many respectable writers from a gross error, which seems to be increasing among us.

LIFELESS, DULL, INANIMATE, DEAD.

In a moral sense, lifeless denotes a want of vital energy; inanimate a want of expression as to any feeling that may be possessed; dull implies a torpor of soul which checks all mental activity; dead supposes a destitution of feeling. A person is said to be lifeless who has lost the spirits which he once had; he is said to be inanimate when he is naturally wanting in spirits; one is dull from an original deficiency of mental power; he who is dead to moral sentiment is wholly bereft of the highest attribute of his nature.

LIKEWISE. See ALSO.

LIMB, MEMBER.

A member of the body is any part capable of performing a distinct office, as the eye, ear, &c.; a limb is one of the extremities, and hence the term is restricted to the legs and arms. So, in reference to public bodies, we speak of their members, though an attorney is sometimes sportively called "a limb of the law."

One on his youth and pliant limbs relies,
One on his sinews and his giant size. DRYDEN.

Faint sweats all down their mighty members run,
Vast bulks which little souls but ill supply.
DRYDEN.

LIMIT, BOUNDARY.

A limit (from limes, a landmark) is a prescribed termination; a boundary is something which binds or hems us in. The former arises from the nature of the case, or from some established restriction; thus we speak of the limits of the human understanding; a limited monarchy, &c. The latter is a line (either real or imaginary) which circumscribes and restrains; as, the boundaries of an empire, of knowledge, &c. "Providence," says Johnson, "has fixed the limits of human enjoyment by immovable boundaries."

But still his native country lies
Beyond the bound'ries of the skies. COTTON.

LIST. See SCHEDULE.

LIST, ROLL, CATALOGUE, REGISTER, INVENTORY.

A list is properly a simple series of names, &c., in a brief form, such as might naturally be entered in a narrow strip of paper. A roll was originally a list containing the names of persons belonging to a public body (as Parliament, &c.) which was rolled up and laid aside among its archives. A catalogue is a list of persons or things arranged in order, and usually containing some description of the same, more or less extended. A register (lit., a setting down) is designed for record or preservation. An inventory (lit., what is found) is a list of articles, &c., found on hand in a store of goods, or in the estate of a deceased person, or under similar circumstances.

Literature, Learning, Erudition.

Literature, in its widest sense, embraces all compositions except those on the positive sciences, mathematics, &c. It is usually confined, however, to the belles-lettres, or works of taste and sentiment, as poetry, eloquence, history, &c., excluding abstract discussions and mere erudition. A man of literature is one who is versed in the belles-lettres; a man of learning excels in what is taught in the schools, and has a wide extent of knowledge, especially in respect to the past; a man of erudition is one who is skilled in the more recondite branches of learned inquiry.

Men give a reputation to literature, and convince the world of its usefulness. Addison.

Learning thy talent is, but mine is sense. Prior.

Some gentlemen abounding in their university erudition, fill their sermons with philosophical terms. Swift.

Literature. See Science.

Littleness, Meanness.

Littleness and meanness both produce paltry actions; but littleness is narrow from ignorance or timidity, and meanness from a sordid, unprincipled selfishness. Littleness dissembles for want of spirit, meanness for want of honesty. Littleness is the reverse of magnanimity, and meanness of generosity.—H. Taylor.

Liveliness, Gayety, Animation, Vivacity.

Liveliness is an habitual feeling of life and interest; gayety refers more to a temporary excitement of the animal spirits; animation implies a warmth of emotion and a corresponding vividness of expressing it, awakened by the presence of something which strongly affects the mind; vivacity is a feeling between liveliness and animation, having the permanency of the one, and, to some extent, the warmth of the other.

Liveliness of imagination; gayety of heart; animation of countenance; vivacity of gesture or conversation.

To Loiter, Lag, Linger, Saunter.

Loiter and lag have a bad sense, denoting that a person moves slow through laziness, or remains behind while others are advancing.—Not so with linger. One may linger or lengthen out his time or stay from a regret to leave scenes which had been dear to him.—To saunter is the act of a mere idler, who moves about carelessly with no definite end or object.

Whence this long delay?
You loiter while the spoils are thrown away. Dryden.

Superfluous lags the vet'ran on the stage,

Lucid. See Luminous.

Ludicrous, Laughable, Ridiculous.

We speak of a thing as ludicrous when it tends to produce laughter; as laughable when the impression is stronger, resulting in a hearty laugh; as ridiculous when contempt is more or less mingled with the merriment created. "His stories were highly ludicrous, representing his friends some in a laughable, and some in a ridiculous point of view."

And others of such vinegar aspect
That they'll not show their teeth in way of smile,
Though Nestor swear the jest be laughable.

Luggage. See Plunder.

Luminous, Lucid.

A thing is lucid (from lux, lucis) when pervaded by light; as, a lucid stream; it is luminous (from lumen, luminis) when it sends forth light to surrounding objects; as, a luminous body. Hence we speak of an argument as lucid when it is remarkably clear, and as luminous when it pours upon a subject the mingled light of reasoning and illustration.

Magisterial, Dogmatical, Arrogant.

One who is magisterial assumes the air of a master toward his pupils; one who is dogmatical lays down his positions in a tone of authority or dictation; one who is arrogant insults others by an undue assumption of superiority. Those who have long been teachers sometimes acquire, unconsciously, a manner which borders too much on the magisterial, and which may be unjustly construed as dogmatical or even arrogant.

He uses a magisterial authority while he instructs him. South.

Most critics write in a positive, dogmatic way. Spectator.

An arrogant way of treating with others is natural to popular governments. Temple.

Magnanimity, Generosity.

In generosity there is more of heart, in magnanimity more of soul. The former is the virtue of an individual, the latter of one who is elevated by station or influence. Magnanimity is shown not only by giving, but by enduring—by sacrificing one's feelings and interests, or yielding up one's claims for the accomplishment of some noble object. "Strike, but hear me!" has, in like circumstances, been the response of magnanimity in every age.

A generous virtue of a vigorous kind,

To give a kingdom hath been thought
Greater and nobler done, and to lay down
Far more magnanimous than to assume. Milton.

Malediction, Curse, Imprecation, Execration.

Malediction (from male and dico) is the most general term, denoting bitter reproach or wishes and predictions of evil.—Curse implies the desire or threat of evil, declared upon oath or in the most solemn manner.—Imprecation (from imprecor) is literally the praying down of evil upon a person.—Execration (e sacris excludere) is literally a putting under the ban of excommunication, a curse which excludes from the kingdom of God. In ordinary usage, the last three words describe profane swearing, execration being the strongest.

Malevolence. See Malice.

Malice, Malevolence, Malignity, Malignancy.

There is the same difference between malevolence and malice as between wishes and intentions. A malevolent man desires to see others unhappy, and rejoices when they are so; a malicious man is habitually bent upon injuring others without cause. Malignity goes further; it is not only bent on evil, but loves it for its own sake. One who is malignant must be both malevolent and malicious; but a man may be malicious without being malignant.

Proud tyrants who maliciously destroy
And ride o'er ruins with malignant joy,
Humbled in dust, soon to their cost shall know
Heaven our avenger and mankind their foe. Somerville.

In some connections malignity seems rather more pertinently applied to a radical depravity of nature, and malignancy to indications of this depravity, in temper and conduct in particular instances. Cogan.

Mania. See Insanity.

Manifest, Clear, Plain, Obvious, Evident.

What is clear can be seen in all its bearings; what is plain can be seen by any man without study or reflection; what is obvious (from ob and via way) lies directly in our way, and must be seen by every one; what is evident (from e and video, to see) is seen forcibly, and leaves no hesitation on the mind; what is manifest (from manifesto, clearly to exhibit) is evident in a very high degree, striking upon the mind at once with overpowering conviction.

So clear, so shining, and so evident,
That it will glimmer through a blind man's eye.
SHAKESPEARE.

Entertained with solitude,
Where obvious duty ere while appeared unsought.
MILTON.

I saw, I saw him manifest in view,
His voice, his figure and his gesture knew.
DRYDEN.

MANLY, MANFUL.

Manful points to the energy and vigor of a man; manly to the generous and noble qualities of a man. Hence manful refers to force, and resolution as attributes of our race, and is opposed to weak or cowardly; manly has reference to maturity of years or elevation of spirit, and is opposed to puerile or mean. Hence we speak of a manful endurance of evil, and of manly conduct or deportment.

I slew him manfully in fight,
Without false 'vantage, or base treachery.
SHAKESPEARE.

Let's briefly put on manly readiness,
And meet in the hall together.
SHAKESPEARE.

MANNER. See METHOD.

MARINE. See MARITIME.

MARITIME, MARINE.

Maritime (from maritimus) denotes, primarily, bordering on the sea; as, a maritime town, coast, nation, &c.; and secondarily, belonging to those who border on the sea; as, maritime laws, rights, pursuits, &c. Marine (from marinus) denotes, primarily, of or pertaining to the sea; as, a marine shell, marine productions, &c.; and secondarily, "transacted at sea;" as, marine service; or doing duty on the sea; as, marine forces, &c. Hence, also, marines are soldiers who do service in ships; the marine of a nation is its shipping taken collectively, and also the entire economy of its naval affairs.

MARRIAGE, MATRIMONY, WEDLOCK.

Marriage is properly the act which unites the two parties, and matrimony the state into which they enter. Marriage is, however, often used for the state as well as the act. Wedlock is the old Saxon term for matrimony.

"Hasty marriages cannot be expected to produce happiness; young people who are eager for matrimony before they are fully aware of its consequences will purchase their experience at the expense of their peace."—CRABB.

"The men who would make good husbands, if they visit public places, are frighted at wedlock and resolve to live single."—JOHNSON.

MARTIAL, WARLIKE.

Martial (from Mars, the god of war) refers more to war in action, its array, its attendants, &c.; as, martial music, a martial appearance, a martial array, courts-martial, &c. Warlike describes the feeling or temper which leads to war, and the adjuncts connected with it; as, a warlike nation, warlike preparations, a warlike indication of things, &c. The two words thus approach each other very nearly, and are often interchanged.

When our country's cause provokes to arms,
How martial music every bosom warms.
POPE.

The great archangel from his warlike toil
Surceased. MILTON.

MARVELOUS, WONDERFUL.

We speak of a thing as wonderful when it awakens our surprise and admiration; as marvelous when it is so much out of the ordinary course of things as to seem nearly or quite incredible. The victories of Napoleon were wonderful; the sleight-of-hand tricks which are sometimes exhibited are so marvelous that they would appear incredible if not publicly performed.

I found
The new created world, which fame in heaven
Long had foretold, a fabric wonderful
Of absolute perfection. MILTON.

Whence he indued was with skill so marvelous.
SPENSER.

MASSACRE, BUTCHERY, CARNAGE.

Massacre denoted originally the killing of victims for sacrifice. It now denotes the promiscuous slaughter of many; and it is therefore a gross error (though sometimes committed) to speak of massacring a single individual. Butchery refers to cold-blooded cruelty in the killing of men as if they were brute beasts. Carnage (from caro, flesh) points to slaughter as producing the heaped up bodies of the slain.

I'll find a day to massacre them all,
And raze their faction and their family.
SHAKESPEARE.

If thou delight to view thy heinous deeds,
Behold this patron of thy butcheries.
SHAKESPEARE.

Such a scent I draw
Of carnage, prey innumerable! and taste
The savor of death from all things there
That live. MILTON.

MATERNAL. See MOTHERLY.

MATRIMONY. See MARRIAGE.

MATURE, RIPE.

Both words describe fullness of growth. Mature brings to view the process; ripe indicates the result. We speak of a thing as mature when thinking of the successive stages through which it has passed; as ripe when our attention is directed to its ends or uses. A mature judgment, mature consideration; ripe fruit, a ripe scholar. A character is matured by experience or by time; it is ripened for great usefulness or for the enjoyments of heaven.

How shall I meet, or how accost the sage,
Unskilled in speech, nor yet mature of age.
POPE.

O early ripe! to thy abundant store,
What could advancing age have added more.

MEMORY, REMEMBRANCE, RECOLLECTION, REMINISCENCE.

Memory is the generic term, denoting the power by which we reproduce past impressions. Remembrance is an exercise of that power when things occur spontaneously to our thoughts. In recollection we make a distinct effort to collect again, or call back, what we know has been formerly in the mind. Reminiscence is intermediate between remembrance and recollection, being a conscious process of recalling past occurrences, but without that full and varied reference to particular things which characterizes recollection.

When an idea again recurs without the operation of the like object on the external sensory, it is remembrance; if it be sought after by the mind, and with pain and endeavor found, and brought again into view, it is recollection. LOCKE.

MENACE. See THREAT.

MERCANTILE, COMMERCIAL.

Commercial is the wider term, being sometimes used to embrace mercantile. In their stricter use, commercial relates to the shipping, freighting, forwarding, and other business connected with the commerce of a country (whether external or internal), that is, the exchange of commodities; while mercantile applies to the sale of merchandise and goods when brought to market. As the two employments are to some extent intermingled, the two words are often interchanged.

The only procedure (that I may use the mercantile term) you can expect, is thanks. HOWELL.

Every man thus lives by exchanging, or becomes in some measure a merchant; and the society itself grows to be what is properly a commercial society.
A. SMITH.

MERCENARY. See VENAL.

MERCY. See GRACE.

METHOD, MODE, MANNER.

Method implies arrangement; mode, mere action or existence. Method is a way of reaching a given end by a series of acts which tend to secure it; mode relates to a single action, to the form or mode of existence it assumes in its performance. Manner (from manus) is literally the handling of a thing, and has a wider sense, embracing both method and mode. An instructor may adopt a good method of teaching to write; the scholar may acquire a bad mode of holding his pen; the manner in which he is corrected will greatly affect his success or failure.

It will be in vain to talk to you concerning the method I think best to be observed in schools.
LOCKE.

SHAKESPEARE.

MIDDLE. See MIDST.

MIDST, MIDDLE.

Midst is the superlative of mid (middle), denoting the very center, and hence implies surrounded by, involved in, in the thickest of; as, in the midst of a forest, of the waves, of darkness, &c. Middle has no such intensive sense, and is often applied to extent in only one direction; as, the middle of a line, of the street, &c. Midst is very frequently used abstractly or figuratively; as, in the midst of afflictions, cares, &c.; middle is never thus used with propriety. We can not say, In the middle of my contemplations on that subject, but in the midst.

MILD. See GENTLE.

MINUTE, CIRCUMSTANTIAL, PARTICULAR.

A circumstantial account embraces all the leading events; a particular account goes further, and includes each event and movement, though of but little importance; a minute account goes further still, and omits nothing as to person, time, place, adjuncts, &c.

We may be generally satisfied with a circumstantial account of ordinary events; but whatever interests the feelings can not be detailed with too much particularity or minuteness. CRABB.

MISCHANCE. See CALAMITY.

MISCHIEF, DAMAGE, HARM.

Damage (L. damnum) is an injury which diminishes the value of a thing; harm is an injury which causes trouble or inconvenience; mischief is an injury which disturbs the order and consistency of things. We often suffer damage or harm from accident, or from the course of Providence, but mischief always springs from the perversity or folly of man. No one can tell the mischiefs which result to a community from a tattling disposition.

But Calidore, that was well skilled in fight,
Him long forbore, and still his spirit spared,
Lying in wait how him he damage might.
SPENSER.

DRYDEN.

MISERLY. See AVARICIOUS.

MISHAP. See CALAMITY.

TO MISLEAD, DELUDE.

To mislead is to lead astray in any manner; to delude (from de and ludo, to play upon) is to do it by exciting the imagination. The former does not of necessity imply any bad design; a man may mislead us through false information or erroneous judgment. The latter always supposes more or less of conscious intention; an impostor deludes his dupes by false pretenses and hypocrisy.

Oh give me leave, I have deluded you,
'T was neither Charles, nor yet the duke.
SHAKESPEARE.

'T is hard to say, if greater want of skill
Appear in writing or in judging ill:
But of the two, less dang'rous is the offense,
To tire our patience, than mislead our sense.
POPE.

MISTAKE. See BLUNDER.

TO MITIGATE. See TO ALLEVIATE.

TO MITIGATE, ASSUAGE.

These words agree in marking a diminution in respect to violence or pain.

He who mitigates (from mitis, soft) relaxes in respect to harshness; he who assuages (lit., to bring down or weaken) is active in lessening the pain of others. A judge mitigates a sentence; friends assuage our afflictions. The same distinction prevails when these terms are more widely applied.

Mishaps are mastered by advice discreet,
And counsel mitigates the greatest smart.
SPENSER.

Refreshing winds the summer's heat assuage,
And kindly warmth disarms the winter's rage.
ADDISON.

Yet is his hate, his rancor ne'er the less,
Since naught assuageth malice when 't is told.
FAIRFAX.

MOB, POPULACE.

Populace (It. popolazzo) signifies the lower orders of the people taken collectively; a mob (L. mobilis, movable) is a riotous assembly of persons. A mob may be gathered and dispersed in an hour; the populace is a permanent portion of society.

Kings are ambitious; the nobility haughty; and the populace tumultuous and ungovernable. BURKE.

He shrunk from the dangers that threatened him, and sacrificed his conscience and his duty to the menaces of a mob. PORTEUS.

MODE. See METHOD.

MODERN, RECENT.

Modern is opposed to ancient; recent to what has been past for no considerable length of time. Modern civilization, improvements, &c.; recent advices, intelligence, &c.

Or sink with moderns to contempt and shame?
FRANCIS.

LEWIS.

MODESTY. See BASHFULNESS, also HUMILITY.

MOMENT, INSTANT.

A moment (L. momentum, a very small particle) allows of a beginning and end; an instant (L. instans, standing over us) is indivisible. The latter, therefore, expresses more brevity and urgency than the former. "Do it this instant" requires the utmost haste; "Do it this moment" admits of no hesitation or delay.

The flighty purpose never is o'ertook
Unless the deed go with it: from this moment
The very firstlings of my heart shall be
The firstlings of my hand. SHAKESPEARE.

This is not all: Patroclus, on the shore
Now pale and dead, shall succor Greece no more.
Fly to the fleet, this instant fly, and tell
The sad Achilles how his loved one fell. POPE.

MONASTERY. See CLOISTER.

MONEY, CASH.

Money (moneta) was originally stamped coin, and afterward any thing that generally takes its place in buying and selling.—Cash (from Fr. caisse, a chest) was originally coin kept on hand for immediate use; and hence cash payments are strictly payments in coin, though current notes are ordinarily received in such cases, because they can always be cashed at the bank.

To prevent abuses, it was found necessary to fix a public stamp upon certain quantities of such particular metals as were in those countries commonly made use of to purchase goods. Hence the origin of coined money and of those public offices called mints.
SMITH. Wealth of Nations.

He sent the thief that stole the cash away,
And punished him that put it in his way. POPE.

MONOMANIA. See INSANITY.

MOODY, GLOOMY.

Moody agrees with gloomy in being an unhappy state, but differs from it in expressing a wide range of fitful emotions, such as discontent, ill humor, peevishness, anger, &c.

Chide him reverently
When you perceive his blood inclined to mirth;
But being moody, give him line and scope,
Till that his passions, like a whale on ground,
Confound themselves with working.
SHAKESPEARE.

And moody madness laughing wild
Amid severest woe. GRAY.

I have, methinks, a kind of fever upon me, a certain gloominess within me, doubting, as it were, betwixt two passions. BEAUMONT & FLETCHER.

MORBID, DISEASED.

Morbid is sometimes used interchangeably with diseased, but is commonly applied, in a somewhat technical sense, to cases of a prolonged nature; as, a morbid condition of the nervous system, a morbid sensibility, &c.

We are all diseased,
And with our surfeiting and wanton hours,
Have brought ourselves into a burning fever.
SHAKESPEARE.

Of morbid hue his features, sunk and sad;
His hollow eyne shook forth a sickly light.
THOMSON.

Whilst the distempers of a relaxed fiber prognosticate and prepare all the morbid force of convulsion in the body of the state, the steadiness of the physician is overpowered by the very aspect of the disease.
BURKE.

Moreover, Besides.

Besides (by the side of) denotes simply that a connection exists between what has been said and what is now to be said; as, "Besides, I had not time to go then."—Moreover (more than all that) marks the addition of something particularly important to be considered; as, "Moreover, there were then obstacles in the way which I could not remove."

Mortification. See Chagrin.

Motherly, Maternal.

Motherly, being Saxon, is the more familiar word of the two when both have the same meaning.—Besides this, maternal is confined to the feelings of a mother toward her own children, whereas motherly (mother-like) has a secondary sense; as in the expression, motherly care, &c., denoting a care like that of a mother for her offspring. There is, perhaps, a growing tendency thus to separate the two, confining motherly to the latter signification.

They termed her the great mother, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren whilst young.
Raleigh.

When I see the motherly airs of my little daughters when playing with their puppets, I can not but flatter myself that their husbands and children will be happy in the possession of such wives and mothers.
Addison.

Motion. See Movement.

Motive, Inducement, Reason.

Motive is the word ordinarily used in speaking of that which determines the choice.—We call it an inducement when it is attractive in its nature, leading us forward by an appeal to our natural desires for good.—We call it a reason when it is more immediately addressed to the intellect in the form of argument.

By motive I mean the whole of that which moves, excites, or invites the mind to volition, whether that be one thing singly, or many things conjunctively.
Edwards.

He lives
Higher degree of life inducement strong
For us. Shakespeare.

I mask the business from the common eye
For sundry weighty reasons. Shakespeare.

To Mourn. See To Deplore.

Movement, Motion.

Motion expresses the general idea of "not being at rest;" movement points more especially to the agent or thing that moves, or the commencement of motion; as, the movements of an army, a movement in society, &c.

Cease, cease thou foaming ocean,
For what's thy troubled motion
To that within my breast. Gray.

Could the whole laws the rolling planets bind,
Describe or fix one movement of the mind.
Pope.

Multitude. See Throng.

Munificence. See Benevolence.

To Murder. See To Kill.

To Muse. See To Ponder.

Mute, Silent, Dumb.

One is silent who does not speak; one is dumb who can not, for want of the proper organs; as, a child born dumb, a dumb beast, &c.; and hence figuratively, we speak of a person as struck dumb with astonishment, &c. One is mute who is held back from speaking by some special cause; as, he was mute through fear, mute astonishment, &c. Such is the case with most of those who never speak from childhood; they are not ordinarily dumb, but mute because they are deaf, and therefore never learn to talk; and hence their more appropriate name is deaf-mutes.

Silent and in face
Confounded, long they sat as stricken mute.
Milton.

They speak not a word;
But like dumb statues, or unbreathing stones,
Stared each on other. Shakespeare.

They sung no more, or only sung his fame;
Struck dumb they all admired the godlike man.
Dryden.

All sat mute,
Pondering the danger with deep thoughts.
Milton.

Mutual. See Reciprocal.

Mutual, Common.

Common is applied to that which belongs alike, or in common, to the parties concerned; as, our common country, a common friend. Mutual implies an interchange of the thing spoken of between the parties; as, mutual friendship. Hence, to speak of "a mutual friend" (as if a friend could be interchanged) is a gross error; while it is proper to speak of having a mutual desire to promote the interests of a common friend or of our common country.

More pleasant is the life
Of faithful friends, that spend their goods in common without strife. Surrey.

Among unequals what society
Can sort, what harmony or true delight;
Which must be mutual, in proportion due
Given and received. Milton.

N.

Name, Appellation, Title, Denomination.

Name is generic, denoting that combination of sounds or letters by which a person or thing is known and distinguished. Appellation, (from appello, to call,) though sometimes put for name simply, denotes, more properly, a descriptive term, used by way of marking some individual peculiarity or characteristic; as, Charles the Bold, Philip the Stammerer. A title is a term employed to point out one's rank, office, &c.; as, the Duke of Bedford, Paul the Apostle, &c. Denomination (from de and nomino, to name) is to particular bodies what appellation is to individuals; thus the Church of Christ is divided into different denominations, as Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, &c.

Narration, Narrative. See Account.

Nasty, Wet, Filthy, Foul, Dirty.

Any thing nasty is wet or damp, (Ger. nass, wet,) and disgusts by its stickiness or odor. Not so with filthy and foul, which imply only that a thing is filled or covered with offensive matter; as, filthy clothing, foul vapors, &c. The English have a peculiar use of this word, calling a rain in fine drops a nasty rain, a day of such rain a nasty day, a sky which portends it a nasty sky, thus retaining the original sense of wet as the leading idea. They do the same with the word dirty, speaking of a dirty rain and a dirty day, &c.; and it is not improbable that this word, like the other, had originally the sense of wet.

Natal. See Native.

Nation. See People.

Native, Natural, Natal.

Natural refers to the nature (natura) of a thing, or that which springs therefrom.—Native (from nascor, natus) to one's birth or origin; as, a native country, language, &c.; natal (natalis) to the circumstances of one's birth; as, a natal day or star. Native talent is that which is inborn; natural talent is that which springs from the structure of the mind. Native eloquence is the result of strong innate emotion; natural eloquence is opposed to that which is studied or artificial.

To leave his wife, to leave his babes,
He wants the natural touch. Shakespeare.

And as a child when scaring sounds molest,
Clings close and closer to the mother's breast;
So the loud torrent and the whirlwind's roar,
But bind him to his native mountains more.
Goldsmith.

Propitious star whose sacred power
Presided o'er the monarch's natal hour,
Thy radiant voyages forever run. Prior.

Natural. See Native.

Nautical. See Naval.

Naval, Nautical.

Naval (from navis) is applied to ships or a navy; nautical (from nauta) to seamen and the art of navigation. Hence we speak of a naval as opposed to a military engagement; naval equipments or stores, a naval triumph, a naval officer, &c., and of nautical pursuits or instruction, nautical calculations, a nautical almanac, &c.

Virgil would insinuate, I suppose, the great advantages of cultivating a naval power, such as extended commerce and the dominion of the ocean. Jortin.

He elegantly showed by whom he was drawn, which depainted the nautical compass. Camden.

Necessity. See Need.

Need, Necessity.

Necessity is stronger than need; it places us under positive compulsion. We are frequently under the necessity of going without that of which we stand very greatly in need. It is so also with the corresponding adjectives; necessitous circumstances imply the direct pressure of suffering; needy circumstances, the want of aid or relief.

In thy native innocence proceed,
And summon all thy reason at thy need.
DRYDEN.

The art of our necessities is strange,
That can make vile things precious.
SHAKESPEARE.

NEFARIOUS. See INIQUITOUS.

NEGLECT. See NEGLIGENCE.

TO NEGLECT. See TO SLIGHT.

NEGLIGENCE, NEGLECT.

These two words are freely interchanged in our older writers; but a distinction has gradually sprung up between them.

As now generally used, negligence is the habit, and neglect the act of leaving things undone or unattended to. We are negligent as a general trait of character; we are guilty of neglect in particular cases, or in reference to individuals who had a right to our attentions. By neglecting to do what ought to be done we soon acquire habits of negligence. A clerk's neglect of his employer's directions often deprives him of his place.

Let stubborn pride possess thee long,
And be thou negligent of fame;
With every muse to grace thy song,
May'st thou despise a poet's name. SWIFT.

Rescue my poor remains from vile neglect,
With virgin honors let my hearse be decked,
And decent emblem. PRIOR.

NEIGHBORHOOD, VICINITY.

Neighborhood is Saxon; and vicinity (from vicinus, near) is Latin. Hence they differ (as happens in respect to some other words) in degree or strength. Vicinity does not denote so close a connection as neighborhood. A neighborhood is a more immediate vicinity. The houses immediately adjoining a square, are in the neighborhood of that square; those which are somewhat farther removed are in the vicinity of the square.

I could not bear
To leave thee in the neighborhood of death,
But flew in all the haste of love to find thee.
ADDISON.

There is a law of neighborhood which does not leave a man perfectly master on his own ground.

The reader has had a sketch of the interior of the Alhambra, and may be desirous of a general idea of its vicinity.

NEVERTHELESS. See HOWEVER.

NEW. See NOVEL.

NEWS. See TIDINGS.

NICE, PLEASING.

Nice implies a union of delicacy and exactness. In nice food, cookery, taste, &c., delicacy predominates; in nice discrimination, management, workmanship, a nice point to manage, &c., exactness predominates.

Of late, a new sense has been introduced which excludes them both, viz., pleasing; as, a nice girl, a nice party, a nice excursion, &c. We even hear it used for beautiful, as a nice morning, a nice day, &c. This use of the word, though sanctioned by no lexicographer, is extremely common among the English; and if Americans overdo as to "fine," they overdo as to "nice," but with this difference, that we always give the former its true sense [see FINE] while they rob the latter of its original and distinctive meaning.

NIGGARDLY. See AVARICIOUS.

NOISOME, NOXIOUS.

These words have to a great extent been interchanged; but there is now a tendency to make a distinction between them.

A thing which is noxious inflicts evil directly; as, a noxious plant, noxious practices, &c.; a thing which is noisome operates with a remoter influence; as, noisome vapors, a noisome pestilence, &c., and has the additional sense of disgusting.

A garden may be free from noxious weeds or animals; but if recently covered with manure it may be filled with a noisome smell.

Kill noxious animals, where 'tis sin to save,
This only just prerogative we have. DRYDEN.

The only prison that enslaves the soul
Is the dark habitation where she dwells
As in a noisome dungeon. BELLINGHAM.

NORMAL, REGULAR, ORDINARY.

Regular and ordinary are popular terms of well-known signification; normal has now a more specific sense, arising out of its use in science. A thing is normal, or in its normal state, when strictly conformed to those principles of its constitution which make it what it is. It is abnormal when it departs from those principles. A normal school is one where instruction is given in the art of teaching.

TO NOTICE. See TO REMARK.

NOTWITHSTANDING, IN SPITE OF, DESPITE.

These words and phrases are often interchanged, but there is a difference between them chiefly in strength.

Notwithstanding is the weaker term, and simply points to some obstacle that may exist; as, I shall go notwithstanding the rain.—In spite or despite of has reference primarily to active opposition to be encountered from others; as, "I'll be in man's despite a monarch;" "I'll keep mine own, despite of all the world."—SHAKESPEARE. Hence, these words when applied to things suppose greater opposition than notwithstanding; as, in spite of every difficulty, he at last succeeded. "In spite of all applications, the patient grew worse every day."—ARBUTHNOT.

The nature of the case, therefore, will decide which of the two shall be used. We should say, "He was thrust rudely out of doors, in spite of his entreaties," rather than "notwithstanding." On the other hand, it would be more civil to say, "Notwithstanding all you have said, I must still differ from you." "In spite of," might seem rude and ungentlemanly.

TO NOURISH. See TO NURTURE.

NOVEL, NEW.

Every thing at its first occurrence is new; a thing is novel when it is so much out of the ordinary course of things as to strike us with surprise. That is a new sight which is beheld for the first time; that is a novel sight which was either never seen before or is seen but seldom. We have daily new inventions, but a novel one supposes some very peculiar means of attaining its end. Novel theories are regarded with distrust, as likely to prove more ingenious than sound.

What's the newest grief?
—That of an hour's age doth hiss the speaker;
Each minute seems a new one. SHAKESPEARE.

Scenes must be beautiful which, daily viewed,

TO NURTURE, NOURISH, CHERISH.

Nourish (from Fr. nourice, a nurse) denotes to supply with food or cause to grow; as, to nourish a plant, to nourish rebellion. To nurture (from nutrio, to support) is to train up with a fostering care, like that of a mother; as, to nurture into strength, to nurture in sound principles; to cherish is to hold and treat as dear (Fr. chérir); as, to cherish hopes or affections.

Through her nourished powers enlarged by thee,
She springs aloft. THOMSON.

For this did the angel twice descend,
Ordained thy nurture holy, as of a plant
Select and sacred. MILTON.

Love thyself last; cherish those hearts that hate thee;
Corruption wins not more than honesty.
SHAKESPEARE.

OBDURATE, CALLOUS, HARDENED.

Callous denotes a deadening of the sensibilities; as, a callous conscience.—Hardened implies a general and settled disregard for the claims of interest, duty, and sympathy; as, hardened in vice.—Obdurate rises still higher (L. obduratus), and implies an active resistance of the heart and will against the pleadings of compassion and humanity.

Fattened in vice, so callous and so gross,
He sins and sees not, senseless of his loss.
DRYDEN.

And now his heart
Distends with pride and hardening in his strength,
Glories. MILTON.

There is no flesh in man's obdurate heart;
He does not feel for man. COWPER.

OBJECTIVE, SUBJECTIVE.

Objective is applied to things which are exterior to the mind, and objects of its attention; subjective to the operations of the mind itself. Hence, an objective motive is some outward thing awakening desire; a subjective motive is some internal feeling or propensity. Objective views are those which are governed by outward things; subjective views are produced or modified by internal feeling. Walter Scott's poetry is chiefly objective; that of Wordsworth is eminently subjective.

In the philosophy of mind, subjective denotes what is to be refered to the thinking subject, the ego; objective what belongs to the object of thought, the non ego.

Philosophy, being the essence of knowledge, and the science of knowledge supposing, in its most fundamental and thorough going analysis, the distinction of the subject and object of knowledge, it is evident that to philosophy the subject of knowledge would be by preëminence the subject, and the object of knowledge the object. It was therefore natural that the object and objective, the subject and subjective should be employed by philosophers as simple terms, compendiously to denote the grand discrimination about which philosophy was constantly employed, and which no others could be found so precisely and promptly to express. SIR W. HAMILTON.

OBLIGING, KIND, COMPLAISANT.

One is kind who desires to see others happy; one is complaisant who endeavors to make them so in social intercourse by attentions calculated to please; one who is obliging performs some actual service, or has the disposition to do so. We may be kind without being obtrusive, obliging without being officious, and complaisant without being servile.

Obliging creatures! make me see
All that disgraced my betters, met in me. POPE.

By the kind gods, 'tis most ignobly done
To pluck me by the beard. SHAKESPEARE.

Scarce to wise Peters complaisant enough,
And something said of Charters much too rough.
POPE.

OBSCURITY. See DARKNESS.

OBSEQUIOUS. See YIELDING.

OBSERVANCE, OBSERVATION.

These words branch out from two distinct senses of observe. (1.) To observe means to keep strictly; as, to observe the Sabbath; and hence observance denotes the keeping of a rule or law with strictness; as, the observance of the Sabbath, &c. (2.) To observe means to consider attentively, or remark; and hence observation denotes either the act of observing, or some remark made as the result thereof. Hence we ought not to say the observation of the Sabbath, &c., though the word was formerly so used.

The Pharisees were curious in external observances; the astronomers are curious in celestial observations.

Love rigid honesty,
And strict observance of impartial laws.
ROSCOMMON.

OBSERVATION. See OBSERVANCE.

TO OBSERVE. See TO REMARK.

OBSTACLE. See IMPEDIMENT.

OBSTINACY, PERTINACITY.

Pertinacity (from per and teneo) denotes great firmness in holding on to a thing; as, pertinacity of opinion, &c.—Obstinacy (from ob and teneo) is great firmness in holding out against persuasion, attack, &c.; as obstinacy of will. The former consists in adherence, the latter in resistance. Pertinacity is often used in a good sense; obstinacy is almost always taken in a bad one; but not so the adjective obstinate, for we speak with applause of the obstinate defense of a fortress, &c.

In this reply was included a very gross mistake, and if with pertinacity maintained, a capital error.

OBSTINATE. See STUBBORN.

OBSTRUCTION, OBSTACLE.

Obstacle is stronger than obstruction; the latter (from obstruo) serves to impede or hinder; the former (from obsto) acts with direct resistance. We remove obstructions; we surmount obstacles.

Disparity in age seems a greater obstacle to an intimate friendship than inequality of fortune.
COLLIER.

Here the king met with all the obstructions and difficulties his enraged enemies could lay in his way.
CLARENDON.

TO OBTAIN, GET, GAIN, ACQUIRE.

The idea of getting is common to all these terms. We may, indeed, with only a slight change of sense, substitute get for either of them; as, to get or to gain a prize; to get or to obtain an employment; to get or to acquire a language.—To gain is to get by striving; and as this is often a part of our good fortune, the word gain is peculiarly applicable to whatever comes to us fortuitously. Thus, we gain a victory, we gain a cause, we gain an advantage, &c.—To obtain (from ob and teneo, to hold on to) excludes the idea of chance, and implies some effort directed to the attainment of that which is not immediately within our reach. Whatever we thus seek, and get, we obtain, whether by our own exertions or those of others; whether by good or bad means; whether permanently or only for a time. Thus a man obtains an employment, he obtains the information he desired, he obtains an answer to a letter, &c.—To acquire (from ad and quæro, to seek after) is more limited and specific. We acquire by our own efforts, while we obtain by the efforts of others as well as ourselves; as, to acquire property, reputation, &c. We acquire what comes to us gradually in the regular exercise of our abilities, while we obtain what comes in any way, provided we desire it. Thus we acquire knowledge, honor, &c. What we acquire becomes, to a great extent, permanently our own; as, to acquire a language, to acquire habits of industry, &c. Even when we speak of acquiring property, we regard it for the time being as a permanent possession, though it may afterwards be taken away.

TO OBTRUDE, INTRUDE.

To intrude is to thrust one's self into a place, society, &c., without right, or uninvited; to obtrude is to force one's self, remarks, opinions, &c., upon persons with whom he has no such intimacy as to justify such boldness.

Forgive me, fair one, if officious friendship
Intrudes on your repose, and comes thus late
To greet you with the tidings of success. ROWE.

In vain, where no acceptance it can find?"

ODD. See QUAINT.

ODIUM, HATRED.

Hatred is a thing we exercise; odium is a thing we endure; in this sense, the former is active and the latter passive. We speak of having a hatred for a man, but not of having an odium toward him. A tyrant incurs the hatred of all good men, and, by his actions, brings upon himself the public odium. The odium of an offense may sometimes fall unjustly upon one who is innocent.

"I wish I had a cause to seek him there,
To oppose his hatred fully."

Inventors of new taxes being hateful to the people, seldom fail of bringing odium on their master.

OPPORTUNITY, OCCASION.

An occasion (from ob and cadere) is that which falls in our way, or presents itself in the course of events; an opportunity (from ob and portus) is a convenience or fitness of time, place, &c., for the doing of a thing. Hence, opportunities often spring out of occasions. We may have occasion to meet a person frequently without getting an opportunity to converse with him (as we desire) on a given subject. We act as the occasion may require; we embrace or improve an opportunity.

How all occasions do inform against me,
And spur my dull revenge! SHAKESPEARE.

Farewell! I will omit no opportunity,
That may convey my greetings, love, to thee.
SHAKESPEARE.

OPTION, CHOICE.

Option (from L. optio) is liberty to choose, and has respect to freedom from external constraint in the act of choosing; choice is an act of the will itself. We leave a thing to a man's option, and he makes his choice. "While they talk we must make our choice, they or the jacobins. We have no other option."—BURKE.

ORDINARY. See NORMAL.

ORDINARY, COMMON.

A thing is common in which many persons share or partake; as, a common practice. A thing is ordinary when it is apt to come round in the orderly or regular succession of events; as, the ordinary course. When used in the sense of inferior, ordinary marks a want of that which distinguishes; as, an ordinary face; common denotes the want of that which attracts or interests.

"It was long the common opinion that the sun turned round the earth. It is the ordinary employment of astronomers to observe the motions of the heavenly bodies.—A man of ordinary understanding need not be misled by false reasoning. A common mind busies itself with common objects."—CRABB.

ORIGIN, SOURCE.

Origin (from orior) denotes the rise or commencement of a thing; source presents itself under the image of a fountain flowing forth in a continuous stream of influences. The origin of moral evil has been much disputed, but no one can doubt that it is the source of most of the calamities of our race.

"No. I think he would have set out just as he did, with the origin of ideas: the proper starting post of a grammarian who is to treat of their signs."—TOOKE.

OUGHT, SHOULD.

Both words imply obligation, but ought is the stronger. Should denotes an obligation of propriety, expediency, &c.; ought denotes an obligation of duty. We should be neat in our persons; we should avoid giving offense. We ought to speak truth; we ought to obey the laws.

OVER ONE'S SIGNATURE, &C., UNDER ONE'S SIGNATURE, &C.

It has always been English usage to say "under one's signature," as we say "under one's hand," "under one's seal." Some, in this country, have imagined "over one's signature" to be more correct; but they forget that the reference is to the paper containing the instrument or mass of thought to be verified. This is under the hand in signing, as it is under the seal when affixed, though, in either case, the written words may be above. Hence, unless we are ready to say, "over one's hand and seal," we ought not to say over one's signature.

Mr. Pickering, in his Vocabulary of Americanisms, when speaking on this subject says, "A few of our writers still countenance this unwarrantable innovation; but the principle, on which it is defended would unsettle the whole language. The use of the word under, in phrases like those above mentioned, is as well established as any English idiom," and goes on to prove it by adducing numerous instances from the best English authors. It may be doubted, indeed, whether any writer in Great Britain was ever betrayed into the use of over for under, in this connection.

Mr. Hoffman, editor of the New York Literary World says in reply to a correspondent, "Had our friend U., of Philadelphia, duly meditated this matter, he never would have sent us a letter with such an unpoetical expression in it as the very common blunder of 'over the signature.' As a lawyer he must at least be more or less familiar with the phrase 'given under my hand and seal,' as a true English idiom, albeit the hand and seal (which in this instance constitute 'the signature') are placed at the bottom of the document. We do not talk of a vessel sailing 'over' the flag of the United States, when her ensigns are sent below at sunset!"

PAGAN, GENTILE, HEATHEN.

Gentile (from gens) was applied to the other nations of the earth as opposed to the Jews. Pagan (from paganus, a villager) was the name given to idolaters in the early Christian church, because the villagers, being most remote from the centers of instruction, remained for a long time unconverted.—Heathen (Sax. heathen, one living in the country) has the same origin. Pagan is now more properly applied to rude and uncivilized idolaters, while heathen embraces all who practice idolatry.

PAINTING. See PICTURE.

PAIR, FLIGHT, SET.

Originally, pair was not confined to two things, but was applied to any number of pares, or equal things, that go together. Ben Jonson speaks of a pair (set) of chess-men; also he and Lord Bacon speak of a pair (pack) of cards. A "pair of stairs" was, in like manner, the original expression, as given by the earlier lexicographers, Howell, &c., and is still in general use, though flight was also introduced at a later period.

TO PALLIATE, EXTENUATE, CLOAK.

These words, as here compared, are used in a figurative sense in reference to our treatment of wrong action.

We cloak (cover as if with a cloak) in order completely to conceal. We extenuate a crime (from ex and tenuis) when we endeavor to show that it is less than has been supposed; we palliate a crime (from pallium, a cloak) when we endeavor to cover or conceal its enormity, at least in part. This naturally leads us to soften some of its features, and thus palliate approaches toward extenuate till they have become nearly or quite identical.

"To palliate is not now used, though it once was, in the sense of wholly cloaking or covering over, as it might be, our sins, but in that of extenuating; to palliate our faults is not to hide them altogether, but to seek to diminish their guilt in part."—TRENCH on Words.

PARADE, OSTENTATION.

Parade (from paratus, a fitting out or setting forth) is a pompous exhibition of things for the purpose of display; ostentation (from ostendo, to show forth) now generally indicates a parade of virtues or other qualities for which one expects to be honored.

"Parade is a forced effort to attract notice; as, when a man makes a parade of his wealth, his knowledge, his charities; ostentation includes the purpose for which the display is made, viz., to be seen and applauded by others."—CRABB. "It was not in the mere parade of royalty that the Mexican potentates exhibited their power."—ROBERTSON. PASSION, FEELING, EMOTION.

When any feeling or emotion completely masters the mind, we call it a passion; as, a passion for music, dress, &c.; especially is anger (when thus extreme) called passion. The mind, in such cases, is considered as having lost its self-control, and become the passive instrument of the feeling in question.

All the other passions fleet to air,
As doubtful thoughts and rash embrac'd despair.
SHAKESPEARE.

Cruel his eye, but cast
Signs of remorse and passion, to behold
The fellows of his crime condemn'd
For ever now to have their lot in pain.
MILTON.

The term passion, and its adverb passionately, often express a very strong predilection for any pursuit, or object of taste; a kind of enthusiastic fondness for any thing. COGAN.

Patience, Resignation.

Patience (from patior, to suffer) refers to the quietness or self-possession of one's own spirit under sufferings, provocations, &c.; resignation (from re and signo, to sign away) to his submission to the will of another. The stoic may be patient; the Christian is both patient and resigned.

In medical language, a person oppressed with disease is called a patient, or an involuntary sufferer, and the calmness with which he submits is called patience, that is, the mind yields with tranquillity to the pains and indispositions of the body.—Cogan.

Resignation superadds to patience a submissive disposition respecting the intelligent cause of our uneasiness. It acknowledges both the power and the right of a superior to afflict.—Cogan.

Peaceable, Peaceful.

Peaceable describes the state of an individual, nation, &c., in reference to external hostility, attack, &c.; peaceful, in respect to internal disturbance. The former denotes "in the spirit of peace;" the latter, "in the possession or enjoyment of peace." A peaceable disposition; a peaceable adjustment of difficulties; a peaceful life.

> What do these worthies,
> But rob, and spoil, burn, slaughter, and enslave
> Peaceable nations. Milton.

> As one disarm'd, his anger all he lost;
> And thus with peaceful words upraised her soon.
> Milton.

Peaceful. See Peaceable.

Peculiar, Special, Especial.

Peculiar is from the Roman peculium, which was a thing emphatically and distinctively one's own, and hence was dear. The former sense always belongs to peculiar; as, a peculiar style, peculiar manners, &c.; and usually so much of the latter as to involve feelings of interest; as, peculiar care, watchfulness, satisfaction, &c. Nothing of this kind belongs to special and especial. They mark simply the relation of species to genus, and denote that there is something in this case more than ordinary; as, a special act of Congress; especial pains, &c.

> And beheld
> Beauty, which either waking or asleep
> Shot forth peculiar graces. Milton.

> The gods still listen'd to their constant prayer,
> And made the poets their peculiar care.
> Pitt.

> Naught so vile that on the earth doth live,
> But to the earth some special good doth give.
> Shakespeare.

People, Nation.

When speaking of a state we use people for the mass of the community, as distinguished from their rulers, and nation for the entire political body, including the rulers. In another sense of the term, nation (from natus) describes those who are descended from the same stock; and in this sense the Germans regard themselves as one nation, though politically subject to different forms of government.

> If lawe stoude with the right,
> The people is glad and stout vpright. Gower.

> Mountains interposed
> Make enemies of nations, who had else
> Like kindred drops been mingled into one.
> Cowper.

To Perceive, Discern.

To perceive a thing (from per and capio, to take in) is to apprehend it as presented to the senses or the intellect; to discern (from dis and cerno, to separate) is to mark differences, or to see a thing as distinguished from others around it. We may perceive a man and a woman afar off, without being able to discern which is the one and which the other.—Discern, however, is more commonly used in a figurative sense.

We perceive that which is clear or obvious; we discern that which is remote, or which requires much attention to get an idea of it.

"We perceive by a person's looks and words what he intends; we discern the drift of his actions. We perceive light, darkness, colors, or the truth or falsehood of any thing. We discern characters, motives, the tendency and consequences of actions, &c. A child may perceive according to the quickness of its senses; it is the act of a man to discern according to the measure of his knowledge and understanding."—Crabb.

To Perjure, Forswear.

These words have been interchanged to a great extent by our best writers. In modern usage, however, there is a tendency to separate them, unless it be in poetry.

Forswear (from for, against, and swear) applies to all kinds of oaths. Perjure (from per and juro, to swear) applies in a legal sense, (which is now becoming the general one,) to oaths administered by a civil magistrate. A subject forswears himself when he breaks his oath of allegiance; a witness perjures himself when he swears to what he knows to be false.

> I firmly vow
> Never to woo her more; but do forswear her,
> As one unworthy all the former favors.
> Shakespeare.

"Perjury is a crime committed when a lawful oath is administered in some judicial proceeding, to a person who swears wilifully, absolutely and falsely, in a matter material to the issue or point in question."—Blackstone.

Permanent. See Lasting.

Permission. See Leave.

To Permit, Allow, Suffer.

To permit (from permitto, to give leave) is more positive, denoting a decided assent, either directly or by implication. To allow (from ad and loco, to let) is more negative, and imports only acquiescence or an abstinence from prevention. To suffer (from sub and fero, to bear) is used in cases where our feelings are adverse, but we do not think best to resist. The instructor of a school may suffer some things to pass unnoticed, which he does not allow; and may allow certain practices, at least for a time, which he would by no means directly permit. When we say, in social intercourse, "allow me to do this," the expression is not so strong as, "permit me to do this," which implies a more positive acquiescence. "Suffer me to do this" is stronger, and supposes that there may be something unpleasant in the thing proposed.

Perpetual. See Constant.

To Perplex. See To Embarrass.

To Persevere, Continue, Persist.

The idea of not laying aside is common to these words.

Continue is the generic term, denoting simply to do as one has done hitherto. To persevere (from per and severus, very strict or rigid) is to continue in a given course in spite of discouragements, &c., from a desire to obtain our end. To persist (from per and sisto, to stand firm throughout) is to continue from a determination of will not to give up. The former is always used in a good sense, the latter frequently in a bad one.

"We continue in some course of action from habit or casualty; we persevere from reflection and the exercise of one's judgment; we persist either from attachment or from a general fixity and determination of character."—"Persevere is applied only to matters of some importance which demand a steady purpose of the mind; persist is used in respect to the ordinary business of life, as well as on more important occasions. A learner perseveres in his studies; a child may persist in making a request, until he has obtained the object of his desire."—Crabb.

Perverse, Froward.

One who is froward (from fro, against, and ward, lit., looking away from) is capricious, and reluctant to obey. One who is perverse (from perversus, lit., distorted) has a settled obstinacy of will, and likes or dislikes by the rule of contradiction to the will of others.

"Frowardness lies in the temper and spirit; it chooses to please itself without regard to others; it is fitful and changeable. To fret and repine at every disappointment of our wishes is to discover the temper of froward children."—BLAIR. "Perversity lies deeper; taking root in the heart it assumes the shape of malignity; a perverse temper is really wicked; it likes or dislikes by the rule of contradiction to another's will."—CRABB. "Interference of interest, or perversity of disposition, may occasionally lead individuals to oppose, even to hate, the upright and the good."—BLAIR.

PICTURE, PAINTING.

Every kind of drawing is a picture, whether in pencil, crayons, or india-ink, &c.; a painting is a representation by means of color. This holds good in a figurative sense; the historian draws a lively picture, the poet paints in glowing colors.

Justice is pictured blind, not because it is to be without the eye of knowledge, but the eye of partiality. SMITH.

True poetry the painter's power displays;
True painting emulates the poet's lays;
The rival sisters fond of equal fame,

PIECE, DISTANCE.

The radical idea is that of something separate or distinct; as, a piece of timber or land, a piece of music or composition, a piece of work, a piece of ordnance. All of a piece means all of the same sort. Some, among our common people, use piece for distance in phrases like this: "He went forward a piece," meaning over a piece or portion of the road. It is hardly necessary to say that such an expression has no sanction in good usage, and ought to be avoided as a gross vulgarism.

PIETY. See RELIGION.

PILGRIMAGE. See JOURNEY.

PILLAGE, PLUNDER.

Pillage (Fr. piller, to strip or peel) refers particularly to the act of stripping the sufferers of their goods, while plunder (Ger. plündern, to bear off) refers to the removal of the things thus taken. Under these aspects the words are freely interchanged.

I fear me, messenger, to feast my train
Within a town of war so lately pillaged,
Will be too costly, and too troublesome.
MARLOW.

Let loose the murmuring army on their masters,
To pay themselves with plunder. OTWAY.

PIQUE, SPITE, GRUDGE.

Pique (Fr. piquer, to prick or sting) denotes a quick sense of resentment for some supposed neglect or injury, but the feeling is not usually permanent or marked by malevolence. Spite is a stronger term, denoting settled ill-will or malice, with a desire to injure, as the result of extreme irritation. Grudge (lit., a murmuring) goes still further, denoting cherished and secret enmity with an unforgiving spirit.

A pique is usually of recent date; a grudge is that which has long subsisted; spite more usually implies a disposition to cross or vex others in trifling matters.

Out of a personal pique to those in service, he stands as a looker on, when the government is attacked. ADDISON.

There is some grudge between 'em; 'tis not meet
They be alone. SHAKESPEARE.

Done all, to spite
The great Creator; but their spite still serves
His glory to augment. MILTON.

PITIFUL. See CONTEMPTIBLE.

PITY, SYMPATHY, COMPASSION.

Sympathy is literally fellow-feeling, and therefore requires a certain degree of equality in situation, circumstances, &c., to its fullest exercise. Compassion (from cum and patior, to suffer with) is deep tenderness for another under severe or inevitable misfortune. Pity regards its object not only as suffering but weak, and hence as inferior. Scott, speaking of the Douglas, says,—

"And last, and worst to spirit proud,
Had borne the pity of the crowd."

True love's the gift which God has given,
To man alone beneath the heaven.
It is the secret sympathy,
The silver link, the silken tie
Which heart to heart and mind to mind
In body and in soul can bind. SCOTT.

Compassion is that species of affection, which is excited, either by the actual distress of its object or by some impending calamity which appears inevitable. COGAN.

PLAUSIBLE, SPECIOUS.

Both these words have a bad sense.

Plausible (from plausibilis, sounding well) denotes that which seems to satisfy the ear, and yet leaves distrust in the judgment.—Specious (from speciosus, making a fair show) describes that which carries a fair appearance to the eye, and yet may cover something false. Many plausible arguments and specious pretenses have been brought forward to defend the cause of wickedness.

"An excuse is plausible when the well-connected narrative of the maker impresses a belief of its justice; it is specious when its fallacy is easily discernible through the thin guise it wears."—CRABB.

"In this superficial way indeed, the mind is capable of more variety of plausible talk, but it is not enlarged as it should be in its knowledge."—LOCKE.

"The guardian directs one of his pupils to think with the wise, but speak with the vulgar. This is a precept specious enough, but not always practicable."—JOHNSON.

PLEASANT, PLEASING, AGREEABLE.

Pleasant is more particularly applied to things in the concrete; as, pleasant weather, a pleasant day, ride, situation, &c. A late English writer says, "It was formerly used to describe merry and playful conversation, or a jocose and lively person, but is now in a great measure withdrawn from persons and applied to things."—When we apply pleasing to things, it is usually in their abstract relations; as, a pleasing variety, interchange, &c. In respect to persons, pleasing is generally used to describe personal qualities; as, a pleasing address, countenance, &c.—Agreeable is more used of social qualities and relations; as, an agreeable conversation, agreeable society, &c. These distinctions, however, are not in all cases very accurately observed.

PLEASING. See NICE, also PLEASANT.

PLEDGE. See EARNEST.

PLENTEOUS. See AMPLE.

PLENTY. See ABUNDANCE.

PLUNDER, BAGGAGE, LUGGAGE.

In some of the Western States a traveler's luggage is familiarly called plunder. This strange use of the term is probably derived from the Germans, who abound in that quarter, plunder being a vulgar term in German for baggage, from plündern, to bear or carry of.

"An American," says S. T. Coleridge, "by his boasting of the superiority of the Americans generally, but more especially in their language, once provoked me to tell him that 'on that head the least said the better, as the Americans presented the extraordinary anomaly of a people without a language—that they had mistaken the English language for baggage (which is called plunder in America) and had stolen it.'" CONVERSATIONS AND RECOLLECTIONS.

PLUNDER. See PILLAGE.

POISON, VENOM.

Poison (from Fr. poison, derived from Lat. potio, a drink) usually denotes something received into the system by the mouth, breath, &c. Venom (from L. venenum) is something applied externally or discharged from animals, as by the bite or sting of serpents, scorpions, &c. Venom is also more active and malignant in its operation than poison, and hence is a stronger term.

The figurative sense of these terms corresponds to the literal one. What is poisonous is received into the mind; what is venomous acts from abroad. Bad principles are poisonous; the shafts of envy are venomous.

Like him that knew not poison's power to kill,
Until, by tasting it, himself was slain. DAVIES.

As the venom spread,
Frightful convulsions writhed his tortured limbs.
FENTON.

POLICY. See POLITY.

POLITENESS, COURTESY.

Politeness (from Gr. polis, a city) denotes that ease and gracefulness of manners which first sprung up in cities, connected with a desire to please others by anticipating their wants and wishes, and studiously avoiding whatever might give them pain. Courtesy is, etymologically, that modification of politeness which belongs to courts. It displays itself in the address and manners; it is shown more especially in receiving and entertaining others, and is a union of dignified complaisance and kindness.

As in smooth oil the razor best is whet,
So wit is by politeness keenest set. YOUNG.

Courtesy is sooner found in lowly sheds
With smoky rafters, than in tap'stry halls
And courts of princes, where it first was named.
MILTON.

POLITY, POLICY.

These two words were originally the same. Polity is now confined to the structure of a government; as, civil or ecclesiastical polity; while policy is applied to the management of public affairs; as, foreign or domestic policy. Policy has the further sense of skillful or cunning management.

Nor is it possible that any form of polity, much less polity ecclesiastical, should be good, unless God himself be author of it. HOOKER.

The best rule of policy is to prefer the doing of justice before all enjoyments. CHARLES.

POLTROON. See COWARD.

TO PONDER, CONSIDER, MUSE.

To consider (lit., to sit down by) means to view or contemplate with fixed thought. To ponder (lit., to weigh) denotes to dwell upon with long and anxious attention, with a view to some practical result or decision. To muse is simply to think upon continuously with no definite object, or for the pleasure it gives. We consider any subject which is fairly brought before us; we ponder a concern involving great interests; we muse on the events of childhood.

Yea, at that very moment,
Consideration like an angel came,
And whipped the offending Adam out of him.
SHAKESPEARE.

This ponder, that all nations of the earth
Shall in his seed be blessed. MILTON.

And looking lively gratitude. THOMSON.

POPULACE. See MOB.

PORTION, PART.

Part (from L., pars) is generic, having a simple reference to some whole. Portion (from L. portio, a share or part divided off) has the additional idea of being detached from a whole, usually with a view to its being allotted to some object; as, a portion of one's time, a portion of the day, a portion of Scripture.

Of heavenly part, and part of earthly blood,
A mortal woman mixing with a god. DRYDEN.

In battles won, fortune a part did claim,
And soldiers have their portion in the same.
WALLER.

TO POSSESS, HAVE.

Have is the word naturally used. To possess denotes to have "as a possession." A man does not possess his wife and children: they are (so to speak) part of himself. For the same reason, we have (not possess) the faculties of reason, understanding, will, &c., an elegant taste, a sound judgment, &c.: they are exercises of the mind, not possessions. We can, however, in certain connections, speak of a man as possessing an elegant taste or a sound judgment; but in such cases our attention is commonly turned to some use he is to make of them, and hence they are naturally regarded as distinct from himself, and as part of his "possession." Some overlook the fact that have is the leading term, and use possess when there is nothing specific in the case to require its use.

POSSIBLE. See PRACTICABLE.

TO POSTPONE. See TO ADJOURN.

POSTURE. See ATTITUDE.

POVERTY, INDIGENCE, PAUPERISM.

Poverty is a relative term: what is poverty to a gentleman would be competence for a day-laborer. Indigence implies extreme distress, and almost absolute destitution. Pauperism denotes entire dependence upon public charity, and is therefore a hopeless and degraded state.

Such madness, as for fear of death to die,
Is to be poor for fear of poverty. DENHAM.

For even that indigence that brings me low,
Makes me myself, and him above to know.
DRYDEN.

PRACTICABLE, POSSIBLE.

A thing may be possible, i. e., not forbidden by any law of nature, and yet may not now be practicable for want of the means requisite to its performance. Archimedes thought it possible to lift the world, but this has not been found as yet practicable.

TO PRAISE, APPLAUD, EXTOL.

To praise is literally to raise high; to applaud is to greet with clapping; to extol is to bear aloft. We may praise in the exercise of calm judgment; we usually applaud from impulse, and on account of some specific act; we extol under the influence of high admiration, and usually in strong if not extravagant language.

Will God incense his ire
For such a petty trespass, and not praise
Rather your dauntless virtue. MILTON.

I would applaud thee to the very echo,
That should applaud again. SHAKESPEARE.

Heaven and earth shall high extol
Thy praises, with th'innumerable sound
Of hymns. MILTON.

PRECARIOUS, UNCERTAIN.

Precarious is stronger than uncertain. Derived originally from the Latin precor, it first signified "granted to entreaty," and hence "wholly dependent on the will of another." Thus it came to express the highest species of uncertainty, and is applied to such things as depend wholly on future casualties.

This little happiness is so very precarious, that it wholly depends on the will of others. ADDISON.

With certain pain, uncertain of relief,
True emblem of a wretched lover's grief.
GRANVILLE.

PRECEDENT, EXAMPLE.

An example is a similar case which may serve as a rule or guide, but has no authority out of itself. A precedent is something which comes down to us from the past with the sanction of usage and of common consent. We quote examples in literature and precedents in law.

So hot a speed, with such advice disposed,
Such temperate order in so fierce a course,
Doth want example. SHAKESPEARE.

No power in Venice
Can alter a decree established;
'T will be recorded for a precedent;
And many an error, by the same example,
Will rush into the state. SHAKESPEARE.

PRECISE. See ACCURATE.

PRECISENESS. See PRECISION.

PRECISION, PRECISENESS.

Both these words are from the Latin præ and cido, to cut down to some rule or standard; but they now differ in their sense and application.

Precision denotes a strict conformity to rule as opposed to everything vague, indefinite or uncertain, and is always used in a good sense; as, precision of thought or language; precision in military evolutions, &c. Preciseness is frequently taken in a bad one, especially when applied to persons or their conduct, denoting an excess of nicety, formal manners, &c. Precise is also sometimes applied to individuals in the sense of over-strict or scrupulous in trifles.

He that thinks of being in general thinks never of any particular species of being: unless he can think of it with and without precision at the same time.
LOCKE.

When you have fixed proper hours for particular studies, keep to them, not with a superstitious preciseness, but with some good degrees of a regular constancy. WATTS.

PREDICABLE. See PREDICATE.

PREDICAMENT. See CATEGORY, also PREDICATE.

TO PREDICATE, FOUND, or BASE.

Some able men among our lawyers and statesmen use predicate for found or base; as, to predicate an argument on certain principles, to predicate a statement on information received. This is wholly opposed to English usage. Predicate is a term in logic, and used only in a single case, viz., when we affirm one thing of another.

Similitude is not predicated of essences or substances but of figures and qualities only.
CADWORTH.

PREDICATE, PREDICABLE, and PREDICAMENT.

These words are all derived from prædicare, to affirm. A predicate is that which is actually affirmed of any one; as, wisdom of Peter. A predicable is that which may be affirmed of many; as, sun may be affirmed of other suns besides that of our system. A predicament is a series, order, or arrangement of predicates and predicables in some genus, as substance, or quality.—FLEMING.

Pretense, Pretext.

A pretense (prætensum) is something held out as real when it is not so, thus falsifying the truth. A pretext (prætextus) is something woven up in order to cover or conceal one's true motives, feelings, or ends of action. The piety of the Pharisees was all a pretense, and their long prayers were a pretext to conceal their hypocrisy.

Crabb is erroneous in saying, that a "pretext" is always wrong, and "serves to hide something seriously culpable or wicked." We do in most cases use the word in a bad sense; and yet we could speak of a person in company, as "making a pretext for leaving the room," without implying, that he was guilty of any thing "culpable or wicked" in so doing.

With flying speed and seeming great pretense
Came running in a messenger. Spenser.

He made pretext, that I should only go
And help convey his freight; but thought not so.
Chapman.

Prevalent, Prevailing.

What customarily prevails is prevalent; as, a prevalent fashion. What actually prevails is prevailing; as, the prevailing winds are west. Hence, prevailing is the livelier and more pointed word, since it represents a thing in action. It is sometimes the stronger word, since a thing may prevail sufficiently to be called prevalent, and yet require greater strength to make it actually prevailing.—We may add, that prevalent may be used either before or after its noun; as, the prevalent winds are west, or, the west winds are prevalent; while prevailing can be used only before its noun; as, the prevailing wind is west. In other words, prevailing can not be used as a predicate.

To Prevaricate, Evade, Equivocate.

One who evades a question ostensibly answers it, but really turns aside to some other point; he who equivocates uses words which have a double meaning, so that in one sense he can claim to have said the truth, though he does in fact deceive, and intends to do it: he who prevaricates (lit., straddles the point) talks all round the question, hoping to "dodge" it and disclose nothing.

In this point charge him home, that he affects
Tyrannic power; if he evade us there,
Inforce him with his envy to the people.
Shakespeare.

But yet your false equivocating tongue,
Your looks, your eyes, your every motion promised.
Smith.

For I desire to think better of him than that he would willfully prevaricate. Stillingfleet.

Pride, Vanity.

Pride is an over-valuing of one's self for some real or imagined superiority, as rank, wealth, talents, &c.; vanity is the love of being admired (not merely approved) so that he who is vain has a secret feeling of pleasure at being praised for excellence, which he is perfectly conscious of not possessing. Pride is, etymologically, a being "puffed up," and denotes an inflated spirit of self-importance, with a corresponding disregard or contempt for others: vanity is, etymologically, "emptiness," and the term was transferred to the feeling in question, because nothing can be more empty or delusive as a source of enjoyment. If the former is more hateful, the latter is more contemptible.

Pride hath no glass
To shew itself, but pride; for supple knees
Feed arrogance, and are the proud man's fees.
Shakespeare.

'Tis an old maxim in the schools,
That vanity 's the food of fools. Swift.

Priory. See Cloister.

Privilege, Prerogative.

Privilege, among the Romans, was something conferred upon an individual by a private law (privata lege), and hence it denotes some peculiar benefit or advantage, some right or immunity not enjoyed by the world at large. Prerogative, among the Romans, was the right of speaking first, and hence it denotes a right of precedence, or of doing certain acts or enjoying certain privileges to the exclusion of others. It is the privilege of a member of Congress not to be called in question elsewhere for words uttered in debate; it is the prerogative of the President to ratify treaties with the consent of the Senate. It is the privilege of a Christian child to be instructed in the true religion; it is the prerogative of a parent to govern and direct his offspring.

He claims his privilege, and says 'tis fit,
Nothing should be the judge of wit, but wit.
Denham.

Our prerogative
Calls not your counsels, but our natural goodness
Imparts this. Shakespeare.

Probity, Integrity.

Probity (from probo, to prove) means, etymologically, virtue which has been tried and proved genuine. Hence it denotes unimpeachable honesty and virtue, shown especially by the performance of those obligations called imperfect, which the laws of the state do not reach and can not enforce. Integrity (from integer, entire or unbroken) denotes a wholehearted honesty, and especially that which excludes all injustice that might favor one's self. It has a peculiar reference to uprightness in mutual dealings, transfers of property, and the execution of trusts for others.

So near approach we their celestial kind,
By justice, truth, and probity, of mind.
Pope.

Macduff, this noble passion,
Child of integrity, hath from my soul
Wiped the black scruples, reconciled my thoughts
To thy good truth and honor. Shakespeare.

To Proclaim. See To Announce.

Prodigal. See Profuse.

Profligate. See Abandoned.

Profuse, Lavish, Prodigal.

Profuse (from pro and fundo, to pour forth) denotes pouring out (as money, &c.) with great fullness or exuberance; as, profuse in his expenditures, thanks, promises, &c. Lavish (supposed by Richardson to be from lave, to draw out or exhaust) is stronger, implying unnecessary or wasteful excess; as, lavish of his bounties, favors, praises, &c. Prodigality (from prodigus, wasteful) is stronger still, denoting unmeasured or reckless profusion; as, prodigal of one's strength, life, or blood to secure some object.

Oh liberty, thou goddess heavenly bright,
Profuse of bliss, and pregnant with delight.
Addison.

The dame has been too lavish of her feast,
And fed him till he loaths. Rowe.

Here patriots live, who, for their country's good,
In fighting fields were prodigal of blood.
Dryden.

To Prohibit, Forbid.

To forbid (from for, against, and bid, to say) is Saxon, and is more familiar; to prohibit (from pro, and habeo, to have) is Latin, and is more formal or official. A parent forbids his child to be out late at night; he prohibits his intercourse with the profane and vicious.

"To forbid is a direct and personal act; to prohibit is an indirect action that operates by means of extended influence; both imply the exercise of power or authority of an individual, and the latter is extended to the authority of government."—Crabb.

The father of Constantine was so incensed at the father of Theodosius that he forbade the son his house. Addison.

I think that all such persons (that is, quacks) should be prohibited from curing their incurable patients by act of parliament. Hawkesworth.

Project, Design.

A project (from pro and jacio) is something of a practical nature thrown out for consideration as to its being done. A design (from de and signo) is a project when matured and settled, as a thing to be accomplished. An ingenious man has many projects, but, if governed by sound sense, will be slow in forming them into designs. [See also Scheme.]

In the various projects of happiness devised by human reason, there appeared inconsistencies not to be reconciled. Rogers.

Is he a prudent man as to his temporal estate, that lays designs only for a day, without any prospect to the remaining part of his life. Tillotson.

Prolix, Diffuse.

A prolix writer delights in circumlocution, extended detail, and trifling particulars. A diffuse writer is fond of amplifying, and abounds in epithets, figures, and illustrations. Diffuseness often arises from an exuberance of imagination; prolixity is almost always connected with a want of it. Prolixity is one of the worst qualities of style; diffuseness is not necessarily a fault, but requires uncommon genius to relieve it from being wearisome.

Should I at large repeat
The bead roll of her vicious tricks,
My poem would be too prolix. Prior.

A sentiment which is expressed diffusely, will barely be admitted to be just; expressed concisely, will be admired as spirited. Blair.

Prompt, Ready, Expeditious.

One who is ready (from Sax. quick) is prepared at the moment. One who is prompt (from promo, to draw forth) is prepared beforehand, so as to start at the moment into decisive action. One who is expeditious (from expeditus, free from impediments) carries through an undertaking with a steady, rapid progress.

Satan ready now
To stoop with wearied wings and willing feet
On this world. Milton.

To the stern sanction of the offended sky
My prompt obedience bows. Pope.

I apprehend it as a safest course,
And may be easily accomplished;
Let us be all most expeditious. Massinger.

Propitious, Auspicious.

Auspicious (from the ancient idea of auspices or omens) denotes "indicative of success, or favored by incidental occurrences;" as, an auspicious opening, an auspicious event. Propitious (from prope, near, implying the favorable presence of some higher power) denotes that which efficaciously protects us in some undertaking, speeds our exertions, and decides our success; as, propitious gales, propitious influences, a propitious climate.

"A journey is undertaken under auspicious circumstances, where everything incidental, as weather, society, and the like, bid fair to afford us pleasure; a journey is undertaken under propitious circumstances when everything favors the attainment of the object for which it was begun.—Crabb.

Let not my word offend thee;
My Maker, be propitious while I speak. Milton.

Fortune play upon thy prosperous helm
As thy auspicious mistress. Shakespeare.

Proposal. See Proposition.

Proposition, Proposal.

These words are both from the verb propono, to set forth, and, as here compared, they mark different forms or stages of a negotiation.

A proposition is something presented for discussion or consideration; as, propositions of peace. A proposal is some definite thing offered by one party to be accepted or rejected by the other. If the proposition is favorably received, it is usually followed by proposals which complete the arrangement.

The enemy sent propositions, such as upon delivery of a strong, fortified town, after a handsome defense, are usually granted. Clarendon.

If our proposals once again were heard,
We should compel them to a quick result.

To Put, Place.

These words, as here compared, agree in the idea of fixing the position of some object.

Put is probably connected with the Dutch pooten, to set or fix, and denotes to dispose of in any situation. To put on a shelf, to put a question. To place is to put in a specific situation; as, to place on the table.

O for that warning voice which he who saw
The Apocalypse heard cry in heaven aloud,
Then when the dragon, put to second rout,
Came furious down to be revenged on men.
Milton.

Our two first parents, yet the only two,
Of mankind in the happy garden placed. Milton.

To Puzzle. See To Embarrass.

Q.

Quaint, Odd, Whimsical.

Quaint, in our early writers, meant strange or hidden, and hence ingenious. In this sense it often occurs in Shakespeare; as, a quaint device, quaintly written, &c., and is used as a term of praise.

You were glad to be employed,
To show how quaint an orator you are.
Shakespeare.

I never saw a better fashioned gown
More quaint, more pleasing nor more commendable.
Shakespeare.

Entering into holy orders, he [R. Corbet] became a most quaint preacher, and therefore much followed by ingenious men. Wood. Athenæ Oxon.

Gradually, however, there sprang up a perverted ingenuity in such writers as Quarles, and many among the Puritans, to which we now give the name of quaintness. It is something quree and laughable, but not foolish. The quaint writers have usually strong thought, but a strange and whimsical way of expressing it. Their wit is sly, but odd; their images are often far-fetched or unnatural, and there is a strange contrast between the gravity of their thoughts and the fanciful or whimsical garb in which they are presented. Hence the word became a term of dispraise, denoting affected, which Johnson declared to be its meaning in his day. At present (perhaps from a deference to the old writers mentioned) it has received the united sense of antique and odd. Thus we speak of the quaint architecture of many old buildings in London; or a quaint expression, uniting at once the antique and the fanciful, &c.

Qualified, Competent.

A man is competent (from L. competens, fitting or suitable) to a task or duty, when he has the powers which are requisite for its performance; he is qualified for it (from L. qualis and fio, made such as he ought to be) when those powers have been trained into an acquaintance with the business to be done, and expertness in the mode of performing it. Many are competent to employments which they are utterly unqualified to enter upon at once.

"Competency mostly respects native character; qualification artificial acquirements. Familiarity with any subject aided by the requisite mental endowments give competency; acquaintance with the business to be done, and expertness in the mode of performing it constitutes the qualification." Crabb.—"Man is not competent to decide on the good or evil of many events which befall him in this life." Cumberland.—"Those who have the most learning and acquaintance with the Holy Scriptures, are best qualified for the important and sacred office of instructing the people." Crabb.

To Question, Inquire, Interrogate.

We inquire for the sake of information; as, to inquire one's way; we question with closeness in order to gain the whole truth; as, to question a messenger as to all the particulars; we interrogate by asking questions repeatedly, and often with authority; as, to interrogate a witness or a culprit.

You have oft inquired
After the shepherd that complained of love.
Shakespeare.

Suddenly out of this delightful dream
The man awoke and would have questioned more;
But he would not endure the woeful theme.
Spenser.

The traveler whoever he might be coming to the fortified habitation, would probably have been interrogated from the battlements, admitted with caution at the gate, introduced to a petty monarch fierce with habitual hostility, and vigilant with ignorant suspicion.
Johnson. Tour to the Hebrides.

To Quit, Leave.

Leave is the generic term; quit is more specific and distinctive. Being from the Low Latin quieto, to leave quiet or undisturbed, it denotes that we go from a place either with the intention of never returning, or at least, with no formed design of so doing. Hence, to say that a man has left a place or employment, decides nothing as to his returning or resuming it; but to say that he has quit the town or the business, is to say that this was considered and understood at the time, to be a final act.

Leave not the faithful side
That gave thee being, still shades thee and protects.
MILTON.

Then wilt thou not be loath
To quit this paradise; but shalt possess
A paradise within thee, happier far. MILTON.

To Quote, Cite.

To cite (from cito, to rouse up or call in) was originally to call into court as a witness, &c., and hence the word denotes something very specific and exact in adducing evidence. Quote (from Old Fr., quoter, to number or mark) is used in a more loose and general way, often expressing an appeal to some one as an authority, without adducing his exact words.

I shall trouble the reader with one citation more out of Athenagoras. ATTERBURY.

He ranged his tropes, and preached up patience,
Backed his opinion with quotations. PRIOR.

R.

Racy, Spicy.

Racy (from radix, a root) refers primarily to that strong and peculiar flavor which certain wines derive from the soil, and hence we call a style or production racy when it "smacks of the soil," or has an uncommon degree of freshness and distinctiveness of thought and language. Spicy (from spice) when applied to style, has reference to that pungency which belongs to the aromatics of the East.

A spicy review; a spicy article in a magazine; a spicy retort. Racy in conversation; a racy remark.

Rich racy verses in which we
The soil from which they come, taste, smell and see.
COWLEY.

Radical, Entire.

These words are frequently interchanged in describing some marked alteration in the condition of things. There is, however, an obvious difference between them.

A radical cure, reform, &c., is one which goes to the root (radix) of the thing in question; entire would imply that it extended to every part of the system referred to. Hence we speak of a radical change; a radical improvement; radical differences of opinion; while an entire change, an entire improvement, an entire difference of opinion, might indicate more than was actually intended.

Rage. See Anger.

To Raise, Grow, Rear.

The English never (like the natives of New England) speak of raising wheat, &c., but of growing it, and so of all vegetable productions.

It is a peculiarity of the Southern States to apply the word raise to the rearing or bringing up of men; as, "I was raised in Kentucky." In England, as well as at the North, raise in this sense is applied only to animals; though we do speak of raising a sickly child, where the reference, however, is to the weakness of his animal frame.

To Rally. See To Banter.

Rampart, Bulwark.

These words were formerly interchanged, but in modern usage a distinction has sprung up between them.

The rampart of a fortified place is the entire mound or wall which surrounds it. The term bulwark is now applied to peculiarly strong outworks which project for the defense of the rampart or main work. A single bastion is a bulwark. Hence in using these words figuratively, rampart, or rampire, is more properly applied to that which protects by walling out; while bulwark is applied to that which stands in the forefront of danger, to meet and repel it. Hence we speak of a distinguished individual as the bulwark, not the rampart of the state. This distinction, however, is often overlooked by the poets, and is not fully introduced into general literature.

Rancor, Enmity.

Enmity and rancor both describe hostile feelings; but enmity may be generous and open, while rancor (lit., a festering) is deep-seated and malignant. It implies personal malice of the worst and most enduring nature, and is the strongest word in our language to express hostile feelings.

Rancor will out, proud prelate; in thy face,
I see thy fury. SHAKESPEARE.

Rancor is that degree of malice which preys upon the possessor. His heart is torn with vexation when he contemplates the happiness of another, or when he is foiled in his evil purposes towards him.
COGAN.

Rare, Scarce.

We call a thing rare when but few of the kind are ever to be met with; as, a rare plant, &c.; we speak of a thing as scarce which, though usually abundant, is for the time being to be had only in diminished quantities. A bad harvest makes corn scarce.

A perfect union of wit and judgment is one of the rarest things in the world. BURKE.

When any particular piece of money grew very scarce, it was often recoined by a succeeding emperor.
ADDISON.

Rash, Adventurous, Foolhardy.

A man is adventurous who incurs risk or hazard from a love of the arduous and the bold; a man is rash (connected with rush) who does it from the mere impulse of his feelings without counting the cost; a man is foolhardy who throws himself into danger in disregard or defiance of the consequences.

Was never known a more advent'rous knight.
DRYDEN.

MILTON.

Rational, Reasonable.

Rational (from ratio) has reference to reason as a faculty of the mind, and is opposed to *ir*rational [i. e., destitute of or contrary to reason]; as, a rational being, a rational state of mind, rational views, &c. In these cases the speculative reason is more particularly referred to. Reasonable has reference to the exercise of this faculty for practical purposes, and denotes governed or directed by reason; as, reasonable desires, plans, &c., a reasonable charge, a reasonable prospect of success.

What higher in her society thou find'st
Attractive, humane, rational, love still.
MILTON.

A law may be reasonable in itself, although a man does not allow it, or does not know the reason of the lawgivers. SWIFT.

Readiness. See Facility.

Real, Actual.

Real represents a thing to be a "res" or substantive existence; as, a real occurrence, not imaginary. Actual refers to it as acted or performed; and hence, when we wish to prove a thing real, we often say, "It actually exists," "it has actually been done." Thus its reality is shown by its actuality. Actual, from this reference to being acted, has recently received a new signification, viz., present; as, "the actual posture of affairs;" since what is now in action or going on has, of course, a present existence.

Actual is opposed to suppositious; real is opposed to imaginary, feigned, or artificial. An actual fact; a real sentiment. GRAHAM.

For he that but conceives a crime in thought
Contracts the danger of an actual fault.
DRYDEN.

Our simple ideas are all real, all agree to the reality of things. LOCKE.

Reasoning, Argumentation.

Few words are more interchanged than these; and yet there is a difference between them which it may be proper to point out.

Reasoning is the broader term, including both deduction and induction. Argumentation denotes simply the former, and descends from the whole to some included part; while reasoning embraces also the latter, and ascends from the parts to a whole. [See Induction.] Reasoning is occupied with ideas and their relations; argumentation has to do with the forms of logic. One reasons often with one's self; you can not argue except between two parties. A thesis is set down—you attack, I defend it; you insist, I reply; you deny, I prove; you distinguish, I destroy your distinctions; your objections and my replies balance or overturn one another. Such is argumentation. It supposes that there are two sides, and that both agree to the same rules. Reasoning, on the other hand, is often a natural process; by which we form from the general analogy of nature, or special presumptions in the case, conclusions which have greater or less degrees of force, and which may be strengthened or weakened by subsequent experience.

Rebel, Insurgent.

Insurgent (from insurgo, to rise up) marks an early, and rebel (from rebello, to fight with) a more advanced stage of opposition to government. The former rises up against his rulers, the latter makes war upon them. A French writer remarks that out of a hundred insurgents, not more than ten usually hold out and become confirmed rebels.

His voice like thunder will support her cause,
Enforce her dictates and sustain her laws;
Rich with her spoils, his sanction will dismay,
And bid the insurgents tremble and obey.
Falconer.

To Rebuke. See To Reprove.

To Receive, Accept.

To receive (from re and capio, to take) describes simply the act of taking. To accept (from ad and capio, to take to one's self) denotes the taking cordially, or for the purposes for which a thing is offered. Thus, we receive a letter when it comes to hand; we receive news when it reaches us; we accept a present when it is offered; we accept an invitation to dine with a friend. A lady may receive the proposal of a suitor without accepting his suit.

"The sweetest cordial we receive at last,
Is conscience for our virtuous actions past."

Who if we knew
What we receive, would either not accept
Life offered, or soon beg to lay it down. Milton.

Recent. See Modern.

Reciprocal, Mutual.

The distinctive idea of mutual (from mutuus) is that the parties unite by interchange in the same act; as, a mutual covenant, mutual affection, &c., &c. The distinctive idea of reciprocal (from reciproco, to move backwards and forwards) is that one party acts by way of return or response to something previously done by the other party; as, a reciprocal kindness, reciprocal reproaches, &c. Love is reciprocal when the previous affection of one party has drawn forth the attachment of the other. To make it mutual, in the strictest sense, the two parties should have fallen in love at once; but as the result is the same, the two words are here used interchangeably. The ebbing and flowing of the tide is a case where the action is reciprocal, but not mutual. Hence, we may speak of a mutual friendship, because this feeling may pass and re-pass between two parties, but not so of a mutual friend in the concrete. In this case, we say a common friend.

To Refer, Allude, Advert.

To refer is very often used in pointing to some object of thought; and other words may be needed by way of interchange and variety. Allude and advert may often be used for this purpose.

We refer to a thing by distinctly introducing it into our discourse. We allude to it more remotely, by introducing something collaterally allied to it. We advert to it by turning off somewhat abruptly to consider it more at large. Thus, Macaulay refers to the early condition of England, at the opening of his history; he alludes to these statements from time to time; and adverts (lit., turns off) in the progress of his work, to various circumstances of peculiar interest, on which for a time he dwells.

Reformation, Reform.

Reformation is a more thorough and comprehensive change than reform. It is applied to subjects that are more important, and results in changes which are more lasting. A reformation involves and is followed by many particular reforms.

The pagan converts mention this great reformation of those who had been the greatest sinners, with that sudden and surprising change, which the christian religion made in the lives of the most profligate. Addison.

We do not apply the word regret to that sorrow for the past which involves a sense of guilt; this belongs to remorse or repentance. We regret the loss or absence of friends, &c.; but the word is now more commonly applied to the pain we feel for lost opportunities or for early follies, carelessness, &c.

Religion, Piety, Sanctity.

Religion (from re and ligo) is that high sense of moral obligation which binds the heart of man to the service of his Maker. Piety (from the Lat. pietas) first expressed the feelings of a child toward a parent, and was hence used for that filial sentiment of veneration and love which we owe to the Father of all. Sanctity denotes primarily that purity of heart and life which springs from habitual communion with God, and a sense of his continual presence.

To Remark, Observe, Notice.

To observe (from ob and servo) is to keep or hold a thing distinctly before the mind. To remark is simply to mark or take note of whatever may come up. To notice implies still less continuity of attention. When we turn from these mental states to the expression of them in language, we find the same distinction. An observation is properly the result of somewhat prolonged thought; a remark is usually suggested by some passing occurrence; a notice is in most cases something cursory and short. This distinction is not, however, always observed as to remark and observe, which are often used interchangeably.

We remonstrate with a person, and against the course he has adopted.

We abjure (from ab and juro, to swear off from) when we renounce in the most solemn manner; as, to abjure one's faith, allegiance, &c. We recant (from re and canto, to sing back) when we openly and formally disavow some principle we had previously maintained, and adopt the contrary one.

Reply, Rejoinder, Answer.

A reply (from re and plico, to bend back) is a distinct response to a formal question or attack, in speech or writing. A rejoinder (from re, again, and join) is a second reply (a reply to a reply) in a protracted discussion or controversy. The word answer is used in two senses, viz. (1), in the most general sense of a mere response; as, the answer to a question, or (2) in the sense of a decisive and satisfactory confutation of an adversary's argument; as when we speak of a triumphant answer to the speech or accusations of an opponent. Here the noun corresponds to a frequent use of the verb; as when we say, "this will answer (i. e., fully meet) the end in view;" "it answers the purpose."

To Reprove, Rebuke, Reprimand.

These words all signify the expression of disapprobation.

To reprove (from re and probo, to express disapprobation) implies greater calmness and self-possession. To rebuke (said to be from re and Fr. boucher, to shut the mouth or silence) implies a more excited and personal feeling. A reproof may be administered long after the offense is committed, and is usually intended for the reformation of the offender; a rebuke is commonly given at the moment of the wrong, and is administered by way of punishment and condemnation. A reprimand (from reprimo, to curb forcibly) proceeds from a person invested with authority, and is always a formal and official act.

A child is reproved for his faults and rebuked for his impudence. A military officer is reprimanded for neglect or violation of duty.

Resentment, Anger.

Anger is the broader term, denoting a keen sense of disapprobation (usually with a desire to punish), for whatever we feel to be wrong, whether directed towards ourselves or others. Resentment is anger excited by a sense of personal injury. It is, etymologically, that resentiment or reaction of the mind which we instinctively feel when we think ourselves wronged. Pride and selfishness are apt to aggravate this feeling until it changes into a criminal animosity, and this is now the more common signification of the term. Being founded in a sense of injury, this feeling is hard to be removed; and hence the expressions bitter or implacable resentment.

Anger is like
A full hot horse, who being allowed his way,
Self-mettle tires him. SHAKESPEARE.

Can heavenly minds such high resentment show,
Or exercise their spite in human woe. DRYDEN.

To RESIGN. See To ABDICATE.

To Resign, Relinquish.

To resign (from re and signo) is to give up, as if breaking a seal and yielding all it had secured; hence, it marks a formal and deliberate surrendry. To relinquish (from relinquo, to leave behind) is less formal, but always implies that the thing given up has been long an object of pursuit, and, usually, that it has been prized and desired. We resign what we once held or considered as our own; as an office, employment, &c. We speak of relinquishing a claim, of relinquishing some advantage we had sought or enjoyed, of relinquishing a subject we had been discussing, of relinquishing some right or privilege, &c.

Men are weary with the toil which they bear, but can not find it in their hearts to relinquish it. STEELE.

Rest, Repose.

Rest (from resto, to make a halt) is a ceasing from labor or exertion; repose (from re and pono, to lay a thing down or backward) is a mode of doing it which gives relief and refreshment after toil and labor. We may rest in a standing posture; we usually repose in a reclining one.

"The dove which Noah first sent out could not find rest for the sole of its foot; soldiers who are hotly pursued by an enemy have no time or opportunity to take repose; the night is the time for rest; the pillow is the place for repose. Rest may be properly applied to things and persons."—CRABB.

Retort, Repartee.

A retort (from re and torqueo, to turn back upon) is a short and pointed reply, turning back on an assailant the censures or derision he had thrown out. A repartee (from Fr. repartir, to give a prompt reply) is usually a good-natured return to some witty or sportive observation of another, in which "diamond cuts diamond" without any loss of good-humor on either side.

To Return, Restore.

We return a thing when we turn it back to its appropriate place; we restore a thing (from restauro) when we put it back to its former state and condition. A man returns what he borrowed, and restores what he stole. A present is returned; a deposit is restored. We are restored to health by being brought back to our former state.

To Reveal, Divulge.

To reveal is literally to lift the vail, and thus make known what was previously concealed; to divulge (from de and vulgo) is to scatter abroad among the people or make publicly known. A mystery or hidden doctrine may be revealed; something long confined to the knowledge of a few is at length divulged.

Ride, Drive.

Ride originally meant (and is so used throughout the English Bible) to be carried either on horseback or in a vehicle of any kind. At present, in England, drive is the word applied in most cases to motion in a carriage; as, a drive around the park, &c., while ride is appropriated to a motion on a horse, so that a "ride on horseback" would be tautology. Johnson seems to sanction this distinction by giving "to travel on horseback" as the leading sense of ride; though he adds "to travel in a vehicle," as a secondary sense. This latter use of the word still occurs to some extent; as, the queen rides to Parliament in her coach of state, &c. This distinction, though gaining ground in America, does not prevail among us to any considerable extent.

To appreciate.—Some in America use the word appreciate for "rise in value;" as, stocks appreciate, money appreciates, &c. This is never done in England, and by only a few in this country. It is undesirable, because rise sufficiently expresses the idea, and appreciate has its own distinctive meaning, which ought not to be encroached upon by one so entirely diverse.

Robust, Strong.

Robust (L. robur) means, literally, made of oak, and hence implies great compactness and toughness of muscle, connected with a thick-set frame and great powers of endurance; Strong (connected with strain) denotes the power of exerting great physical force. The robust man can bear heat or cold, excess or privation, and toil on through every kind of hardship; the strong man can lift a greater weight than his neighbor, can give a heavier blow, and a harder gripe.

Rock (connected with crag) always denotes a large and heavy mass of stone. Some, however, in certain parts of our country, apply the term to a stone of any size, and speak of boys as throwing rocks at each other. A writer has truly called this a "supremely ridiculous expression."

Sabbath, Sunday.

Sabbath is not strictly synonymous with Sunday. Sabbath denotes the institution; Sunday is the name of the first day of the week. The Sabbath of the Jews is on Saturday, and the Sabbath of the Christians on Sunday. In New England, the first day of the week has been called "the Sabbath," to mark it as holy time; Sunday is the word commonly used in the southern parts of our country and in England.

So if we will be the children of our heavenly Father, we must be careful to keep the Christian Sabbath-day, which is the Sunday.
HOMILIES OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH.

Sacrament, Eucharist.

Protestants apply the term sacrament to baptism and the Lord's Supper, especially the latter. The Romish and Greek churches have five other sacraments, viz., confirmation, penance, holy orders, matrimony, and extreme unction. As sacrament denotes an oath or vow, the word has been applied by way of emphasis to the Lord's Supper, where the most sacred vows are renewed by the Christian in commemorating the death of his Redeemer. Eucharist denotes the giving of thanks, and this term also has been applied to the same ordinance, as expressing the grateful remembrance of Christ's sufferings and death.

Some receive the sacrament as a means to procure great graces and blessings; others as an eucharist and an office of thanksgiving for what they have received.

Sagacity, Penetration.

Penetration enables us to enter into the depths of an abstruse subject, to detect motives, plans, &c. Sagacity (from sagax, quick-scented) adds to penetration a keen, practical judgment, which enables one to guard against the designs of others, and to turn every thing to the best possible advantage. The Essays of Lord Bacon show a degree of sagacity, as well as penetration, which are found in scarcely any other work.

Salutation, Greeting, Salute.

A greeting is literally an outcry or exclamation, and hence usually denotes some warm expression of feeling when one meets another.

Salutation and salute (from salus) signify literally a wishing of health. Salutation, however, is the act of the person saluting, while salute is the thing given, i. e., the thing received by the person addressed. A bow is given by way of salutation, and a lady sometimes receives the salute of a kiss. Salute is used also for something more formal; as the firing of guns by way of salute.

TO SATIATE, SATISFY, CONTENT.

These words differ principally in degree.

To content is to make contented, even though every desire or appetite is not gratified. To satisfy (from satis, enough, and fio) is to appease fully the longings of desire. To satiate (from satiatus, overfilled) is to go further, and fill so completely that it is not possible to receive or enjoy more.

What satisfies gives us pleasure; what satiates produces disgust.

SCHEDULE, CATALOGUE, LIST.

A list (lit., a narrow selvedge on cloth) is a bare record of names, titles, &c., set down with or without regular order. A catalogue (from Gr., lit., a distribution according to words) is a list arranged according to some principle, and is usually designed to describe things more or less particularly. A schedule is a formal list or inventory prepared for legal or business purposes. A list must be complete; a catalogue must be properly arranged; a schedule must have the titles and descriptions explicitly given, and be properly attested.

SCHEME, PLAN.

Scheme and plan are subordinate to design: they propose modes of carrying our designs into effect. Scheme is the least definite of the two, and lies more in speculation. A plan is drawn out into details with a view to being carried into effect. As schemes are speculative, they often prove visionary; hence the words schemer and scheming. Plans, being more practical, are more frequently carried into effect.

He forms the well-concerted scheme of mischief;
'Tis fixed, 'tis done, and both are doomed to death.
ROWE.

SCHOLAR, PUPIL.

Scholar refers to the instruction, and pupil to the care and government of a teacher. A scholar is one who is under instruction; a pupil (Lat. pupillus, a fatherless child) is one who is under the immediate and personal care of an instructor; hence we speak of a bright scholar and an obedient pupil.

For such is all the mental food purveyed
By public hacknies in the schooling trade;
Who feed a pupil's intellect with store
Of syntax, truly but with little more. COWPER.

SCIENCE, LITERATURE, ART.

Science (from scientia) is literally knowledge, but now denotes a systematic and orderly arrangement of knowledge, and hence we speak of reducing a subject to a science. In a more distinctive sense, science embraces those branches of knowledge which give a positive statement of truth as founded in the nature of things or established by observation and experiment. The term literature sometimes denotes all compositions not embraced under science, but is usually confined to the belles-lettres. [See LITERATURE.] Art is that which depends on practice and skill in performance.

"Science is knowledge certain and evident in itself, or by the principle from which it is deduced, or with which it is certainly connected. It is subjective as existing in a mind—objective, as embodied in truths—speculative, as resting in attainment of truths, as in physical science—practical, as leading to do something, as in ethical science."
FLEMING.

"In science, scimus ut sciamus; in art, scimus ut producamus. And therefore, science and art may be said to be investigations of truth; but science inquires for the sake of knowledge; art for the sake of production; and hence science is more concerned with the higher truths, art with the lower: and science never is engaged like art in productive application. And the most perfect state of science, therefore, will be the most high and accurate inquiry; the perfection of art will be the most apt and efficient system of rules: Art always throwing itself into the form of rules." SECTION, PART.

The English more commonly apply the word section to a part or portion of a body of men; as, "a section of the clergy," "a small section of the Whigs," &c. We have no such use of the word in this country, but use it abundantly in a way never known in England, as in the phrases "the Eastern section of our country," &c., giving the same sense also to the adjective sectional; as, sectional feelings, interests, &c. This, perhaps, arose from our public lands being surveyed and divided into squares of 640 acres each, called sections, which has made the term in this sense prevalent throughout the United States.

SEDITION. See INSURRECTION.

TO SEDUCE. See TO ALLURE.

TO SEEM, APPEAR.

To appear has reference to a thing's being presented to our view; as, the sun appears; to seem is connected with the idea of semblance, and usually implies an inference of our mind as to the probability of a thing's being so; as, a storm seems to be coming. "The story appears to be true," means that the facts as presented go to show its truth; "the story seems to be true," means it has the semblance of being so, and we infer that it is true.

His first and principal care being to appear unto his people such as he would have them be, and to be such as he appeared. SIDNEY.

Ham. Aye, madam, it is common.
Queen. If it be;
Why seems it so particular with thee?
Ham. Seems, Madam? Nay it is; I know not seems.
SHAKESPEARE.

SHOULD SEEM, WOULD SEEM.

These phrases differ only in strength. We use "should seem" when the case is so strong as to render the inference almost a necessary one; we use "would seem" to express a prevailing semblance or probability, with perhaps a slight implication that the case may be otherwise. Mr. Pickering supposed "would seem" to be a peculiarity of America; it is used, however, by English writers in the sense given above.

SELF-CONCEIT. See EGOTISM.

SELFISHNESS. See SELF-LOVE.

SELF-LOVE, SELFISHNESS.

The term self-love is used in a two-fold sense: (1.) It denotes that longing for good or for well-being which actuates the breasts of all, entering into and characterizing every special desire. In this sense it has no moral quality, being (from the nature of the case) neither good nor evil. (2.) It is applied to a voluntary regard for the gratification of special desires. In this sense it is morally good or bad according as these desires are conformed to duty or opposed to it. Selfishness is always voluntary and always wrong, being that regard to our own interests, gratification, &c., which is sought or gratified at the expense and to the injury of others.

So long as self-love does not degenerate into selfishness, it is quite compatible with true benevolence.
FLEMING.

Sensation, Perception.

The distinction between these words when used in mental philosophy may be thus stated. If I simply smell a rose, I have a sensation; if I refer that smell to the external object which occasioned it, I have a perception. Thus the former is mere feeling without the idea of an object; the latter is the mind's apprehension of some external object as occasioning that feeling.

"Sensation properly expresses that change in the state of the mind, which is produced by an impression upon an organ of sense (of which change we can conceive the mind to be conscious, without any knowledge of external objects): Perception, on the other hand, expresses the knowledge or the intimations we obtain, by means of our sensations, concerning the qualities of matter; and consequently involves in every instance, the notion of externality or outness, which it is necessary to exclude in order to seize the precise import of the word sensation." Fleming.

Sense, Understanding, Reason.

Some philosophers have given a technical signification to these terms, which may here be stated. Sense is the mind's acting in the direct cognition either of material objects or of its own mental states. In the first case, it is called the outer, in the second, the inner sense. Understanding is the logical faculty, i. e., the power of apprehending under general conceptions, or the power of classifying, arranging, and making deductions. Reason is the power of apprehending those first or fundamental truths or principles which are the conditions of all real and scientific knowledge, and which control the mind in all its processes of investition and deduction. These distinctions are given, not as established, but simply because they often occur in writers of the present day.

Sensible, Intelligent.

We call a man sensible whose judgments and conduct are marked and governed by sound judgment or good common sense. We call one intelligent who is quick and clear in his understanding, i. e., who discriminates readily and nicely in respect to difficult and important distinctions. The sphere of the sensible man lies in matters of practical concern; of the intelligent man, in subjects of intellectual interest.

I have been tired with accounts from sensible men, furnished with matters of fact which have happened within their own knowledge. Addison.

We trace the footsteps of a wise and intelligent architect throughout all this stupendous fabric. Woodford.

Sensibility. See Taste.

Sentiment, Opinion, Feeling.

An opinion is an intellectual judgment in respect to any and every kind of truth. Feeling describes those affections of pleasure and pain which spring from the exercise of our sentient and emotional powers. Sentiment (particularly in the plural) lies between them, denoting settled opinions or principles in regard to subjects which interest the feelings strongly, and are presented more or less constantly in practical life. Hence it is more appropriate to speak of our religious sentiments than opinions, unless we mean to exclude all reference to our feelings. The word sentiment in the singular leans ordinarily more to the side of feeling, and denotes a refined sensibility on subjects affecting the heart.

"On questions of feeling, taste, observation, or report, we define our sentiments. On questions of science, argument, or metaphysical abstraction, we define our opinions. The sentiments of the heart. The opinions of the mind. There is more of instinct in sentiment, and more of definition in opinion. The admiration of a work of art which results from first impressions, is classed with our sentiments, and when we have accounted to ourselves for the approbation, it is classed with our opinions." H. Taylor.

Sentimental, Romantic.

Sentimental usually describes an error or excess of the sensibilities; romantic, a vice of the imagination. The votary of the former gives indulgence to his sensibilities for the mere luxury of their excitement; the votary of the latter allows his imagination to rove for the pleasure of creating scenes of ideal enjoyment, and gazing on the creations which he has made. One who is sentimental is apt to be laughed at; one who is romantic not unfrequently falls into fatal errors.

Perhaps there is no less danger in works called sentimental. They attack the heart more successfully, because more cautiously. Knox.

I can not but look on this, as a mere romantic fancy of such who would be thought to be much wiser than they ever were or could be. Stillingfleet.

Serf, Slave.

A slave is the absolute property of his master, and may be sold in any way. A serf, according to the strict sense of the term, is one bound to work on a certain estate, and thus attached to the soil, and sold with it into the service of another. In some countries, however, serfs are mere slaves.

Serious. See Grave.

Set. See Pair.

Set-off, Offset.

Offset originally denoted that which branches off or projects, as a shoot from a tree, but has long been used in America in the sense of set-off or equivalent. This use is beginning to obtain in England, though Macaulay uses set-off, and so, perhaps, do a majority of English writers. Set-off is the appropriate term in legal proceedings.

Severe. See Strict.

Sharper. See Swindler.

Shining, Brilliant, Sparkling.

Shining (from shine) describes the emission of a strong light from a clear or polished surface. Brilliant (from Fr. briller, to glitter) denotes a shining of great brightness, but with gleams or flashes. Sparkling (from spark) implies a shining intensely from radiant points or sparks by which the eye is dazzled. The same distinctions obtain when these epithets are figuratively applied. A man of shining talents is made conspicuous by possessing them; if they flash upon the mind with a peculiarly striking effect, we call them brilliant; if his brilliancy is marked by great vivacity and occasional intensity, he is sparkling.

True paradise inclosed with shining rock. Milton.

Some in a brilliant buckle bind her waist,
Some round her neck a circling light display. Gay.

His sparkling blade about his head he blest,
And smote off quite his left leg by the knee,
That down he tumbled. Spenser.

Shock, Concussion.

A shock is literally a violent shake or agitation; a concussion (from concutio) is a shaking of things together. A shock may affect the body or the mind; a concussion properly affects only the body or material objects; as, a concussion of the brain, a concussion of the elements. The effects of a shock may or may not be violent and lasting; those of a concussion are usually severe and permanent.

Long at the head of his few faithful friends,
He stood the shock of a whole host of foes. Addison.

The strong concussion on the heaving tide
Rolled back the vessel to the island's side. Pope.

Shrewd, Sagacious.

Shrewd originally meant keen, but fault-finding or contentious. This latter sense is now dropped, and yet, perhaps, it slightly influences the present application of the word. One who is shrewd is keen to detect errors, to penetrate false disguises, to foresee and guard against the selfishness of others. It is not, therefore, a word of as much dignity as sagacious, which leads us to think of a man as possessing a comprehensive as well as penetrating mind, whereas shrewd does not.

Professing to despise the ill-opinion of mankind creates a shrewd suspicion, that we have deserved it. Secker.

Only sagacious heads light on these observations, and reduce them into general propositions. Locke.

To Shun. See To Avoid.

Shy, Coy.

Coy (originally from L. cautus) has reference to that caution and reserve with which a delicate female shrinks from the approach of the other sex. Shyness is a characteristic of cautious or sensitive minds, leading the one to be slow in adopting opinions, and the other to shrink from the intercourse of general society.

Nor the coy maid, half willing to be pressed,
Shall kiss the cup to pass it to the rest. Goldsmith.

It can be no offense to the knowing and ingenious, that men have a shyness and jealousy against such truths as they have not been acquainted with. More.

SIMPLE, SILLY, STUPID.

One who is simple is unconscious of his own ignorance, and falls into mistakes either from a deficiency of intellect or want of experience and intercourse with mankind. One who is silly is not only weak in intellect, but (connected with Ger. selig) is self-satisfied or pleased with his folly, and even mistakes it for wisdom. One who is stupid (from stupeo) is like one stupefied, dull of apprehension, and slow to feel.

I am a simple woman, much too weak
To oppose your cunning. SHAKESPEARE.

He is the companion of the silliest people in their most silly pleasure; he is ready for every impertinent entertainment and diversion. LAW.

SKETCH, OUTLINE, DELINEATION.

An outline gives only the bounding lines of some scene or picture. A sketch fills up the outline in part, giving broad touches by which an imperfect idea may be conveyed. A delineation (from de and linea, a line) goes further, carrying out the more striking features of the picture, and going as much into detail as to furnish a clear conception of the whole.

"A delineation may be characterized as accurate, and a sketch as striking, or hasty, or imperfect, as the case may be. So in the secondary sense of the words, we speak of the outlines of a plan, of a work, of a project, &c., which serve as a basis on which the subordinate parts are formed. In like manner we speak of the sketches of countries, characters, manners, &c., which give us a general view of a nation or people."—CRABB.

SKILL, DEXTERITY, ADROITNESS.

Skill (from Sax. scylan) is more intelligent, denoting familiar knowledge united to readiness of performance. Dexterity (from dexter, the right hand) when applied to the body is more mechanical and refers to habitual ease of execution. Adroitness (from Fr. adroit, to the right hand) involves the same image with dexterity, and differs from it only as implying a general facility of movement throughout the whole system. The same distinctions apply to the figurative sense of the words. A man is skillful in any employment when he understands both its theory and its practice. He is dextrous when he manœuvers with great lightness and success. He is adroit in the use of quick, sudden and well-directed movements of the body or the mind, so as to effect the object he has in view.

TO SLIGHT, NEGLECT.

To slight is stronger than to neglect. We may neglect a duty or person from inconsideration, or from being over-occupied in other concerns. To slight is always a positive and intentional act, resulting from feelings of dislike or contempt. We ought to put a kind construction on what appears neglect on the part of a friend, but when he slights us it is obvious that he is our friend no longer.

Beware
Lest they transgress and slight that sole command.
MILTON.

This my long-suffering and my day of grace,
Those who neglect and scorn shall never taste.
MILTON.

SLOW, TARDY, DILATORY.

Slow is the wider term, denoting either a want of rapid motion or inertness of intellect. Dilatory (from defero) signifies a proneness to defer, a habit of delaying the performance of what we know must be done. Tardy (connected with tarry) denotes the habit of being behindhand; as, tardy in making up one's accounts.

Fixed on defense the Trojans are not slow
To guard their shore from an expected foe.
DRYDEN.

These cardinals trifle with me; I abhor
This dilatory sloth, and tricks of Rome.
SHAKESPEARE.

When certain to overcome, inclined to save,
Tardy to vengeance and with mercy brave.

SMART, CLEVER.

Smart has been much used in New England to describe a person who is intelligent, vigorous, and active; as, a smart young fellow, a smart workman, &c., coinciding very nearly with the English sense of clever. The nearest approach to this in England is in such expressions; as, he was smart (pungent or witty) in his reply, &c.; but smart and smartness, when applied to persons, are more commonly used in reference to dress, as a smart appearance, &c.

TO SNEER, SCOFF, JEER.

The word to sneer (from the L. naris, nose) is, lit., to turn up the nose at, "naso suspendere adunco," and implies to cast contempt indirectly or by covert expressions. To jeer is stronger, denoting, lit., to cut upon closely (to shear) and denotes the use of severe sarcastic reflections. To scoff (from Gr. σκόπτω) is stronger still, implying the use of insolent mockery and derision.

And sneers as learnedly as they,
Like females o'er their morning tea.

SOLACE. See COMFORT.

SOLECISM, BARBARISM.

These terms have come down from the ancient rhetoricians. A barbarism (from barbarus, a foreigner) is a word either foreign or uncongenial to a language, and not yet received into it. Solecism is derived from the Soli, a people of Attica, who, having colonized in Cilicia, lost the purity of their language. Hence the term solecism was applied to a violation of the laws of syntax; and at a subsequent period, to any expression involving an absurdity or violation of the necessary laws of thought. The term has also been applied figuratively to absurdity of conduct, as will be seen in the following passage.

My mind lately prompted me, that I should commit a great solecism, if among the rest of my friends in England, I should leave you unsaluted.

SOLICITUDE. See CARE.

SOLID, HARD.

These words both relate to the internal constitution of bodies, but hard denotes a closer adherence of the component parts than solid. Hard is opposed to soft, and solid to fluid or liquid. Wood is always solid, but some kinds of wood are hard and others are soft.

Repose you there, while I to the hard house,
More hard than is the stone whereof 'tis raised.
SHAKESPEARE.

I hear his thundering voice resound,
And tramping feet that shake the solid ground.
DRYDEN.

SOLITUDE, RETIREMENT, SECLUSION, LONELINESS.

Retirement is a withdrawal from general society, implying that a person has been engaged in its scenes. Solitude describes the fact that a person is alone; seclusion, that he is shut out from others, usually by his own choice; loneliness, that he feels the pain and oppression of being alone. Hence, retirement is opposed to a gay or active life; solitude, to society; seclusion, to freedom of access on the part of others; and loneliness, to that of society which the heart demands.

Oh blessed retirement friend of life's decline.
POPE.

They who can enjoy the country are prepared for solitude, and in that [the country] solitude is prepared for them. DRYDEN.

It is a place of seclusion from the external world. BP. HORSLEY.

These evils seem likely to reduce this city ere long to the loneliness and the insignificance of a village. EUSTACE.

SOME, SOMEWHAT.

The illiterate of our country often use some as an adverb instead of somewhat, or an equivalent expression; as, "I am some tired;" "he is some better; "it rains some," &c. This blunder is rarely if ever heard in England, and is a decided Americanism.

He is somewhat arrogant at his first entrance and too inquisitive through the whole; yet these imperfections hinder not our compassion. DRYDEN.

Yet for a dance they seemed somewhat extravagant and wild, perhaps for joy of offered peace. MILTON.

SOMEWHAT. See SOME.

SORROW. See AFFLICTION.

SORROW, GRIEF, SADNESS.

Sorrow (from the root of sore, heavy) denotes suffering of mind, either from the loss of some good, real or supposed, or disappointment in our expectation of good. Grief expresses a poignant or uncontrollable degree of sorrow, which weighs (connected with grave) or presses down the mind under a sense of loss. Sadness is that depression of thought and feeling which is a frequent but not invariable result of sorrow. [See also GRIEF.]

A world of woe and sorrow. MILTON.

I will instruct my sorrows to be proud;
For grief is proud, and makes his owner stout.
SHAKESPEARE.

Dim sadness did not spare
Celestial visages. MILTON.

SORT, KIND.

Kind (connected with kin and kindred) originally denoted things of the same family, or bound together by some natural affinity; and hence, a class. Sort (from the Lat. sors) signifies that which constitutes a particular lot or parcel, not implying, necessarily, the idea of affinity, but of mere assemblage. The two words are now used to a great extent interchangeably, though sort (perhaps from its origin, lot) sometimes carries with it a slight tone of disparagement or contempt; as when we say, "that sort of people;" "that sort of language," &c.

As when the total kind
Of birds, in orderly array of wing,
Came summoned over Eden, to receive
Their names of thee. MILTON.

None of nobler sort
Would so offend a virgin. SHAKESPEARE.

SPECIMEN, SAMPLE.

A specimen (from species) is a representative of the class of things to which it belongs; as, a specimen of photography. A sample (ensample) is a part of the thing itself, designed to show the quality of the whole; as, a sample of sugar or of broadcloth. A cabinet of minerals consists of specimens; if a part be broken off from any one of these specimens, it is a sample of the mineral to which it belongs.

Several persons have exhibited specimens of this art before multitudes of beholders. ADDISON.

SPICY. See RACY.

SPITE, MALICE.

Malice has more reference to the disposition, and spite to the manifestations of it in words and actions. Malice denotes a spirit which desires evil to others; spite is a temper which delights to express itself in bitter and cutting language, or in low and irritating actions. It is therefore meaner than malice, though not always more criminal.

"Malice expresses the disposition of inferior minds, to execute every purpose of mischief within the more limited circle of their abilities." —COGAN.

WYATT. To his Ladie.

SPITE. See PIQUE.

SPONTANEOUS, VOLUNTARY.

What is voluntary is the result of a volition, or act of choice; it therefore implies some degree of consideration, and may be the result of mere reason without excited feeling. What is spontaneous (from Lat. sponte) springs wholly from feeling by a kind of outburst of the mind which admits of no reflection; as, a spontaneous burst of applause. Hence the term is sometimes applied to things inanimate.

Abstinence is but voluntary fasting, and exercise but voluntary labor. SEED.

In man, love is less spontaneous and disinterested than in woman. AMOND.

STATE, SITUATION, CONDITION.

State (from sto, to stand) is the generic term, and denotes in general the mode in which a thing stands or exists. The situation (from situs, mode of lying or position) of a thing is its state in reference to external objects and influences; its condition (from conditio, putting together) is its internal state, or what it is in itself considered. Our situation is good or bad as outward things bear favorably or unfavorably upon us; our condition is good or bad according to the state we are actually in as respects our persons, families, property, and other things which comprise our sources of enjoyment.

I do not

We now hope to enjoy what in our situation might be called the luxuries of life.
COOK'S Second Voyage.

And, oh, what man's condition can be worse
Than his whom blessings starve and blessings curse.
COWLEY.

STATION, DEPOT.

It is unfortunate that, in America, the stopping-places on our railways first received the name of depôt—a gross misapplication of the term, since it means simply a store-house or magazine. In England the name has always been "station" or "station-house," and there is now a strong tendency to adopt this in America, as the only proper word.

STORE, SHOP.

The English call the place where goods are sold (however large or splendid it may be) a shop, and confine the word store to its original meaning, viz., a warehouse or place where goods are stored. Our application of the word store to all places, except the lowest, where goods are sold, marks a tendency to "scale upward" in the use of terms which we have in common with the French, among whom boutique has, in like manner, given place to magasin as a place for the sale of goods.

In his needy shop a tortoise hung,
An alligator stuffed, and other skins
Of ill-shaped fishes; and about his shelves
A beggarly account of empty boxes.
SHAKESPEARE.

Sulphurous and nitrous foam,
Concocted and adjusted, they reduced
To blackest grain, and into store conveyed.
MILTON.

STORM, TEMPEST.

Storm (from the root of stir) is violent agitation, a commotion of the elements by wind, &c., but not necessarily implying the fall of any thing from the clouds. Hence, to call a mere fall of rain without wind, a storm (though common in this country), is a departure from the true sense of the word. A tempest (L. tempestas) is one of those sudden and violent storms common on the coast of Italy, where the term originated, and usually attended by deluge of rain, with lightning and thunder.

Storms beat and rolls the main;
Oh! beat those storms and roll the seas in vain.
POPE.

What at first was called a gust, the same
Hath now a storm's anon a tempest's name.
DONNE.

Stout, Corpulent.

Stout, in our early writers (as in the English Bible), was used chiefly or wholly in the sense of strong or bold; as, a stout champion, a stout heart, a stout resistance, &c. At a later period it was used for thick-set or bulky; and more recently, especially in England, the idea has been carried still further, so that Taylor says in his Synonyms, "The stout man (from stot, an ox) has the proportions of an ox; he is corpulent, fat, and fleshy in relation to his size." Few in America entirely drop the original sense of strong and bold; and many among us who have read Washington Irving's story of the "Stout Gentleman," never suspected that he was merely a very fat man.

Stream, Current.

Current (from curro, to run) gives us but a single idea, that of running; stream (from Sax. stream, to flow steadily) adds the idea of this onward flow being the result of some uniform force; hence we speak of a shifting current and a steady stream. There are many currents in the ocean, but there is only one Gulf Stream. The stream of the Mississippi rolls on with increasing force; but where it is most rapid there are reflex currents on the side which run in a contrary direction.

The current, that with gentle murmur glides,
Thou know'st, being stopped, impatiently doth rage;
But his fair course is not hindered;
He makes sweet music with th' enameled stones.
Shakespeare.

Oh, could I flow like thee, and make thy stream
My great example, as thou art my theme!
Tho' deep yet clear, tho' gentle yet not dull,
Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full.
Denham.

Strength. See Force.

Strict, Severe.

Strict (from stringo, to bind) points to a person or thing, as one that binds closely or keeps under control; as, strict in discipline, strict rules, &c. Severe (from severus, rigidly strict) denotes a stern adherence to principles or rules, which shrinks not from the infliction of pain, and in some cases even finds pleasure in that infliction. Strict, therefore, is ordinarily taken in a good sense; severe is commonly used in a bad one, except where the circumstances of the case imperatively demand the exercise of rigor.

And rules as strict his labored works confine,
As if the Stagyrite o'erlooked each line. Pope.

Stubborn, Obstinate.

Stubborn (lit., firm or fixed like a stub or stock) describes a high degree of obstinacy. He who is obstinate is one who will not yield to the appeals we make to his reason and his better feelings; he who is stubborn grows more obstinate the more clearly his unreasonableness is exposed, and the more powerfully his feelings are addressed.

Sublimity, Grandeur.

The mental state indicated by these two words is the same, viz., a mingled emotion of astonishment and awe. In speaking of the quality which produces this emotion, we call it grandeur when it springs from what is vast in space, power, &c.; we call it sublimity (L. sublimis, raised above the earth) when it springs from what is elevated far above the ordinary incidents of humanity. An immense plain is grand. The heavens are not only grand, but sublime (as the predominating emotion) from their immense height. Exalted intellect, and especially exalted virtue under severe trials, gives us the sense of moral sublimity, as in the case of our Saviour in his prayer for his murderers. We do not speak of Satan, when standing by the fiery gulf, with his "unconquerable will and study of revenge," as a sublime object; but there is a melancholy grandeur thrown around him, as of "archangel ruined."

To Subside. See To Abate.

Subsidy, Tribute.

A subsidy (from subsidium, aid) is voluntary; a tribute is exacted. A subsidy is paid to an ally for his services; a tribute (from tributio, an assignment or impost) is given in acknowledgment of dependence or subjection. England gave subsidies to most of the German powers for carrying on the war against Bonaparte; tribute was paid to the Roman Republic by most of the nations of the earth.

'Tis all the subsidy the present age can raise.
Dryden.

To acknowledge this, was all he did exact;
Small tribute, where the will to pay was act.
Dryden.

Subtile, Acute.

In acute (from acus) the image is that of a needle's point; in subtile (from subtilis, fine spun) that of a thread spun out to extreme fineness. Hence he who is acute has a piercing judgment, which enables him to discern and discriminate with the nicest accuracy; he who has a subtile intellect can spin the finest thread of thought, and follow out a subject in its most complicated relations, without letting go his hold, or becoming lost or perplexed in its utmost intricacies. Acuteness guards against error; subtilty carries forward our investigations into tenuous and recondite truths. The former belongs more to speculative and abstract inquiries; the latter to the philosophy of the heart and of social life. Edwards was singularly acute; Lord Bacon had a subtilty of intellect which seemed to spread itself throughout every part of a subject like a kind of "diffusive touch."

The genius of the Spanish people is exquisitely subtile, without being at all acute; hence there is so much humor and so little wit in their literature. The genius of the Italians on the contrary, is acute, profound, and sensual, but not subtile; hence what they think to be humorous, is merely witty.
S. T. Coleridge.

Successful. See Fortunate.

To Suffer. See To Permit.

Suggestion, Hint.

A hint is literally a nod, and is the briefest mode of calling one's attention to a subject; a suggestion (from sub and gero, to put or lay under) is literally a putting of something before the mind for consideration, an indirect or guarded mode of presenting argument or advice. A hint is usually something slight or covert, and may be merely negative in its character; a suggestion is ordinarily intended to furnish us with some practical assistance or directions. "He gave me a hint of my danger, and added some kind suggestions as to the means of avoiding it."

Willing to wound and yet afraid to strike,
Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike. Pope.

Arthur, they say, is killed to-night
On your suggestion. Shakespeare.

To Summon. See To Call.

Sunday. See Sabbath.

Supernatural, Preternatural.

Preternatural signifies beside nature, and supernatural above or beyond nature. What is very greatly aside from the ordinary course of things is preternatural: what is above or beyond the established laws of the universe is supernatural. The dark day which terrified all Europe nearly a century ago was preternatural; the resurrection of the dead is supernatural.

That form which the earth is under at present is preternatural, like a statue made and broken again.
Burnet.

Cures wrought by medicines, are natural operations; but the miraculous ones wrought by Christ and his apostles were supernatural. Boyle.

Superstition, Fanaticism.

Superstition is from super and sto, and denotes literally a standing still over or by a thing, and hence amazement or dread, especially of the supernatural or divine. It springs from the imagination in a dark and gloomy state. Fanaticism (literally the seeing of visions) arises from this same faculty in a state of high-wrought and self-confident excitement. The former leads in some cases to excessive rigor in religious opinions or practice; in others to unfounded belief in extraordinary events or in omens and prognostics, hence producing weak fears or excessive scrupulosity as to outward observances. The latter gives rise to an utter disregard of reason under the false assumption of enjoying a direct guidance from on high.

Fanaticism has a secondary sense as applied to politics, &c., which corresponds to the primary.

They the truth
With superstitions and traditions taint. Milton.

From hence weak and wicked men have taken the handle to ascribe all religion to fanaticism; that is to a kind of frenzy or dotage. Waterland.

To Supplicate. See To Beseech.

Suspicious. See Jealous.

To Swallow up. See To Absorb.

Swindler, Sharper.

These words agree in describing persons who take unfair advantages.

A swindler is one who obtains money or goods under false pretenses. A sharper is one who cheats by sharp practice, as in playing at cards or staking what he can not pay.

Fraud and injustice soon follow, and the dignity of the British merchant is sunk in the scandalous appellation of a swindler. Knox.

Perhaps you'll think I act the same,
As a sly sharper plays his game. Cotton.

Sympathy. See Pity.

Sympathy, Commiseration.

Sympathy is literally a fellow-feeling with others in their varied conditions of joy or of grief. The term, however, is now more commonly applied to a fellow-feeling with others under affliction, and then coincides very nearly with commiseration. In this case it is commonly followed by for; as, to feel sympathy for a friend when we see him distressed. The verb sympathize is followed by with; as, to sympathize with a friend in his distresses or enjoyments.

Every man would be a distinct species to himself were there no sympathy among individuals. South.

Fault
Acknowledged and deplored, in Adam wrought
Commiseration. Milton.

Synonymous, Identical.

If no words are synonymous except those which are identical in use and meaning, so that the one can in all cases be substituted for the other, we have scarcely ten such words in our language. But the term more properly denotes that the words in question approach so near to each other that, in many or most cases, they can be used interchangeably. (1.) Words may thus coincide in certain connections, and so be interchanged, when they can not be interchanged in other connections; thus we may speak either of strength of mind or of force of mind, but we say the force (not strength) of gravitation. (2.) Two words may differ slightly, but this difference may be unimportant to the speaker's object, so that he may freely interchange them; thus it makes but little difference, in most cases, whether we speak of a man's having secured his object or having attained his object. For these and other causes, we have numerous words which may, in many cases or connections, be used interchangeably, and these are properly called synonyms.

Synonymous words "are words which with great and essential resemblances of meaning, have at the same time small, subordinate, and partial differences —these differences being such as either originally and on the ground of their etymology inhered in them; or differences which they have by usage acquired in the eyes of all; or such as, though nearly latent now, they are capable of receiving at the hands of wise and discreet masters of the tongue. Synonyms are words of like significance in the main, but with a certain unlikeness as well." Trench.

T.

Taciturn, Silent.

Silent has reference to the act, taciturn to the habit. A man may be silent from circumstances; he is taciturn from disposition. The loquacious man is at times silent; one who is taciturn may now and then make an effort at conversation.

What shall Cordelia do? Love and be silent. Shakespeare.

The cause of Addison's taciturnity was a natural diffidence in the company of strangers. Knox.

Talent. See Genius.

Talk. See Conversation.

Talkative. See Garrulous.

Tall, High, Lofty.

High is the generic term, and is probably connected with the verb to heave, or raise up. Tall describes, etymologically, that which shoots up, like a spire of grass, having a small diameter in proportion to its height; hence we speak of a tall man, a tall steeple, a tall mast, &c., but not of a tall hill or a tall house. Lofty (Sax. luft, the air) has a special reference to the expanse above us, and may be applied to extension in breadth as well as height; as, a lofty mountain, a lofty room. Tall is applied only to physical objects; high and lofty have a moral acceptation; as, high thought, purpose, &c., lofty aspirations, a lofty genius. Lofty, from its etymology, is naturally the stronger word, and is usually coupled with the grand, or that which excites admiration.

As some tall cliff, that lifts its awful form.
Goldsmith.

High o'er their heads a mold'ring rock is placed.
Dryden.

See lofty Lebanon his head advance. Pope.

Tame. See Gentle.

To Tantalize, Disappoint.

To disappoint is literally to do away what was (or was taken to be) appointed; hence the peculiar pain from hopes thus dashed to the ground. To tantalize describes a most distressing form of disappointment, as in the case of Tantalus, a Phrygian king in fabulous history, who was condemned to stand up to his chin in water, with a tree of fair fruit over his head, both of which, as he attempted to allay his hunger or thirst, fled from his approach. Hence, to tantalize is to visit with the bitterest disappointment—to torment by exciting hopes or expectations which can never be realized.

The superior Being can defeat all his designs, and disappoint all his hopes. Tillotson.

What greater plague can hell itself devise
Than to be willing thus to tantalize?
Answer to Ben Jonson.

Tartness. See Acrimony.

Taste, Sensibility, Judgment.

Some consider taste as a mere sensibility, and others as a simple exercise of judgment; but a union of both is requisite to the existence of any thing which deserves the name. An original sense of the beautiful is just as necessary to esthetic judgments, as a sense of right and wrong to the formation of any just conclusions on moral subjects. But this "sense of the beautiful" is not an arbitrary principle. It is under the guidance of reason; it grows in delicacy and correctness with the progress of the individual and of society at large; it has its laws, which are seated in the nature of man; and it is in the development of these laws that we find the true "standard of taste."

What, then, is taste but those internal powers,
Active and strong, and feelingly alive
To each fine impulse? a discerning sense
Of decent and sublime, with quick disgust
From things deformed, or disarranged, or gross
In species? This nor gems, nor stores of gold,
Nor purple state, nor culture, can bestow,
But God alone, when first his sacred hand
Imprints the secret bias of the soul.
Pleasures of Imagination.

To Taunt. See To Deride.

Tautology, Repetition.

There may be frequent repetitions (as in legal instruments) which are warranted either by necessity or convenience; but tautology is always a fault, being a sameness of expression which adds nothing either to the sense or the sound.

Saint Andre's feet ne'er kept more equal time,
Not even the feet of thy own Psyche's rhyme;
Though they in numbers as in sense excel,
So just, so like tautology they fell. Dryden.

If you conquer Rome, the benefit
Which you shall thereby reap, is such a name
Whose repetition will be dogged with curses.
Shakespeare.

I love such tears
As fall from fit notes beaten through mine ears,
With repetitions of what Heaven hath done.
Chapman.

Teaching. See Education.

To Tease, Vex.

To tease is literally to pull or scratch, and implies a prolonged annoyance in respect to little things, which is often more irritating and harder to bear than severe pain. Vex (a frequentative of Latin veho) meant originally to seize and bear away hither and thither, and hence to disturb; as, to vex the ocean with storms. This sense of the term now rarely occurs, but vex is still a stronger word than tease, denoting the disturbance or anger created by minor provocations, losses, disappointments, &c. We are teased by the buzzing of a fly in our ears; we are vexed by the carelessness or stupidity of our servants.

Not by the force of carnal reason,
But indefatigable teasing. Butler.

In disappointments, where the affections have been strongly placed, and the expectations sanguine, particularly where the agency of others is concerned, sorrow may degenerate into vexation and chagrin. Cogan.

Tedious. See Irksome.

Temerity, Rashness.

These words are closely allied in sense, but have a slight difference in their use and application.

Temerity is Latin; and rashness (connected with rush) is Saxon. As in many such cases, the Latin term is more select and dignified; the Saxon more familiar and energetic. We show temerity in hasty decisions and the conduct to which they lead. We show rashness in particular actions, as dictated by sudden impulse. It is an exhibition of temerity to approach the verge of a precipice; it is an act of rashness to jump into a river without being able to swim.

Temerity, then, is an unreasonable contempt of danger; rashness is a rushing into danger from thoughtlessness or excited feeling.

It is notorious temerity to pass sentence upon grounds incapable of evidence. BARROW.

TENEMENT, HOUSE.

There may be many houses under one roof, but they are completely separated from each other by party-walls. A tenement may be detached by itself, or it may be part of a house divided off for the use of a distinct family.

'Tis policy for father and son to take different sides; for then lands and tenements commit no treason. DRYDEN.

Theodosius arrived at a religious house in the city, where now Constantia lived. ADDISON.

TENET. See DOGMA.

TERM, WORD.

These are more frequently interchanged than almost any thing that occurs in language. There is, however, a difference between them (as shown by their etymology) which is worthy of being kept in mind.

Word is generic; it literally denotes an utterance, and is that which represents or expresses our thoughts and feelings. Term (from terminus, a bound) denotes that which bounds or circumscribes; and hence, when this name is given to one of these "utterances," it marks it as more specific and determinate than word. Thus, we speak of a scientific or technical term (not word), and of stating things in distinct terms. Thus we say, "the term minister literally denotes servant;" "an exact definition of terms is essential to clearness of thought;" "no term of reproach can sufficiently express my indignation;" "every art has its peculiar and distinctive terms," &c. So also we say, "purity of style depends on the choice of words, and precision of style on a clear understanding of the terms used." Term is chiefly applied to verbs, nouns, and adjectives, because these are especially capable of being limited or determined in sense; while prepositions and conjunctions are rarely spoken of as terms, but simply as words.

It need hardly be added, that term, in a looser sense, is used to a great extent interchangeably with word, for variety of expression.

TERROR. See ALARM.

TERSE, CONCISE.

Terse (from tergeo, to wipe or clean) was defined by Johnson "cleanly written," i. e., free from blemishes, neat, or smooth. Its present sense is "free from excrescences," and hence compact with smoothness, grace or elegance, as in the following lines of Whitehead:

"In eight terse lines has Phaedrus told
(So frugal were the bards of old)
A tale of goats; and closed with grace,
Plan, moral, all, in that short space."

It is remarkable that this sense (which is now the prevailing one) is not given to the word in any of our dictionaries. It differs from concise in not implying perhaps quite as much condensation, but chiefly in the additional idea of "grace or elegance."

TEST, TRIAL.

Trial (from try) is the wider term; test is a searching and decisive trial. It is derived from the Latin testa (earthen pot), which term was early applied to the fining-pot, or crucible, in which metals are melted for trial and refinement. Hence the peculiar force of the word as indicating a trial or criterion of the most decisive kind.

I leave him to your gracious acceptance,
Whose trial shall better publish his commendation.
SHAKESPEARE.

Thy virtue, prince, has stood the test of fortune,
Like purest gold, that, tortured in the furnace,
Comes out more bright, and brings forth all its weight.
ADDISON.

TESTIMONY, PROOF, EVIDENCE.

Proof (from prove), being Saxon, is most familiar, and is used more frequently (though not exclusively) as to facts and things which occur in the ordinary concerns of life. Evidence (Lat. evidentia, that which makes evident) is a word of more dignity, and is more generally applied to that which is moral or intellectual; as, the evidences of Christianity, &c. Testimony (from Lat. testis) is strictly the evidence of a witness given under oath; when used figuratively or in a wider sense, the word testimony has still a reference to some living agent as its author, as when we speak of the testimony of conscience, or of doing a thing in testimony of our affection, &c.

To conform our language more to common use, we ought to divide arguments into demonstrations, proofs and probabilities. By proofs, meaning such arguments from experience as leave no room for doubt or opposition. HUME.

The evidence of sense, is the first and highest kind of evidence, of which human nature is capable. WILKINS.

The proof of every thing must be by the testimony of such as the parties produce.

THEN, THEREFORE.

Both these words are used in reasoning; but therefore takes the lead, while then is rather subordinate or incidental. Therefore states reasons and draws inferences in form; then, to a great extent, takes the point as proved, and passes on to the general conclusion—"Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God;" "So, then, faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God."

THEORY, HYPOTHESIS.

The following statement of the difference between a theory and a hypothesis, is derived from the writings of De Quincey. With some slight variation it is given in his own words.

"A theory (Gr., θηωρία) may be thus described. Imagine, in any science or speculation, that all the elements (i. e., the forces, the modes of action, the phenomena, &c.) are given; but as yet they exist to the mind as an unorganized chaos. Then steps in contemplation, or reflective survey (θηωρία) to assign to them all their several places or relations; which shall be first, which middle, which last; which shall be end, which shall be means; which subordinate, which co-ordinate; which force is for impulse, which for regulation; which absolute, which conditional; which purpose direct, which indirect or collateral; and so on. This introduction of organization among the facts or data of science is Theory. A theory, therefore, may be defined—an organic development to the understanding of the relations between the parts of any systematic whole. In a hypothesis, on the other hand, it is only one relation which is investigated, viz., that of dependency. A number of phenomena are given, and perhaps with no want of orderly relation among them; but as yet they exist without apparent basis or support. The question, therefore, is concerning a sufficient ground or cause to account for them. I therefore step in and underlay the phenomena with a substructure, or sub-position (Ὑπόθεσις) such as I think capable of supporting them. This is a hypothesis. Briefly, then, in a theory, I organize what is certain enough already, but undetermined in its relations; whereas, in a hypothesis I assign the causality when previously it was either unknown or uncertain. For example, we talk properly of a theory of combustion; for the elements, i. e., the phenomena and results, are indeterminate only with regard to their reciprocal relations. But with regard to the aurora borealis, it is a hypothesis that we want in the first place, for the phenomena are of uncertain origin. And perhaps this hypothesis would demand, as its sequel, a theory of the whole agencies concerned; but this could not be until the causality should have been determined. Again, suppose the case of algebraical equations, here all possibility of hypothesis is excluded. But a theory is still wanted. Many theories have started from the genesis of equations first proposed by Harriot, viz., that which views the higher equations as generated by multiplication out of the lower. But, perhaps, a different view of their origin would lead to more comprehensive results. Hindenburg with his disciples, Stahl, &c., have most happily applied an approved theory of combinations to this subject."

THERE. See THITHER.

THEREFORE. See THEN.

THIEF, ROBBER.

A thief takes our property by stealth; a robber attacks us openly and strips us by main force. The robber braves the laws; the thief endeavors to evade them.

"An active police may prevent the frequent occurrence of robbery; but thieves are more difficult to catch than robbers." GRAHAM.

Take heed, have open eyes; for thieves do foot by night. SHAKESPEARE.

Some roving robber calling to his fellows.
MILTON'S COMUS.

TO THINK. See TO EXPECT, also TO GUESS.

THITHER, THERE.

Thither denotes motion toward a place; there denotes rest in a place; as, "I am going thither, and shall meet you there." But thither has now become obsolete except in poetry, or a style purposely conformed to the past, and hence there has also taken the sense of thither; as, "I shall go there to-morrow; we shall go together."

THOUGH. See ALTHOUGH.

THOUGHTFUL, CONSIDERATE.

He who is habitually thoughtful rarely neglects his duty or his true interest; he who is considerate (from considero, to look at closely) pauses to reflect and guard himself against error. One who is not thoughtful by nature, if he can be made considerate, will usually be guarded against serious mistakes.

"He who is thoughtful does not forget his duty; he who is considerate pauses, and considers properly what is his duty. It is a recommendation to a subordinate person to be thougtful in doing what is wished of him; it is the recommendation of a confidential person to be considerate, as he has often to judge according to his own discretion." CRABB.

THREAT, MENACE.

Threat is Saxon, and menace (from minor) is Latin. As often happens, the former is the more familiar term; the latter is employed only in the higher classes of style. We are threatened with a drought; the country is menaced with war. "We may be threatened with either small or great evils; but we are menaced only with great evils. One individual threatens to strike another; a general menaces the enemy with an attack. We are threatened by things as well as persons; we are menaced by persons only; a person is threatened with a look; he is menaced with a prosecution by his adversary."—CRABB.

THRONG, MULTITUDE, CROWD.

Any great number of persons form a multitude (from multus, many); a throng (from drängen, to press) is a large number of persons who press together into a collective body; a crowd is a mass of persons who press so closely together as to bring their bodies into immediate or inconvenient contact. A dispersed multitude—the thronged streets of a city—a crowded coach; a crowded table.

So, with this bold opposer rushes on
This many-headed monster, multitude. DANIEL.

Back to the assembly rolled the thronging train,
Desert the ships and pour upon the plain. HOMER.

I come from empty noise, and tasteless pomp,
From crowds that hide a monarch from himself.
JOHNSON.

TIDINGS, NEWS.

The term news denotes recent intelligence from any quarter; the term tidings (from Sax. tidan, to happen or betide) denotes intelligence expected from a particular quarter, showing what has there betided. We may be indifferent as to news; but are always more or less interested in tidings. We read the news daily in the public prints; we wait for tidings respecting an absent or sick friend. We may be curious to hear the news; we are always anxious for tidings.

Evil news rides fast, while good news baits.
MILTON.

What tidings dost thou bring? methinks I see
Unusual gladness sparkling in thy eyes. ADDISON.

TIME-SERVING, TEMPORIZING.

Both these words are applied to the conduct of one who adapts himself servilely to times and seasons. A time-server is rather active, and a temporizer passive. One whose policy is time-serving, comes forward to act upon principles or opinions which may promote his advancement; one who is temporizing yields to the current of public sentiment or prejudice, and shrinks from a course of action which might injure him with others. The former is dishonest; the latter is weak; and both are contemptible.

Trimming and time-serving, which are but two words for the same thing, always produce confusion.

TOIL, LABOR, DRUDGERY.

Labor implies strenuous exertion, but not necessarily such as overtasks the faculties; toil (lit., straining, striving) denotes a severity of labor which is painful and exhausting; drudgery (lit., tugging or slaving) implies mean and degrading work, or at least, work which wearies or disgusts from its minuteness or dull uniformity.

You do not know the heavy grievances,

TOWARD, TOWARDS.

This is a compound of to and ward (Latin, versus). The original form was towards (being the genitive of ward), as appears from the Anglo-Saxon towardes, and a comparison of the cognate dialects. The s was dropped in our version of the Scriptures, making it toward; but the original form, towards, has always remained in general use.

We may easily observe every creature about us incessantly working toward the end for which it was designed. BARROW.

TRAIN, CARS.

Train is the word universally used in England with reference to railway traveling; as, "I came in the morning train," &c. In this country, the phrase "the cars" has been extensively introduced in the room of train; as, "the cars are late;" "I came in the cars," &c., though, in fact, a person travels in only one car. The English expression is obviously more appropriate, and is prevailing more and more in our country, to the exclusion of "the cars."

TRANSACTION, PROCEEDING.

A transaction (from trans and ago) is something already done and completed; a proceeding (from proceed) is either something which is now going on, or, if ended, is still contemplated with reference to its progress or successive stages. The proceedings at the trial of Lord Russell were marked by deep injustice, and they led to a transaction, in his beheading, of flagrant enormity.

"We are witnesses to the whole proceeding; we inquire into the whole transaction. The proceeding embraces every event or circumstance which goes forward through the agency of men; the transaction only comprehends those matters which have been deliberately transacted or brought to a conclusion: in this sense we use the word proceeding in application to an affray in the street; and the word transaction to some commercial negotiation that has been carried on between certain persons. The proceeding marks the manner of proceeding; as when we speak of the proceedings in a court of law. The transaction marks the business transacted; as, the transactions on the Exchange. A proceeding may be characterized as disgraceful; a transaction as iniquitous."—CRABB.

TRANSCENDENTAL, EMPIRICAL.

These terms, with the corresponding nouns, transcendentalism and empiricism, are of comparatively recent origin. Empirical, in this connection, refers to knowledge which is gained by the experience of actual phenomena, without reference to the principles or laws to which they are to be referred or by which they are to be explained. Transcendental has reference to those beliefs or principles which are not derived from experience, and yet are absolutely necessary to make experience possible or useful. Such, in the better sense of the term, is the transcendental philosophy or transcendentalism. Each of these words has also been used in a bad sense. Empiricism, in this case, is applied to that one-sided view of knowledge which neglects or loses sight of the truths or principles referred to above, and trusts to experience alone. Transcendentalism has been applied to the opposite extreme, which, in its depreciation of experience, loses sight of the relation which facts and phenomena sustain to principles. Hence the term has been applied to a kind of investigation, or a use of language, which is vague, obscure, fantastic or extravagant.

TRANSIENT, TRANSITORY, FLEETING.

Transient (from transiens, passing) represents a thing as short at the best; transitory (from transitorius, of a passing nature) as liable at any moment to pass away. Fleeting goes further and represents it as in the act of taking its flight. Life is transient; its joys are transitory; its hours are fleeting.

TRANSITORY. See TRANSIENT.

TRANSLUCENT, TRANSPARENT.

A thing is translucent (from trans, through, and luceo, to shine) when it merely admits the passage of light without enabling us to distinguish objects through it; it is transparent (from trans, through, and paro, to appear) when we can clearly discern objects placed on the other side of it. Glass, water, &c., are transparent; ground glass, horn, &c., are translucent.

Each thought was visible that rolled within,
As through a crystal case the figured hours are seen,
And heaven did this transparent veil provide,
Because she had no guilty thought to hide.
DRYDEN.

Wherever fountain or fresh current flowed,
Against the eastern ray, translucent, pure
With touch ætherial of heaven's fiery rod,
I drank. MILTON.

TRIAL. See TEST, also ATTEMPT.

TRIBUTE. See SUBSIDY.

TROUBLE. See AFFLICTION.

TROWSERS, PANTALOONS.

In this country we have almost laid aside the original word trowsers, applying the term only to the loose garment of sailors or laborers, and using pantaloons in all other cases. The English adhere to the old term in respect equally to the dress of gentlemen and all others, making much less use than we do of the word pantaloons in this connection.

TO TRY, ATTEMPT.

To try is the generic, to attempt (from ad and tento, to grasp at) is the specific term. When we try we are usually uncertain as to success; when we attempt, we have always some definite object in view which we seek to accomplish. We may be indifferent as to the result of a trial, but we rarely attempt any thing without a desire to succeed.

He first deceased, she for a little tried
To live without him, liked it not and died.
WOTTON.

I am afraid they have awaked,
And 'tis not done; the attempt and not the deed
Confounds us. SHAKESPEARE.

UNION, UNITY.

Union is the act of bringing two or more things together so as to make but one. Unity is a state of simple oneness, either of essence; as, the unity of God; or of action, feeling, &c.; as, unity of design, of affection, &c. Thus, we may speak of effecting a union of interests which shall result in a perfect unity of labor and interest in securing a given object.

One kingdom, joy, and union without end.
MILTON.

Man is to beget
Like of his like; his image multiplied
In unity defective; which requires,
Collateral love and dearest amity. MILTON.

TO UNITE. See TO ADD.
UNITY. See UNION.
UNIVERSAL. See GENERAL.

UNLESS, EXCEPT.

Except and unless were formerly confounded; as, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me." In present usage, except has always reference to some general fact, rule, &c., of which the speaker goes on to state an "exception;" as, "none can enter except by permission." Unless (Sax. onlesan, to unloose or set aside) has reference to some result as affected by our taking away or setting aside some specified thing; as, "unless we eat, we shall die;" that is, if we take away the fact or supposition of our eating, the certain result is death.

UNITE. See TO ADD.
UNNATURAL. See FACTITIOUS.
UNTRUTH. See LIE.

USAGE, CUSTOM.

These words, as here compared, agree in expressing the idea of habitual practice; but a custom is not necessarily a usage.

A custom may belong to many or to a single individual. A usage properly belongs to the great body of a people. Hence we speak of usage, not of custom, as the law of language. Again, a custom is merely that which has been often repeated, so as to have become, in a good degree, established. A usage must be both often repeated and of long standing. Hence we speak of a "new custom," but not of a "new usage." Thus, also the "customs of society" is not so strong an expression as the "usages of society."

Custom, a greater power than nature, seldom fails to make them worship. LOCKE.

Of things once received and confirmed by use, long usage is a law sufficient. HOOKER.

TO USE, EMPLOY.

We use a thing, or make use of it, when we derive from it some enjoyment or service. We employ it (from Gr., to direct to some object), when we turn that service into a particular channel. We use words to express our general meaning; we employ certain technical terms in reference to a given subject. To make use of, implies a kind of passive agency; as, to make use of a pen; and hence there is often a material difference between the two words when applied to persons. To speak of "making use of another" generally implies a degrading idea, as if we had used him as a tool; while employ has no such sense. A confidential friend is employed to negotiate; an inferior agent is made use of to carry on an intrigue.

I would, my son, that thou would'st use the power
Which thy discretion gives thee, to control
And manage all. COWPER.

To study nature will thy time employ;
Knowledge and innocence are perfect joy.
DRYDEN.

USEFULNESS. See UTILITY.

USELESS, FRUITLESS, INEFFECTUAL.

We speak of an attempt, &c., as useless (not capable of being used to effect) when there are in it inherent difficulties which forbid the hope of success; as, it is useless to contend against the decisions of Providence. We speak of it as fruitless when it fails, not from any such difficulties, but from some unexpected hinderance or calamity arising to frustrate it; as, the design was rendered fruitless by the death of its projector. It is useless to attempt any thing without adequate means; and even when we do possess them, our efforts are often fruitless. Ineffectual nearly resembles fruitless, but implies a failure of a less hopeless character; as, "after several ineffectual efforts, I at last succeeded."

Useless are all words
Till you have writ performance with your swords.
BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.

All searches into antiquity, in relation to this controversy, are either needless or fruitless.
WATERLAND.

Even our blessed Saviour's preaching, who spake as never man spake, was ineffectual to many.
STILLINGFLEET.

UTILITY, USEFULNESS.

Usefulness is Saxon, and utility is Latin; and hence the former is used chiefly of things in the concrete, while the latter is employed more in a general and abstract sense. Thus we speak of the utility of an invention, and the usefulness of the thing invented; of the utility of an institution, and the usefulness of an individual. So "beauty and utility" (not usefulness) are brought into comparison. Still, the words are, in many cases, used interchangeably.

TO UTTER. See TO DELIVER.

V.

VACANT, EMPTY.

A thing is empty when there is nothing in it; as, an empty room or an empty noddle. Vacant adds the idea of a thing's having been previously filled or intended to be filled or occupied; as, a vacant seat at the table; a vacant space between houses, vacant hours, &c. When we speak of a vacant look or a vacant mind, we imply that the thought naturally to be expected, has vacated its proper place or office.

Cold is the hearth within their bowers,
And should we thither roam;
Its echoes and its empty tread
Would sound like voices from the dead.
T. CAMPBELL.

The watch dog's voice that bayed the whispering wind,
And the loud laugh that spoke the vacant mind.

TO VACILLATE. See TO FLUCTUATE.
VALOR. See COURAGE, also HEROISM.
VANITY. See EGOTISM, also PRIDE.
TO VANQUISH. See TO CONQUER.

VARIETY, DIVERSITY.

A man has a variety of employments (from varius, manifold) when he does many things which are not a mere repetition of the same act; he has a diversity of employments (from diversus, turned in different directions) when the several acts performed are unlike each other, i. e., diverse. In most cases, where there is variety there will be more or less of diversity, but not always. One who sells railroad tickets performs a great variety of acts in a day, while there is but little diversity in his employment.

All sorts are here that all the earth yields;
Variety without end. MILTON.

But see in all corporeal nature's scene,
What changes, what diversities have been!
BLACKMORE.

VENAL, MERCENARY.

One is mercenary (from merces, a reward) who is either actually a hireling; as, mercenary soldiers, a mercenary judge, &c., or is governed by a sordid love of gain; hence, we speak of mercenary motives, a mercenary marriage, &c. Venal (from venalis, up for sale) goes further, and supposes either an actual purchase or a readiness to be purchased, which places a person or thing wholly in the power of the purchaser; as, a venal press. Brissot played ingeniously on the latter word in his celebrated saying, "My pen is venal that it may not be mercenary," meaning that he wrote books and sold them to the publishers, in order to avoid the necessity of being the hireling of any political party.

Thus needy wits a vile revenue made,
And verse became a mercenary trade.
DRYDEN.

This verse be thine, my friend, nor thou refuse
This, from no venal or ungrateful muse. POPE.

VENERATION. See AWE.
VENOM. See POISON.

VEST, WAISTCOAT.

In England, the original word waistcoat is always used for the garment worn immediately under a coat; in this country, vest (from the French) has been universally substituted, while waistcoat is more generally used for an under garment, as "a flannel waistcoat."

Over his lucid arms
A military vest of purple flowed
Livelier than Melibœan. MILTON.

'Twas a sad sight before they marched from home
To see our warriors in red waistcoats come,
With hair tucked up into our tiring room.
MARRIAGE A LA MODE.

VESTIBULE, HALL, PASSAGE.

A vestibule (from vestis, a garment) means literally a cloak-room, and hence, a small apartment within the doors of a building. Hall is the first large apartment beyond the vestibule, and, in this country, is usually long and narrow, serving as a passage to the several apartments. In England, the hall is generally square or oblong, and a long, narrow space of entrance is called a passage, not a hall, as in America. In a figurative sense vestibule denotes the place of entrance; while hall is used for any large room, and often in the plural for any large building.

The citizens of Rome placed the images of their ancestors in the vestibules of their houses.
BOLINGBROKE.

That light we see is burning in my hall.
SHAKESPEARE.

VESTIGE, TRACE.

These words agree in marking some indications of the past; but differ to some extent in their use and application.

Vestige is from vestigium, a foot-print; but is now used only in a figurative sense, as denoting the remains of something long passed; as, the vestiges of ancient times, vestiges of the creation. A trace (from tracto, to draw) is literally something drawn out in a line; and may be used in this, its primary sense, or figuratively to denote that which leads us to the knowledge of something else we are seeking. Vestige is, therefore, the stronger term, and always supposes some definite object of the past to be left behind; while a trace is a mere indication that something has been present or is present; as, traces of former population, a trace of poison in a given substance.

Village, Hamlet, Town, City.

In England, a hamlet (lit., a little home or confined place) denotes a collection of houses too small to have a parish church. A village has a church, but no market. A town has both a market and a church or churches. A city is, in the legal sense, an incorporated borough town, which is or has been the place of a bishop's see. It is hardly necessary to say that the last three words have a different acceptation in our country.

These were thy charms, sweet village! sports like these,
With sweet succession, taught e'en toil to please.
Goldsmith.

Sometimes with secure delight
The upland hamlets will invite. Milton.

The policy of Europe has been more favorable to the industry of towns, than to agriculture, the industry of the country. Smith.

A city is a town incorporated, which is or has been the see of a bishop; and though the bishopric hath been dissolved, as at Westminster, it yet remaineth a city. Blackstone.

To Vindicate. See To Assert.

Visionary. See Fanciful.

Vivacity. See Liveliness.

Volatility. See Levity.

Volition, Choice.

Choice is Saxon, and volition Latin. The former is the familiar, and the latter the scientific term for the same state of the will, viz., an "elective preference." When we have "made up our minds" (as we say) to a thing, i. e., have a settled state of choice respecting it, that state is called an immanent volition; when we put forth any particular act of choice, that act is called an emanent, or executive, or imperative volition. When an "immanent" or settled state of choice is one which controls or governs a series of actions, we call that state a predominant volition; while we give the name of subordinate volitions to those particular acts of choice which carry into effect the object sought for by the governing or "predominant volition."

Voluntary. See Spontaneous.

Waistcoat. See Vest.

Want. See Indigence.

Warlike. See Martial.

Wary. See Cautious.

To Waver. See To Fluctuate.

Way, Street, Highway, Road.

Way is generic, denoting any line for passage or conveyance; a highway is literally one raised for the sake of dryness and convenience in traveling; a road (from ride) is strictly a way for horses and carriages; a street (Latin, via lapidibus strata) is, etymologically, a paved way, as early made in towns and cities, and hence the word is distinctively applied to roads or highways in compact settlements.

All keep the broad highway, and take delight
With many rather for to go astray. Spenser.

There is but one road by which to climb up.
Addison.

When night
Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons
Of Belial, flown with insolence and wine.
Milton.

Wearisome. See Irksome.

To Weary. See To Jade.

Wet. See Nasty.

Where. See Whither.

Whim, Freak.

These words are here compared in respect to variable states of mind.

A freak is literally a sudden start or change of place, and hence denotes some particular act which is hasty or fanciful, perhaps humorous or childish; a whim is dictated by caprice, and usually implies a state of mind more eccentric than childish. The young are apt to have their freaks, and the old to indulge themselves in whims.

Where mirth's light freaks the unheeded hours beguile,
And airs of rapture warble on the gale. Beattie.

He learned his whims and high-flown notions too,
Such as fine men adopt, and fine men rue.
Harte.

Whimsical. See Quaint.

To Whiten. See To Blanch.

Whither, Where.

Whither is now to a great extent obsolete, except in poetry, or in compositions of a grave and serious character. Where has taken its place, as in the question, "Where are you going?" &c.

Whole, Entire, Total, Complete.

When we use the word whole, we refer to a thing as made up of parts, none of which are wanting; as, a whole week, a whole year, the whole creation. When we use the word total (from L. totus) we have reference to all as taken together, and forming a single totality; as, the total amount, the total income. When we speak of a thing as entire (from L. integer, untouched or unbroken) we have no reference to parts at all, but regard the thing as an integer, i. e., continuous or unbroken; as, an entire year, entire prosperity. When we speak of a thing as complete (from com and pleo, to fill out) there is reference to some progress which results in a filling out to some end or object, or in other words absolute fullness; as, complete success, a complete victory.

All the whole army stood agazed at him.
Shakespeare.

Lest total darkness should by night regain
Her old possession and extinguish life. Milton.

One entire and perfect chrysolite. Shakespeare.

So absolute she seems,
And in herself complete. Milton.

Wicked. See Iniquitous.

Wily. See Cunning.

To Win. See To Gain.

Wisdom, Prudence.

Wisdom has been defined to be "the use of the best means for attaining the best ends," and in this sense implies the union of high mental and moral excellence. Prudence is of a more negative character; it rather consists in avoiding danger than in taking decisive measures for the accomplishment of an object. Sir Robert Walpole was in many respects a prudent statesman, but he was far from being a wise one. Burke has remarked that prudence, when carried too far, degenerates into a "reptile virtue," which is the more dangerous for the plausible appearance it wears.

Wit, Humor.

Wit (Saxon, witian, to know) formerly meant genius, and now denotes the power of seizing on some thought or occurrence, and, by a sudden turn, presenting it under aspects wholly new and unexpected—apparently natural and admissible, if not perfectly just, and bearing on the subject, or the parties concerned, with a laughable keenness and force. "What I want," said a pompous orator, aiming at his antagonist, "is common sense." "Exactly!" was the whispered reply. The pleasure we find in wit arises from the ingenuity of the turn, the sudden surprise it brings, and the patness of its application to the case, in the new and ludicrous relations thus flashed upon the view. Humor is a quality more congenial than wit to the English mind. It consists primarily in taking up the peculiarities of a humorist (a class of persons in which England abounds), and drawing them out, as Addison did those of Sir Roger de Coverley, so that we enjoy a hearty, good-natured laugh at the unconscious development he makes of his whims and oddities. From this original sense the term has been widened to embrace other sources of kindly mirth of the same general character. In a well-known caricature upon English reserve, an Oxford student is represented as standing on the brink of a river, greatly agitated at the sight of a drowning man before him, and crying out, "Oh, that I had been introduced to this gentleman, that I might save his life!" The Silent Woman of Ben Jonson is the most humorous production, in the original sense of the term, which we have in our language.

Wonderful. See Marvelous.

Word. See Term.

Would Seem. See Seem.

Wrangle. See Altercation.

Wrath. See Anger.

Y.

Yet. See However.

Yielding, Obsequious, Attentive.

In many cases a man may be attentive or yielding in a high degree without any sacrifice of his dignity; but he who is obsequious seeks to curry favor by excessive and mean compliances for some selfish end.

I'm never merry when I hear sweet music:
—The reason is, your spirits are attentive.
Shakespeare.

Life is but air
That yields a passage to the whistling sword,
And closes when 'tis gone. Dryden.

Let neither
Too much obsequiousness teach them insolency,
Nor any ill-usage brand us with incivility. Shirley.

Youthful, Puerile, Juvenile.

Puerile (from puer, a boy) is always used in a bad sense, or at least in the sense of what is suitable to a boy only; as, puerile objections, puerile amusements, &c. Juvenile (from juvenis, a youth) is sometimes taken in a bad sense (though less strong than puerile), as when speaking of youth in contrast with manhood; as, juvenile tricks, a juvenile performance. Youthful is commonly employed in a good sense; as, youthful aspirations, or at least by way of extenuating, as youthful indiscretions.

Some men, imagining themselves possessed with a divine fury, often fall into toys and trifles, which are only puerilities. Dryden.

Raw juvenile writers imagine that, by pouring forth figures often, they render their compositions warm and animated. Blair.

In his years were seen,
A youthful vigor and autumnal green. Dryden.

ORTHOGRAPHY OF DR. WEBSTER,

AS EXHIBITED IN THIS VOLUME.

1. Terminations in OUR changed into OR. — Such words as favor, labor, &c., formerly ending in our, drop the u. One word, however, is here given in both ways, viz., Savior, Saviour.

2. Terminations in CK changed into C. — Words of more than one syllable, ending in ic or iac, which formerly ended in k, have dropped the k, as in music, maniac, &c. Add to these almanac, sandarac, limbec (from alembic); also havoc. The k is retained (1) in a few derivatives, as colicky, trafficker, mimicking, &c., to prevent an erroneous pronunciation; (2) in all monosyllables, as sick, stick, wreck, &c., and hence in their compounds, as brain-sick, candlestick, shipwreck, &c.; (3) in all other terminations except ic and iac, as in arrack, hammock, &c.

3. Terminations in RE changed into ER. — Such words as centre, metre, theatre, &c., with their compounds, have the re changed into er, as center, meter, theater, &c. Some hundreds of words, like chamber, cider, diameter, &c., have already undergone this change, which is here extended to about twenty more, to complete the analogy. Acre, lucre, and massacre, are necessarily excepted, because the change would lead to an erroneous pronunciation. The above words, however, are here given in both modes of spelling.

4. Words in which the final consonant is not doubled in adding such formatives as ING, ED, ER, &c. — It is a rule extending to many hundreds of cases, that, in adding to a word such formatives as ing, ed, er, &c., a single consonant at the end of a word is doubled when the accent falls on the last syllable, as in forgetting, beginning, excelling; but is not doubled when the accent falls on any preceding syllable, as in benefiting, gardener, &c. This rule has been violated in the case of about fifty words ending in l, whose derivatives have had the l doubled, as traveller, &c. These words are here restored to their true analogous spelling, as recommended by Walker, Lowth, Perry, and others, as in traveling, canceled, leveler, counselor, duelist, marvelous, &c. On the same principle, woolen is spelled with a single l. It does not interfere with this rule that chancellor, and the derivatives of metal and crystal, as metalline, metallurgy, crystalline, crystallize, &c., have the l doubled, since they come directly from the Latin cancellarius and metallum (Greek μέταλλον), and the Greek κρύσταλλος. The above rule is also applied to the derivatives of worship and bias, making them worshiping, worshiped, worshiper, biasing, biased. Bigoted has already taken its true spelling with but one t, and such should be the spelling of carbureted, sulphureted, &c.

5. Distinction between verbs in IZE and ISE. — Verbs from the Greek ιζω, and others formed in analogy with them, have the termination ize, as baptize, legalize, &c. Catechise and exorcise are exceptions. Verbs, and also some nouns, derived directly from the French, with a few from other sources, end in ise, as advertise, advise, affranchise, amortise, chastise, circumcise, comprise, compromise, criticise, demise, despise, devise, disfranchise, disguise, divertise, emprise, enfranchise, enterprise, exercise, manumise, merchandise, misprise (to mistake), premise, reprise (to take again), revise, supervise, surmise, surprise.

6. Terminations in ABLE. — Able, when incorporated into words ending with silent e, cuts it off, as in blamable, except after c or g, as in noticeable, changeable.

7. Compounds of words ending in LL. — Such compounds as befall, miscall, install, forestall, inthrall, enroll, retain the double l, to prevent a false pronunciation, making the last vowel short, as befal, enrol, &c. For the same reason, double l should be retained in the nouns installment, inthrallment, thralldom, and enrollment.

8. DEFENSE, OFFENSE, and PRETENSE. — In these words, s is substituted for c, because s is used in the derivatives, as defensive, offensive, pretension. The words expense, recompense, and license, have, on this ground, undergone the same alteration within comparatively a short period, and a change in the three mentioned above would complete the analogy. These words are here given in both forms of spelling.

9. FORETELL, DISTILL, INSTILL, FULFILL. — These words retain the ll of their primitives, for it must be retained in the participles and other derivatives, as foretelling, distiller, instilling, fulfilled, &c. In this case, it is only necessary to remember the rule, that the spelling of the original words tell, still, fill, is retained in all the derivatives.

10. CONNECTION, DEFLECTION, INFLECTION, REFLECTION. — These follow the spelling of their verbs, connect, deflect, inflect, reflect.

11. Derivatives of DULL, SKILL, WILL, and FULL. — These retain the ll, viz. dullness, fullness, skillful, willful, to prevent the inconvenience of exceptions to a general rule. Walker says, there is no reason why we should not write dullness, fullness, skillful, and willful, as well as stiffness, gruffness, and crossness.

12. Derivatives of VILLAIN. — The derivatives of villain ought to retain the i, as in villainous, villainy, &c. This is the case in all similar words when the ain is not under the accent, as mountainous from mountain, captaincy from captain, chieftaincy from chieftain, chaplaincy from chaplain, certainty from certain, &c. Both modes of spelling, however, are given in this volume.

13. MOULD and MOULT. — These words should be written mold and molt, like gold, bold, fold, colt, &c., in which the u has been dropped, or was never introduced; but they are here given in both ways.

14. Terms in chemistry. — The orthography oxyd (from ὀξυς) is considered preferable to oxide, because in all other derivatives the Greek υ is represented by the English y, as in oxygen, hydrogen, &c. In such terminations as chlorid, fluorid, ammid, &c., the final e is not used, because they are formed in analogy with acid, and the e is unnecessary, and might lead to the error of giving a long sound to the preceding i. Such words as salicin, cerin, veratrin, &c., also omit the final e in most cases, because it is unnecessary, though it is retained in bromine, chlorine, fluorine, iodine, and a very few others. The spelling of the last class of words has the authority of Brande's Encyclopedia, the Penny Cyclopedia, and some distinguished chemical works.

15. WOE. — This word takes the final e, like doe, foe, hoe, sloe, toe, and all similar nouns of one syllable. The termination in o belongs, among monosyllables, to the other parts of speech, as go, so, and to nouns of more than one syllable, as motto, potato, tomato, &c.

16. PRACTICE, as a verb. — This verb should be spelled like the noun, with a c, as in notice, apprentice, and all similar words in which the accent precedes the last syllable. The distinction of spelling between the noun and verb belongs properly to words accented on the last syllable, as device, n., devise (pronounced devize'), v. To apply the distinction here, and spell the verb practise, tends to give it the same pronunciation (practize) as we often find in uneducated persons; but as this spelling, though in opposition to the regular analogy, is more prevalent, the verb is here given in both ways.

17. DROUTH is given as spelled by Spenser, Bacon, &c., and as still extensively pronounced; and hight as spelled by Milton, and derived from high. They are, however, placed under drought and height, the more ordinary spelling, though, on some accounts, the old spelling is to be preferred.

The Arabic vowels are only three, viz. Fatha, ـَ a, e; Kesra, ـِ e, i; Dhamma, ـُ o, u.

The diacritical signs are Jesm ـْ or quiescent Sheva; Teshdid ـّ or Dagesh forte; Hamza ـٔ placed over Elif when radical.

Nunnation or double final vowels, ـً ـٍ ـٌ, showing that they are to be pronounced an, en or in, on or un.

The Persians use the Arabic alphabet, with the addition of Pe, پ; Che, چ; Ghaf, ڭ گ; and Zhe, ژ.

Note. — In the foregoing alphabets, the order of the Arabic and Ethiopic letters is conformed to that of the Chaldee and Hebrew. The reader will observe two or three defects, which are owing to the imperfection of the fonts of type

DIRECTIONS AND EXPLANATIONS.

 Compound words, which in ordinary writing have the parts separated by a hyphen, are arranged, when numerous, directly after the word which forms their first part. In many cases, however, especially when their number is small, they are arranged in their regular alphabetical order. If, then, a compound word is not found in the first-mentioned place, it should be sought in its strictly alphabetical order.

 At the end of some of the etymologies, there are references, (as, under the word ABATE, "See Class Bd, No. 23, 33,") which point to corresponding parts in the author's "Synopsis of Words in Twenty Languages" — a work which has not yet been published.

REMARKS.

1. Improper Diphthongs. — In these, the vowel which is sounded is alone marked, as in āi, ēa, or eā, ōu, &c.

2. Double Accent (″). — This is used in two cases: (1) When, in such words as an″ger, (pronounced ang′ger,) the g is, as it were, drawn back to the preceding syllable, forming with n the sound of ng, while it is also retained with its proper hard sound in its own syllable. Thus the distinction is marked between such words as lon″ger, of greater length, and long′er, one who longs. (2) When, in the case of e or i followed by ci or ti, the sound of sh is drawn back to the preceding syllable, as in spe″cial, discre″tion, addi″tion, vi″cious, (pronounced spesh′al, diskresh′un, addish′un, vish′us.) The double accent is also used when the sound of zh is drawn back, as in transi″tion, vi″sion, (pronounced transizh′un, vizh′un;) but this peculiarity is also indicated either by respelling or by the marked s. When the single accent (′) and double accent (″) both occur on the same word, the former is to be considered the primary, and the latter the secondary accent, as in cheese′mon″ger.

3. Vowels in Italics. — Vowels which are Italicized are not sounded, as the a in met*a*l; the e in us*e*d, hazel, burd*e*n; the i in ev*i*l, cous*i*n; the o in beck*o*n, &c. Hence, the termination ed in participles and adjectives, when the e is Italicized, though separated to the eye, does not to the ear form a distinct syllable. Thus used is pronounced in one syllable.

4. Accented Syllables. — When an accented syllable ends in a consonant, the vowel which it contains has its regular short or shut sound, unless otherwise denoted according to the key.

5. Unaccented Syllables. — When an unaccented syllable ends in a vowel other than e mute, this vowel has an obscure or faint sound, unless otherwise marked. The obscure a is usually the short Italian a, as in America. The obscure e, i, and y, have the open sound of e shortened, as in event, lab*i*al, duty; and hence, in respelling for pronunciation, the e is used to denote these sounds. The obscure o and u have their regular open sounds, but somewhat shortened, as in monopoly, superfluous. When the unaccented syllable ends in a consonant, the vowel which it contains, if single, has its regular short or shut sound, as in assign, explain, furnish, connective, calumny; but a in such words as monarchy, &c., has the faint sound of the Italian a. In neither of these cases should the sound of the other vowels (a, e, i, o, y) run into that of u in tub.

6. Terminations in ICE, IGE, &c. — When the i in such terminations as ice, ige, ile, ime, ine, ise, ite, ive, is not marked with any distinctive character, it is to be considered short, as in malice, vestige, hostile, feminine, &c., pronounced mal′is, ves′tij, hos′til, fem′inin, &c.

7. Long A before R. — The long sound of a before r in the same syllable, as heard in fare, p*air*, p*arent*, b*ear*, &c., is nearly the same as in fate; or, more exactly, it begins with the latter sound, and ends with the faint sound of e or ə. In this case, however, the a should never be made a distinct syllable, fā′er, pā′rent, but fāre, &c. So prayer, though spelled in two syllables, should be pronounced in one, as prāre. By many, however, the first part of this compound sound is entirely omitted, and the a in fare, &c., is pronounced like the a in fat, but much lengthened in quantity. This, according to Smart and all the later orthoëpists, as well as Walker, is a departure from true English usage.

8. Italian A. — The sound of a in f*a*r, d*a*unt, &c., and its sound in f*a*st, p*a*nt, &c., being radically the same, is represented by the same character, ä. Yet, in words like f*a*st, cl*a*sp, *a*sk, p*a*ss, w*a*ft, p*a*th, p*a*nt, &c., the sound is not so much prolonged as in f*a*r; and in such words as d*a*nce, adv*a*ntage, it is shortened still more, and by some is changed into the sound of a in f*a*t.

9. Broad A. — The distinction between the broad a (ą), or aw, and the same sound shortened (ą), as in wh*a*t, is readily perceived. In some words, however, as s*a*lt, cob*a*lt, &c., the a is not so broad as in *a*ll, nor so short as in wh*a*t; but, in respect to this nicer distinction, the ear must decide.

10. Short E before R. — The sound of short e before r at the end of a word, or followed by another consonant than r, as in confer, perform, herd, earth, &c., is nearly the same as that of short u before r; but some, particularly in England, attempt, in this case, to give the e its regular short sound, as heard in h*e*n, h*e*rald, h*e*rring. The same remarks may be made respecting ir, to which some attempt, in such words as v*ir*gin, m*ir*th, &c., to give the regular sound of short e and r.

11. Short O. — The shut sound of o before r in the same syllable, as in n*o*r, being unavoidably the same as that of ą, is not marked with any distinctive character. A sound intermediate in length between that of a in *a*ll and of o in n*o*t is heard in such words as *o*ff, s*o*ft, s*o*ng, cl*o*th, l*o*ss, fr*o*st, &c. Here, however, a drawl is carefully to be avoided.

12. Long U. — The long or open sound of u has been considered by many as a diphthong composed of e, or y, and oo. Dr. Webster regarded it, in most cases, as a peculiar vowel sound, nearly resembling e and oo, but so much closer as hardly to be diphthongal; and considered the sound as yoo only when it begins a syllable, or when it is heard in certain terminations, as in ure, &c. There is a strong tendency, which ought to be carefully avoided, to change this sound into oo after d, t, l, n, and s, as doo′ty for dū′ty, &c.; but in avoiding this, as Smart remarks, the u must be kept very close, and not run into dyuty or de-uty. Walker sounds u like oo after r; but even here, the best speakers, in Dr. Webster's view, give a slight softening between the vowel and the consonant, pronouncing r*u*de in a less broad and open manner than r*oo*d, i. e., giving the u its distinctive sound.

13. Respelling for Pronunciation. — (1) In respelling the French en, on, &c., the letters ng are designed simply to mark the vowel as nasal, and are not to be pronounced themselves. (2) The respelling of a word, when a number of related words follow, applies to all of them down to some other word which is respelled. (3) Compound words, which are not respelled or otherwise marked, are to be pronounced like the simple words of which they are composed; but of and with at the end of compounds, like here*of*, here*with*, &c., have their final consonants sounded as in do*ff*, smi*th*.

SYNOPSIS OF WORDS DIFFERENTLY PRONOUNCED BY DIFFERENT ORTHOËPISTS.

Entered, according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1857, by Emily W. Ellsworth, Julia W. Goodrich, Eliza S. W. Jones, William G. Webster, and Louisa Webster, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the District of Connecticut.

 The marks of pronunciation are the same as in the dictionary, except that a point under vowels indicates that they have a light or obscure sound.

WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY

OF

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

A is the first letter of the alphabet in most of the known languages of the earth; in the Ethiopic, however, it is the thirteenth, and in the Runic, the tenth. It is naturally the first letter, because it represents the first vocal sound naturally formed by the human organs; being the sound uttered with a mere opening of the mouth without constraint, and without any effort to alter the natural position or configuration of the lips. Hence this letter is found in many words first uttered by infants; which words are the names of the objects with which infants are first concerned, as the breast, and the parents. Hence in Hebrew אם am, is mother, and אב ab, is father. In Chaldee and Syriac, abba is father; in Arabic, aba; in Ethiopic, abi; in Malayan and Bengalese, bappa; in Welsh, tad, whence we retain dad; in Old Greek and in Gothic, atta; in Irish, aithair; in Cantabrian, aita; in Lapponic, atki; in Abyssinian, abba; in Amharic, aba; in Shilhic and Melindane, African dialects, baba; and papa is found in many nations. Hence the Latin mamma, the breast, which is, in popular use, the name of mother; in Swedish, amma is a nurse. This list might be greatly extended; but these examples prove A to be the first natural vocal sound, and entitled to the first place in alphabets. The Hebrew name of this letter, aleph, signifies an ox or a leader.

A has, in English, four sounds; the long or slender, as in place, fate; the broad, as in wall, fall, which is shortened in squad, what; the open, or Italian, as in father, which is shortened in china; and the short sound, as in fat. Its primitive sound was probably aw. A is also an abbreviation of the Saxon an or ane, one, used before words beginning with an articulation; as, a table, instead of an table, or one table. This is a modern change; for in Saxon an was used before consonants as well as vowels; as, an tid, a time, an gear, a year. [See AN.]

This letter serves as a prefix to many English words, as in asleep, awake, afoot, aground, agoing. In some cases, this is a contraction of the Teutonic ge, as in asleep; aware, from the Saxon geslapan, to sleep, gewarian, to beware; the Dutch gewaar. Sometimes it is a corruption of the Saxon on; as, again, from ongean; awake, from onwacian, to watch or wake. Before participles, it may be a contraction of the Celtic ag, the sign of the participle of the present tense; as, ag-radh, saying; a-saying, a-going. Or this may be a contraction of on, or, what is equally probable, it may have proceeded from a mere accidental sound produced by negligent utterance. In some words, a may be a contraction of at, of, in, to, or an. In some words of Greek original, a is privative, giving to them a negative sense, as in anonymous, from a and ονομα, name.

Among the ancients, A was a numeral, denoting 500; and with a dash, $\bar{A}$, 5000. In the Hebrew, Syr., Ch., Sam., and Ar., it denotes one or unity. In the Julian calendar, A is the first of the seven dominical letters.

Among logicians, A, as an abbreviation, stands for a universal affirmative proposition. A asserts; E denies. Thus in barbara, a, thrice repeated, denotes so many of the propositions to be universal.

The Romans used A to signify a negative or dissent in giving their votes; A. standing for antiquo, I oppose or object to the proposed law. Opposed to this letter were U. R., uti rogas, be it as you desire — the words used to express assent to a proposition. These letters were marked on wooden ballots, and each voter had an affirmative and a negative put into his hands, one of which, at pleasure, he gave as his vote. — In criminal trials, A. stood for absolvo, I acquit; C. for condemno, I condemn; and N. L. for non liquet, it is not evident; and the judges voted by ballots thus marked. — In inscriptions, A. stands for Augustus; or for ager, aiunt, aurum, argentum, &c.

A. is also used for anno; as in A. D., for anno Domini, the year of our Lord; and A. M., for anno mundi, the year of the world; and also for ante, as in A. M., for ante meridiem, before noon; and for arts, as in A. M., for artium magister, master of arts. With the Romans, A. U. C. stood for anno urbis conditæ, in the year from the building of the city of Rome.

In algebra, a and the first letters of the alphabet represent known quantities — the last letters are sometimes used to represent unknown quantities.

In music, A is the nominal of the sixth note in the natural diatonic scale — called by Guido la. It is also the name of one of the two natural moods; and it is the open note of the 2d string of the violin, by which the other strings are tuned and regulated.

In pharmacy, ā or āā, abbreviations of the Greek ana, signify of each separately, or that the things mentioned should be taken in quantities of the same weight or measure.

In chemistry, A A A stand for amalgama, or amalgamation.

In commerce, A. stands for accepted, as in case of a bill of exchange. Merchants also number their books by the letters, A, B, C, instead of figures. Public officers number their exhibits in the same manner; as the document A, or B.

Alpha and Omega, the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, are used in Scripture for the beginning and end — representative of Christ.

In mathematics, letters are used as representatives of numbers, lines, angles, and quantities. In arguments letters are substituted for persons, in cases supposed, or stated for illustration; as, A contracts with B to deliver property to D. — In the English phraseology, "a landlord has a hundred a year," "the sum amounted to ten dollars a man," a is merely the adjective one, and this mode of expression is idiomatic; a hundred in a [one] year; ten dollars to a [one] man.

AAM, n. [Ch. אמה, or אמא, a cubit, a measure containing five or six palms.] A measure of liquids among the Dutch, varying in different cities from 37 to 41 English wine gallons.

AB-BA'TIAL, }

AB'BE, (ab'by,) n. [Fr. abbé, from abba.]

In a monastic sense, the same as an abbot; but more generally, a title in Roman Catholic countries, without any determinate rank, office, or rights. The abbes are numerous, and generally have some literary attainments; they dress as academics or scholars, and act as instructors, in colleges and private families; or as tutors to young gentlemen on their travels; and many of them become authors.

AB'BESS, n. [from abba.]

A female superior or governess of a nunnery, or convent of nuns, having the authority over the nuns which the abbots have over the monks. [See ABBEY.]

AB'BEY, n. pl. ABBEYS, [from abba.] †

A monastery or society of persons of either sex, secluded from the world and devoted to religion. The males are called monks, and governed by an abbot; the females are called nuns, and governed by an abbess. These institutions were suppressed in England by Henry VIII.; but they still exist in Roman Catholic countries.

AB'BEY-LUB-BER, n. A name given to monks in contempt for their idleness.

AB'BOT, n. [formerly ABBAT, from abba, latinized abbas, -atis, or from Heb. plural אבות, aboth.] The superior or governor of an abbey or monastery. Originally, monasteries were founded in retired places, and the religious had no concern with secular affairs, being entirely subject to the prelates. But the abbots, possessing most of the learning in ages of ignorance, were called from their seclusion to aid the churches in opposing heresies; monasteries were founded in the vicinity of cities; the abbots became ambitious, and set themselves to acquire wealth and honors; some of them assumed the miter, threw off their dependence on the bishops, and obtained seats in parliament. For centuries, princes and noblemen bore the title of abbots. At present, in Roman Catholic countries, abbots are regular, or such as take the vow, and wear the habit of the order; and commendatory, such as are seculars, but obliged, when of suitable age, to take orders. The title is borne also by some persons who have not the government of a monastery; as bishops whose sees were formerly abbeys. Encyc.

AB'BOT-SHIP, n. The state of an abbot.

AB-BRE'VI-ATE, v. t. [It. abbreviare; Sp. abreviar; Port. abbreviar; from L. abbrevio, brevio, from brevis, short; contracted from Gr. βραχυς, from the root of break, which see.]

AB-ER-RUNC'ĀTE, v. t. [L. averruncо.] To pull up by the roots; to extirpate utterly. [Not used.] Dict.

A-BET', v. t. [Sax. betan, gebetan; properly, to push forward, to advance; hence, to amend, to revive, to restore, to make better; and applied to fire, to increase the flame, to excite, to promote. Hence, to aid by encouraging or instigating. Hence, in Saxon, Na bete nan man the fyr; Let no man bet (better, excite) the fire, LL. Ina. 78.]

1. To encourage by aid or countenance, but now used chiefly in a bad sense. "To abet an opinion," in the sense of support, is used by Bishop Cumberland; but this use is hardly allowable.

2. In law, to encourage, counsel, incite, or assist in a criminal act.

A-BET', n. The act of aiding or encouraging in a crime. [Not used.]

A-BET'MENT, n. The act of abetting.

A-BET'TED, pp. Incited, aided, encouraged to a crime.

A-BET'TING, ppr Counseling, aiding or encouraging to a crime.

A-BET'TOR, n.† One who abets, or incites, aids or encourages another to commit a crime. In treason, there are no abettors; all persons concerned being principals.

AB-E-VAC-Ū-Ā'TION, n. [ab and evacuation.] In medicine, a partial evacuation of morbid humors of the body, either by nature or art. Cyc.

A-BEY'ANCE, (a-bay'ance,) n. [Norm. abbaiance, or abaiance, in expectation, boyance, expectation. Qu. Fr. bayer, to gape, to look a long time with the mouth open; to stand looking in a silly manner; It. badare, to amuse one's self, to stand trifling; "tenere a bada." to keep at bay; "star a bada," to stand trifling. If Bd are the radical letters, it seems to belong to the root of abide. See BAY.]

1. In expectation or contemplation of law. The fee simple or inheritance of lands and tenements is in abeyance, when there is no person in being in whom it can vest; so that it is in a state of expectancy or waiting until a proper person shall appear. Thus, if land is leased to A for life, remainder to the heirs of B, the remainder is in abeyance till the death of B. Blackstone.

2. Popularly, a state of suspension, or temporary extinction. Ecl. Rev

AB'GRE-GĀTE, v. t. [L. abgrego, ab and grex.] To separate from a herd. [Obs.]

AB-GRE-GĀ'TION, n. Separation from a herd or flock. [Obs.]

AB-HOR', v. t.† [L. abhorreo, of ab and horreo, to set up bristles, shiver or shake; to look terrible.]

1. To hate extremely, or with contempt; to loathe, detest, or abominate. Shak.

2. To despise or neglect. Psal. xxii 24. Amos vi. 8.

3. To cast off or reject. Psal. lxxxix. 38.

AB-HOR'RED, pp. or a. Hated extremely; detested.

AB-HOR'RENCE, } n. Extreme hatred; detesta-
AB-HOR'REN-CY, } tion; great aversion.

AB-HOR'RENT, a. Hating; detesting; struck with abhorrence.

2. Contrary; odious; inconsistent with; expressive of extreme opposition; as, slander is abhorrent to all ideas of justice. In this sense, it should be always followed by to—abhorrent from is not agreeable to the English idiom.

AB-HOR'RENT-LY, adv. With abhorrence.

AB-HOR'RER, n. One who abhors.

AB-HOR'RING, ppr. Having great aversion, detesting. As a noun, it is used in Isaiah lxvi for the object of hatred—"an abhorring to all flesh."

Ā'BIB, n. [Heb. אבב, ab, swelling, protuberant. Ch. אבב, abab, to produce the first or early fruit; אביב abib, a full grown ear of corn.]

The first month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year, called also Nisan. It begins at the spring equinox, and answers to the latter part of March and beginning of April. Its name is derived from the full growth of wheat in Egypt, which took place anciently, as it does now, at that season.

A-BĪDE', v. i. pret. and part. ABODE. [Ar. عبد abada, to be or exist, to continue; W. bod, to be; Sax. bidan, abidan; Sw. bida; D. beiden; Dan. bie for bide; Russ. vitayu, to dwell, rest, continue, stand firm, or be stationary for any time indefinitely. Class Bd. No. 7.]

1. To rest, or dwell. Gen. xxix. 19.

2. To tarry or stay for a short time. Gen. xxiv.

3. To continue permanently or in the same state; to be firm and immovable. Psal. cxix. 90.

4. To remain; to continue. Acts xxvii. 31.

A-BĪDE', v. t. To wait for; to be prepared for; to await.

Bonds and afflictions abide me. — Acts xx. 23.
[For is here understood.]

2. To endure or sustain.

To abide the indignation of the Lord. — Joel ii. 11.

3. To bear or endure; to bear patiently; as, I can not abide his impertinence.

This verb, when intransitive, is followed by in or at before the place, and with before the person; Abide with me — at Jerusalem, or in this land. Sometimes by on; The sword shall abide on his cities. And in the sense of wait, by for; Abide for me. Hosea iii. 3. Sometimes by by; Abide by the crib. Job xxxix.

In general, abide by signifies to adhere to, maintain, defend, or stand to; as, to abide by a promise, or by a friend; or to suffer the consequences; as, to abide by the event, that is, to be fixed or permanent in a particular condition.

A-BĪD'ER, n. One who dwells or continues.

2. Figuratively, suddenness; unceremonious haste or vehemence.

AB'SCESS, n. [L. abscessus, from ab and cedo, to go from.]

A cavity containing pus, or a collection of purulent matter, in some part of the body, formed by the process called suppuration, consequent on inflammation.

AB-SCIND', v. t. [L. abscindo.] To cut off. [Little used.]

AB'SCISS, } n.
AB-SCIS'SA, } [L. abscissus, from ab and scindo, to cut; Gr. σχιζω. See SCISSORS.]

In conics, a part of the diameter or transverse axis of a conic section, intercepted between the vertex or some other fixed point and a semiordinate. Encyc.

Generally, any part of the diameter or axis of a curve, comprised between any fixed point where all the abscisses begin, and another line, called the ordinate, which is terminated in the curve. Barlow.

AB-SCIS'SION, (-sizh'un,) n. [See ABSCISS.]

1. A cutting off, or a being cut off. In surgery, the separation of any corrupted or useless part of the body, by a sharp instrument; applied to the soft parts, as amputation is to the bones and flesh of a limb. Quincy.

2. In rhetoric, a figure of speech, when, having begun to say a thing, a speaker stops abruptly, as supposing the matter sufficiently understood. Thus, "He is a man of so much honor and candor, and such generosity — but I need say no more."

AB-SCOND', v. i. [L. abscondo, to hide, of abs and condo, to hide, i. e. to withdraw, or to thrust aside or into a corner or secret place.]

1. To retire from public view, or from the place in which one resides or is ordinarily to be found; to withdraw, or absent one's self in a private manner; to be concealed; appropriately used of persons who secrete themselves to avoid a legal process.

2. To hide, withdraw, or be concealed.

The marmot absconds in winter. Ray.

AB-SCOND'ER, n. One who withdraws from public notice, or conceals himself from public view.

AB-SCOND'ING, ppr. or a. Withdrawing privately from public view; as, an absconding debtor, who confines himself to his apartments, or absents himself to avoid the ministers of justice. In the latter sense, it is properly an adjective.

AB'SENCE, n. [L. absens, from absum, abesse, to be away; ab and sum.]

1. A state of being at a distance in place, or not in company. It is used to denote any distance indefinitely, either in the same town, or country, or in a foreign country, and primarily supposes a prior presence; as, speak well of one in his absence.

2. Want; destitution; implying no previous presence.

In the absence of conventional law. Ch. Kent.

3. In law, non-appearance; a not being in court to answer.

4. Heedlessness; inattention to things present. Absence of mind is the attention of the mind to a subject which does not occupy the rest of the company, and which draws the mind from things or objects which are present, to others distant or foreign.

AB'SENT, a. Not present; not in company; at such a distance as to prevent communication. It is used also for being in a foreign country; as, a gentleman is absent on his travels.

Absent from one another. — Gen. xxxi. 49.

2. Heedless; inattentive to persons present, or to subjects of conversation in company; as, an absent man is uncivil to the company.

3. In familiar language, not at home; as, the master of the house is absent. In other words, he does not wish to be disturbed by company.

AB-SENT', v. t. To depart to such a distance as to prevent intercourse; to retire or withdraw; to forbear to appear in presence; used with the reciprocal pronoun; as, let a man absent himself from the company.

AB-SENT'ED, pp. Retired or withdrawn.

AB-SENT-EE', n. One who withdraws from his country, office, or estate; one who removes to a distant place or to another country.

In recent political writers, a landholder or capitalist, who derives his revenue from one country, and resides in and expends it in another. P. Cyc.

AB-SIN'THI-ĀTED, a. Impregnated with wormwood.

AB-SIN'THI-UM, n. [Gr. αψινθιον; Per. افستين afsinthin; the same in Chaldaic. Budæus, in his commentaries on Theophrast, supposes the word composed of a priv. and ψινθος, delight, so named from its bitterness. But it may be an Oriental word.]

The common wormwood; a bitter plant, used as a tonic. A species of Artemisia.

AB'SIS. In astronomy. [See APSIS.]

AB'SO-LUTE, a. [L. absolutus. See ABSOLVE.]

1. Literally, in a general sense, free or independent of any thing extraneous. Hence,

2. Complete in itself; positive; as, an absolute declaration.

3. Unconditional; as, an absolute promise.

4. Existing independent of any other cause; as, God is absolute.

5. Unlimited by extraneous power or control; as, an absolute government or prince.

6. Not relative; as, absolute space. Stillingfleet.

7. In chemistry, pure, unmixed; as, absolute alcohol.

In grammar, the case absolute, is when a word or member of a sentence is not immediately dependent on the other parts of the sentence in government. A clause independent.

Absolute equation, in astronomy, is the sum of the optic and eccentric equations.

Absolute numbers, in algebra, are such as have no letters annexed; as, 2a+36=48. The two latter numbers are absolute or pure. Encyc.

Absolute space, in physics, is space considered without relation to any other object. Bailey.

Absolute gravity, in philosophy, is that property in bodies by which they are said to weigh so much, without regard to circumstances of modification, and this is always as the quantity of matter they contain. Bailey.

AB'SO-LUTE-LY, adv. Completely; wholly; as, a thing is absolutely unintelligible.

2. Without dependence or relation; in a state unconnected.

Absolutely we can not discommend, we can not absolutely approve, either willingness to live, or forwardness to die. Hooker.

3. Without restriction or limitation; as, God reigns absolutely.

4. Without condition; as, God does not forgive absolutely, but upon condition of faith and repentance.

5. Positively, peremptorily; as, command me absolutely not to go. Milton.

AB'SO-LUTE-NESS, n. Independence; completeness in itself.

2. Despotic authority, or that which is subject to no extraneous restriction, or control.

AB-SO-LŪ'TION, n. In the civil law, an acquittal, or sentence of a judge declaring an accused person innocent. In the canon law, a remission of sins pronounced by a priest in favor of a penitent. Among Presbyterians, a sentence by which an excommunicated person is released from his liability to punishment. Ayliffe. South.

AB'SO-LŪT-ISM, n. State of being absolute; or principles of absolute government.

2. Doctrine of predestination. Ash.

AB'SO-LŪT-IST, n. One who is in favor of an absolute government.

AB'SO-LU-TO-RY, or AB-SOL'Ū-TO-RY, a. Absolving; that absolves.

AB-SOLV'A-TO-RY, a. [from absolve.] Containing absolution, pardon, or release; having power to absolve. Cotgrave.

AB-SOLVE', (ab-zolv',) v. t. † [L. absolvo, from ab and solvo, to loose or release; Ch. שלה, shalah, to absolve, to finish; Heb. שׁל, shal, to loose or loosen. See SOLVE.]

To set free or release from some obligation, debt, or responsibility; or from that which subjects a person to a burden or penalty; as, to absolve a person from a promise; to absolve an offender, which amounts to an acquittal and remission of his punishment. Hence, in the civil law, the word was used for acquit; and in the canon law, for forgive, or remit. In ordinary language, its sense is to set free or release from an engagement. Formerly, good writers used the word in the sense of finish, accomplish; as, to absolve work, in Milton; but in this sense, it seems to be obsolete. Young has also used it for resolve or explain; as, "Absolve we this?" but this sense is rare.

AB-SOLV'ED, pp. Released; acquitted; remitted; declared innocent.

AB-SOLV'ER, n. One who absolves; also, one that pronounces sin to be remitted.

AB-SOLV'ING, ppr. Setting free from a debt, or charge; acquitting; remitting.

AB'SO-NANT, a. [See ABSONOUS.] Wide from the purpose; contrary to reason.

AB'SO-NOUS, a. [L. absonus; ab and sonus, sound.] Contrary to reason; unmusical, or untunable. Granville. Fotherby.

AB-SORB', v. t. † [L. absorbeo, ab and sorbeo, to drink in; Ar. شرب sharaba; Eth. ሰረበ or ጠረበ id.; Rab. שרף, sharap; to draw or drink in; whence sirup, sherbet, shrub.]

1. To drink in; to suck up; to imbibe; as a sponge, or as the lacteals of the body.

2. To drink in, swallow up, or overwhelm with water, as a body in a whirlpool.

3. To waste wholly or sink in expenses; to exhaust; as, to absorb an estate in luxury.

4. To engross or engage wholly; as, absorbed in study or the pursuit of wealth.

AB-SORB-A-BIL'I-TY, n. A state or quality of being absorbable.

AB-SORB'A-BLE, a. That may be imbibed or swallowed. Kerr's Lavoisier.

AB-SORB'ED, or AB-SORPT', pp. Imbibed; swallowed; wasted; engaged; lost in study; wholly engrossed.

AB-SORB'ENT, a. Imbibing; swallowing.

Absorbent ground, in painting, a ground prepared for a picture, chiefly with distemper, or water colors, by which the oil is immediately absorbed, and thus the work hastened. Brande.

AB-SORB'ENT, n. In anatomy, a vessel which imbibes, as the lacteals and lymphatics. In medicine, a substance used to absorb acidity in the stomach, as magnesia, chalk, &c. Encyc.

AB-SORB'ING, ppr. or a. Imbibing; engrossing; wasting.

AB-SORP'TION, n. The act or process of imbibing or swallowing; either by water, which overwhelms, or by substances, which drink in and retain liquids; as, the absorption of a body in a whirlpool, or of water by the earth, or of the humors of the body by dry powders. It is used also to express the swallowing up of substances by the earth in chasms made by earthquakes, and the sinking of large tracts in violent commotions of the earth.

2. Entire occupation or engrossment of mind; as, absorption in business.

3. In physiology, one of the vital organic functions, which conveys to the circulating system the materials of nutrition, by means of the lacteals, and the effete particles of the body, by means of the lymphatics.

4. In chemistry, the conversion of a gaseous fluid into a liquid or solid, by union with another substance. Ure.

AB-SORP'TIVE, a. Having power to imbibe. Darwin.

ABS'QUE HOC; without this or that; in law, words used in traversing what has been alleged, and is repeated.

AB-STAIN', v. i. [L. abstineo, to keep from; abs and teneo, to hold. See TENANT.]

In a general sense, to forbear, or refrain from, voluntarily; but used chiefly to denote a restraint upon the passions or appetites; to refrain from indulgence; as, to abstain from the use of ardent spirits; to abstain from luxuries.

Abstain from meats offered to idols. — Acts xv.

AB-STĒ'MI-OUS, a. [L. abstemius, from abs and temetum, an ancient name of strong wine, according to Fabius and Gellius. But Vossius supposes it to be from abstineo, by a change of n to m. It may be from the root of timeo, to fear, that is, to withdraw.]

1. Sparing in diet; refraining from a free use of food and strong drinks.

Instances of longevity are chiefly among the abstemious. Arbuthnot.

2. Sparing in the enjoyment of animal pleasures of any kind. [This sense is less common, and perhaps not legitimate.]

3. Sparingly used, or used with temperance; belonging to abstinence; as, an abstemious diet, an abstemious life.

AB-STĒ'MI-OUS-LY, adv. Temperately; with a sparing use of meat or drink.

AB-STĒ'MI-OUS-NESS, n. The quality of being temperate or sparing in the use of food and strong drinks.

This word expresses a greater degree of abstinence than temperance.

AB-STEN'TION, n. The act of abstaining.

AB-STERGE', (ab-sterj',) v. t. [L. abstergeo, of abs and tergeo, to wipe. Tergeo may have a common origin with the Sw. torcka, G. trocknen, D. droogen, Sax. drygan, to dry; for these Teutonic verbs signify to wipe, as well as to dry.]

To wipe or make clean by wiping; to cleanse by lotions or similar applications. [Used chiefly as a medical term.]

AB-STERG'ENT, a. Wiping; cleansing.

AB-STERG'ENT, n. A medicine which cleanses away foulness, as lotions; but the use of the word is nearly superseded by detergent, which see.

AB-STER'SION, n. [from L. abstergeo, abstersus.] The act of wiping clean; or a cleansing by lotions or similar applications. [See DETERGE, DETERSION.] Bacon.

AB-STER'SIVE, a. Cleansing; having the quality of removing foulness. [See DETERSIVE.]

AB'STI-NENCE, n. [L. abstinentia. See ABSTAIN.]

1. In general, the act or practice of voluntarily refraining from, or forbearing any action.

Abstinence from every thing which can be deemed labor. Paley's Philos.

More appropriately,

2. The refraining from an indulgence of appetite, or from customary gratifications of animal propensities. It denotes a total forbearance, as in fasting, or a forbearance of the usual quantity. In the latter sense, it may coincide with temperance; but in general, it denotes a more sparing use of enjoyments than temperance. (Besides, abstinence implies previous free indulgence; temperance does not.)

AB'STI-NENT, a. Refraining from indulgence, especially in the use of food and drink.

AB'STI-NENT-LY, adv. With abstinence.

AB'STI-NENTS, n. pl. A sect which appeared in France and Spain in the third century, who opposed marriage, condemned the use of flesh meat, and placed the Holy Spirit in the class of created beings.

AB-STORT'ED, a. Forced away.

AB-STRACT', v. t.† [L. abstraho, to draw from or separate; from abs and traho, which is the Eng. draw. See DRAW.]

1. To draw from, or to separate; as, to abstract an action from its evil effects; to abstract spirit from any substance by distillation; but, in this latter sense, extract is now more generally used.

2. To separate ideas by the operation of the mind; to consider one part of a complex object by itself. Horne.

3. To select or separate the substance of a book or writing; to epitomize or reduce to a summary. Watts.

4. To take secretly for one's own use from the property of another, when placed in one's power; to purloin; as, to abstract goods from a parcel, or money from a bank. Howit.

5. In chemistry, to separate, as the more volatile parts of a substance by repeated distillation, or at least by distillation.

AB'STRACT, a. [L. abstractus.] Separate; distinct from something else. An abstract idea, in metaphysics, is an idea separated from a complex object, or from other ideas which naturally accompany it; as the solidity of marble contemplated apart from its color or figure Encyc.

Abstract terms are those which express abstract ideas, as beauty, whiteness, roundness, without regarding any subject in which they exist; or abstract terms are the names of orders, genera, or species of things in which there is a combination of similar qualities. Stewart.

Abstract numbers are numbers used without application to things, as 6, 8, 10; but when applied to any thing, as 6 feet, 10 men, they become concrete.

Abstract or pure mathematics, is that which treats of magnitude or quantity, without restriction to any species of particular magnitude, as arithmetic and geometry; opposed to which is mixed mathematics, which treats of simple properties, and the relations of quantity, as applied to sensible objects, as hydrostatics, navigation, optics, &c. Encyc.

2. Separate; existing in the mind only; as, an abstract subject; an abstract question; and hence, difficult, abstruse.

AB'STRACT, n.† A summary, or epitome, containing the substance, a general view, or the principal heads of a treatise or writing. Watts.

2. Formerly, an extract, or a smaller quantity, containing the essence of a larger.

In the abstract, in a state of separation, as a subject considered in the abstract, i. e. without reference to particular persons or things.

AB-STRACT'ED, pp. or a.† Separated; purloined; refined; exalted; abstruse; absent in mind. Milton. Donne.

AB-STRACT'ED-LY, adv. In a separate state, or in contemplation only. Dryden.

AB-STRACT'ED-NESS, n. The state of being abstracted. Baxter.

AB-STRACT'ER, n. One who makes an abstract, or summary.

AB-STRACT'ING, ppr. Separating; purloining; making a summary.

AB-STRAC'TION, n. The act of separating, or state of being separated.

2. The operation of the mind when occupied by abstract ideas; as when we contemplate some particular part or property of a complex object as separate from the rest. Thus, when the mind considers the branch of a tree by itself, or the color of the leaves, as separate from their size or figure, the act is called abstraction. So, also, when it considers whiteness, softness, virtue, existence, as separate from any particular objects. Encyc.

The power which the understanding has of separating the combinations which are presented to it, is distinguished by logicians by the name of abstraction. Stewart.

Abstraction is the ground-work of classification, by which things are arranged in orders, genera, and species. We separate in idea the qualities of certain objects which are of the same kind, from others which are different in each, and arrange the objects having the same properties in a class, or collected body.

3. A separation from worldly objects; a recluse life; as, a hermit's abstraction.

4. Absence of mind; inattention to present objects.

5. Taking for one's own use part of the property of another when placed in one's power. [Recent usage.]

6. In the process of distillation, the term is used to denote the separation of the volatile parts, which rise, come over, and are condensed in a receiver, from those which are fixed. It is chiefly used, when a fluid is repeatedly poured upon any substance in a retort, and distilled off, to change its state, or the nature of its composition. Nicholson.

AB-STRAC'TIVE, a. Having the power or quality of abstracting.

AB-STRAC'TIVE, } a. Abstracted, or drawn
AB-STRACT-I''TIOUS, } from other substances, particularly from vegetables, without fermentation. Cyc.

AB'STRACT-LY, adv. Separately; absolutely; in a state or manner unconnected with any thing else; as, matter abstractly considered.

AB'STRACT-NESS, n. A separate state; a state of being in contemplation only, or not connected with any object.

AB-STRINGE', v. t. To unbind.

AB-STRŪDE', v. t. [Infra.] To thrust away. [Not used.]

AB-STRŪSE', a. [L. abstrusus, from abstrudo, to thrust away, to conceal; abs and trudo; Ar. طرد tarada; Ch. טרך, to thrust; Syr. Sam. id.; Eng. to thrust.] Hid; concealed; hence, remote from apprehension; difficult to be comprehended or understood; opposed to what is obvious. [Not used of material objects.]

Metaphysics is an abstruse science. Encyc.

AB-STRŪSE'LY, adv. In a concealed manner; obscurely; in a manner not to be easily understood.

AB-STRŪSE'NESS, n. Obscurity of meaning; the state or quality of being difficult to be understood. Boyle.

AB-STRŪ'SI-TY, n. Abstruseness; that which is abstruse.

AB-SŪME', v. t. To bring to an end by a gradual waste; to consume.

AB-SURD', a.† [L. absurdus, from ab and surdus, deaf, insensible.] Opposed to manifest truth; inconsistent with reason, or the plain dictates of common sense. An absurd man acts contrary to the clear dictates of reason or sound judgment. An absurd proposition contradicts obvious truth. An absurd practice or opinion is repugnant to the reason or common apprehension of men. It is absurd to say six and six make ten, or that plants will take root in stone.

AB-SURD'I-TY, n. The quality of being inconsistent with obvious truth, reason, or sound judgment. Want of judgment, applied to men; want of propriety, applied to things. Johnson.

2. That which is absurd: in this sense it has a plural; the absurdities of men.

AB-SURD'LY, adv. In a manner inconsistent with reason, or obvious propriety.

AB-SURD'NESS, n. The same as ABSURDITY, and less used.

A-BUND'ANCE, n.† [Fr. abondance. See ABOUND.] Great plenty; an overflowing quantity; ample sufficiency: in strictness applicable to quantity only; but sometimes used of number; as, an abundance of peasants. Addison.

In Scripture,

The abundance of the rich is great wealth. — Eccl. v. Mark xii. Luke xxi.

The abundance of the seas is great plenty of fish. — Deut. xxxiii.

It denotes also fullness, overflowing; as, the abundance of the heart. Matt. xii. Luke vi.

A-BUND'ANT, a.† Plentiful; in great quantity; fully sufficient; as, an abundant supply. In Scripture, abounding; having in great quantity; overflowing with.

The Lord God is abundant in goodness and truth. — Ex. xxxiv.

Abundant number, in arithmetic, is one, the sum of whose aliquot parts exceeds the number itself. Thus 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, the aliquot parts of 12, make the sum of 16. This is opposed to a deficient number, as 14, whose aliquot parts are 1, 2, 7, the sum of which is 10; and to a perfect number, which is equal to the sum of its aliquot parts, as 6, whose aliquot parts are 1, 2, 3. Encyc.

A-BUND'ANT-LY, adv. Fully; amply; plentifully; in a sufficient degree.

A-BŪ'SAGE, n. Abuse. [Not used.]

AC′CENT, n. [L. accentus, from ad and cano, cantum, to sing; W. canu; Corn. kana; Ir. canaim. See Accend.]

1. The modulation of the voice in reading or speaking, as practiced by the ancient Greeks, which rendered their rehearsal musical. More strictly, in English,

2. A particular stress or force of voice upon certain syllables of words, which distinguishes them from the others. Accent is of two kinds, primary and secondary; as in as′pi-ra′tion. In uttering this word, we observe the first and third syllables are distinguished; the third by a full sound, which constitutes the primary accent; the first, by a degree of force in the voice which is less than that of the primary accent, but evidently greater than that which falls on the second and fourth syllables.

When the full accent falls on a vowel, that vowel has its long sound, as in vo′cal; but when it falls on an articulation or consonant, the preceding vowel is short, as in hab′it. Accent alone regulates English verse.

3. A mark or character used in writing to direct the stress of the voice in pronunciation. Our ancestors borrowed from the Greek language three of these characters, the acute (´), the grave (`), and the circumflex (~, or ^). In the Greek, the first shows when the voice is to be raised; the second, when it is to be depressed; and the third, when the vowel is to be uttered with an undulating sound.

4. A modulation of the voice expressive of passion or sentiments.

The tender accent of a woman's cry. Prior.

5. Manner of speaking.

A man of plain accent. (Obs.) Shak.

6. Poetically, words, language, or expressions in general.

Winds! on your wings to heaven her accents bear,
Such words as heaven alone is fit to hear. Dryden.

7. In music, either the stress laid on the accented parts of the bar, called grammatical accent; or the emphasis dictated by feeling, and giving the music its peculiar expression, called oratorical accent. P. Cyc.

8. A peculiar tone or inflection of voice.

9. In mathematics, accents are used to distinguish magnitudes of the same or similar kind, expressed by the same letter, but differing in value; as, a', a''.

10. An accent at the right hand of a number expresses a minute of a degree, two accents a second, &c. P. Cyc.

AC-CENT', v. t. To express accent; to utter a syllable with a particular stress or modulation of the voice In poetry, to utter or pronounce in general. Als~, to note accents by marks in writing. Locke. Wotton.

AC-CENT'ED, pp. or a. Uttered with accent; marked with accent.

Here the whole preceding parts of the sentence are to accord, i. e. agree with, correspond with, or be suitable to, what follows. According, here, has its true participial sense, agreeing, and is followed by to. It is never a preposition.

AC-CORD'ING-LY, adv.† Agreeably; suitably; in a manner conformable to.

Those who live in faith and good works, will be rewarded accordingly.

AC-CORD'I-ON, n. [from accord.] A small keyed wind instrument, whose tones are generated by the play of wind upon metallic reeds. It is a small wind-chest, the sides of which are made to fold and expand like a bellows. On the top are apertures in which the reeds are inserted, and upon which the reeds play. Each key playing on two apertures, the reeds of which are furnished with reversed valves, is made to command two successive notes in the scale, according as the wind is drawn in by expanding the chest, or forced out by closing it. In addition to the keys, there is a slide which opens upon reeds attuned to the harmonics of the tonic or dominant, by opening which the air has an harmonic accompaniment. The bottom of the chest is furnished with a large key, by which the chest may be opened, and suddenly exhausted or filled, as need requires. This is a melodious portable instrument, commanding two or three octaves in the diatonic scale. Prof. Fitch.

Sour, sharp or biting to the taste; having the taste of vinegar; as, acid fruits or liquors.

AC'ID, n. In common language, a sour substance. In chemistry, a compound capable of uniting with salifiable bases, and thereby forming salts. An acid may be composed either of a simple or compound acidifiable base united with one or more acidifying principles. Those acids which were first recognized were sour to the taste (hence the name) and capable of reddening blue vegetable colors. Many acids are now known which have neither of these properties. An acid is always the electro-negative ingredient of a salt.

AC-ID-IF'ER-OUS, a. [acid and L. fero.] Containing acids, or an acid.

Acidiferous minerals are such as consist of an earth combined with an acid, as carbonate of lime, aluminite, &c. Phillips.

A-CID'I-FI-A-BLE, a. [from acidify.]

Capable of being converted into an acid, by union with an acidifying principle.

A-CID-I-FI-CA'TION, n. The act or process of acidifying or changing into an acid.

A-CID'I-FI-ED, pp. Made acid; converted into an acid.

A-CID'I-FI-ER, n. A simple or compound principle, whose presence is necessary for acidity. The elementary acidifying principles are oxygen, chlorine, bromine, iodine, fluorine, sulphur, selenium, and tellurium. Cyanogen may be named as an example of a compound acidifying principle, and probably there are one or two more. No acid is known which does not contain one of these substances.

A-CID'I-FŸ, v. t. [acid and L. facio.]

To make acid; but appropriately, to convert into an acid, chemically so called, by combination with any substance.

A-CID'I-FŸ-ING, ppr. or a. Making acid; converting into an acid; having power to change into an acid. Oxygen is called an acidifying principle or element.

AC-ID-IM'E-TER, n. [acid and Gr. μετρον, measure.]

An instrument for ascertaining the strength of acids. Ure.

A-CID'I-TY, n. [Fr. acidité, from acid.]

The quality of being sour; sourness; tartness; sharpness to the taste.

AC'ID-NESS, n. The quality of being sour; acidity.

A-CID'U-LÆ, n. pl. Medicinal springs impregnated with carbonic acid. Parr

A-CID'U-LATE, v. t. [L. acidulus, slightly sour; Fr. aciduler, to make slightly sour. See ACID.]

To tinge with an acid; to make acid in a moderate degree. Arbuthnot.

A-CID'U-LA-TED, pp. or a. Tinged with an acid; made slightly sour.

A-CID'U-LA-TING, ppr. Tinged with an acid

AC'ID-ULE, } n. In chemistry, a salt, in which A-CID'U-LUM, } the acid is in excess; as, tartaric acidulum, oxalic acidulum.

A-CID'U-LOUS, a. [L. acidulus. See ACID.]

Slightly sour; sub-acid; as, acidulous sulphate

Acidulous mineral waters, are such as contain carbonic acid. Brande.

AC'I-FORM, a. [L. acus, a needle, and forma, form.]

Shaped like a needle

AC-I-NA'CEOUS, a. [L.] Full of kernels.

AC-I-NAC'I-FORM, *a. [L. ăcinăces, a cimeter, Gr. ακινακης, and L. forma, form.]

*In botany, formed like, or resembling a cimeter. Martyn.

A-CIN'I-FORM, a. [L. acinus, a grape stone, and forma, shape.]

Having clusters like the stones of grapes; full of small kernels. The uvea or posterior lamina of the iris in the eye, is called the aciniform tunic, from its color resembling that of an unripe grape. Parr

AC'IN-ŌSE, } a. [From L. acinus. See ACINIFORM.]
AC'IN-OUS, }

Consisting of minute granular concretions; used in mineralogy. Kirwan.

AC'IN-US, n. [L.]

1. In botany, one of the small grains which compose the fruit of the blackberry, and other similar plants.

2. In anatomy, this term is applied to the ultimate secerning follicles of glands, or the granulations composing the structure of some conglomerate glands, as the liver.

Acoustic duct, in anatomy, the meatus auditorius, or external passage of the ear.

Acoustic vessels, in ancient theaters, were brazen tubes or vessels, shaped like a bell, used to propel the voice of the actors, so as to render them audible to a great distance; in some theaters at the distance of 400 feet. Encyc.

Acoustic instrument, or auricular tube; called in popular language an ear-trumpet. Parr.

Acoustics, or Acousmatics, was a name given to such of the disciples of Pythagoras as had not completed their five years' probation.

A-COUS'TICS, n. The science of sounds, teaching their cause, nature, and phenomena. This science is, by some writers, divided into diacoustics, which explains the properties of sounds coming directly from the sonorous body to the ear; and catacoustics, which treats of reflected sounds. But the distinction is considered of little real utility.

2. In medicine, this term is sometimes used for remedies for deafness, or imperfect hearing. Quincy.

AC-QUAINT', v. t. [Old Fr. accointer, to make known, whence accointance, acquaintance. Qu. Per. كندا kunda, knowing, intelligent; Ger. kunde, knowledge; kund, known, public; D. kond or kunde, knowledge; Sw. känd, known; Dan. kiende, to know, to be acquainted with. These words seem to have for their primitive root the Goth. and Sax. kunnan, to know, the root of cunning; Ger. kennen; D. kunnen, kan; Eng. can and ken; which see.]

1. To make known; to make fully or intimately known; to make familiar.

A man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. — Isa. liii.

2. To inform; to communicate notice to; as, a friend in the country acquaints me with his success. Of before the object — as to acquaint a man of this design — has been used, but is obsolete or improper.

3. To acquaint one's self, is to gain an intimate or particular knowledge of.

Acquaint now thyself with him, and be at peace. — Job xxii.

AC-QUAINT'ANCE, n.† Familiar knowledge; a state of being acquainted, or of having intimate or more than slight or superficial knowledge; as, I know the man, but have no acquaintance with him. Sometimes it denotes a more slight knowledge.

2. A person or persons well known; usually persons we have been accustomed to see and converse with, but not standing on the more intimate relation of friendship.

Lover and friend hast thou put far from me, and my acquaintance into darkness. — Ps. lxxxviii.

My acquaintance are estranged from me. — Job xix.

Acquaintances, in the plural, is used, as applied to individual persons known; but more generally, acquaintance is used for one or more.

Acquaintant, in like sense, is not used.

AC-QUAINT'ANCE-SHIP, n. State of being acquainted. Chalmers.

AC-QUAINT'ED, pp. Known; familiarly known; informed; having personal knowledge.

AC-QUIR'A-BLE, a. That may be acquired.

AC-QUIRE', v. t. † [L. acquiro, ad and quæro, to seek, that is, to follow, to press, to urge; acquiro signifies to pursue to the end or object; Fr. acquerir; Sp. adquirir; Ar. قرا kara; Heb. חקר to seek, to make toward, to follow. The L. quæsivi, unless contracted, is probably from a different root. See Class Gr. and Gs.]

To gain, by any means, something which is in a degree permanent, or which becomes vested or inherent in the possessor; as, to acquire a title, estate, learning, habits, skill, dominion, &c. Plants acquire a green color from the solar rays. A mere temporary possession is not expressed by acquire, but by gain, obtain, procure; as, to obtain [not acquire] a book on loan.

Descent is the title whereby a man, on the death of his ancestor, acquires his estate, by right of representation, as his heir at law. Blackstone.

AC-QUIR'ED, pp. or a. Gained, obtained, or received from art, labor, or other means, in distinction from those things which are bestowed by nature. Thus we say, abilities, natural and acquired. It implies title, or some permanence of possession.

AC-QUIRE'MENT, n. The act of acquiring, or that which is acquired; attainment. It is used in opposition to natural gifts; as, eloquence, and skill in music and painting, are acquirements; genius, the gift of nature. It denotes especially personal attainments, in opposition to material or external things gained, which are more usually called acquisitions; but this distinction is not always observed.

AC-QUIR'ER, n. A person who acquires.

AC-QUIR'ING, n. Acquirement.

AC-QUIR'ING, ppr. Gaining, by labor or other means, something that has a degree of permanence in the possessor.

AC-QUI'RY, n. Acquirement. [Not used.] Barrow.

AC-QUI-SI'TION, n. [L. acquisitio, from acquisitus, acquæsivi, which are given as the part. and pret. of acquiro; but quæsivi is probably from a different root; W. ceisiaw; Eth. ሐሠሠ chasas, chas; Ar. قس kassa, to seek. Class Gs.]

1. The act of acquiring; as, a man takes pleasure in the acquisition of property, as well as in the possession.

2. The thing acquired, or gained; as, learning is an acquisition. It is used for intellectual attainments, as well as for external things, property or dominion; and in a good sense, denoting something estimable.

AC-QUIS'I-TIVE, a. That is acquired; acquired; [but improper.] Wotton.

AC-QUIS'I-TIVE-LY, adv. Noting acquirement. A word is said to be used acquisitively, when it is used with to or for following. Lilly's Grammar.

AC-QUIS'I-TIVE-NESS, n. Desire of possession; propensity to acquire.

AC-QUIST', n. See ACQUEST. [Not used.] Milton.

AC-QUIT', v. t.† [Fr. acquitter; W. gadu, gadaw; L. cedo; Arm. kitat, or quytaat, to leave, or forsake; Fr. quitter, to forsake; Sp. quitar; Port. quitar; It. quitare, to remit, forgive, remove; D. kwyten; Ger. quittiren.]

To set free; to release or discharge from an obligation, accusation, guilt, censure, suspicion, or whatever lies upon a person as a charge or duty; as, the jury acquitted the prisoner; we acquit a man of evil intentions. It is followed by of before the object; to acquit from is obsolete. In a reciprocal sense as, the soldier acquitted himself well in battle, the word has a like sense, implying the discharge of a duty or obligation. Hence its use in expressing excellence in performance; as, the orator acquitted himself well, that is, in a manner that his situation, and public expectation, demanded.

AC-QUIT'MENT, n. The act of acquitting, or state of being acquitted. South.

[This word is superseded by ACQUITTAL.]

AC-QUIT'TAL, n. A judicial setting free, or deliverance from the charge of an offense, as by verdict of a jury, or sentence of a court; as, the acquittal of a principal operates as an acquittal of the accessories.

8. In law, literally, an urging for right; a suit or process, by which a demand is made of a right; a claim made before a tribunal. Actions are real, personal, or mixed; real, or feudal, when the demandant claims a title to real estate; personal, when a man demands a debt, personal duty, or damages in lieu of it, or satisfaction for an injury to person or property; and mixed, when real estate is demanded, with damages for a wrong sustained. Actions are also civil or penal; civil, when instituted solely in behalf of private persons, to recover debts or damages; penal, when instituted to recover a penalty, imposed by way of punishment. The word is also used for a right of action; as, the law gives an action for every claim. Blackstone.

A chose in action, is a right to a thing, in opposition to the possession. A bond or note is a chose in action, [Fr. chose, a thing,] and gives the owner a right to prosecute his claim to the money, as he has an absolute property in a right, as well as in a thing, in possession.

9. In some countries of Europe, especially France, action is a share in the capital stock of a joint-stock company, or in the public funds, equivalent to our term share; and consequently, in a more general sense, in the plural, to stocks. The word is also used for movable effects.

10. In painting and sculpture, the attitude or position of the several parts of the body, by which they seem to be actuated by passions; as, the arm extended, to represent the act of giving or receiving.

11. Battle; fight; engagement between troops in war, whether on land or water, or by a greater or smaller number of combatants. This and the 8th definition exhibit the literal meaning of action, viz a driving or urging.

Quantity of action; in physics, the product of the mass of a body by the space it runs through and its velocity. Encyc.

In many cases action and act are synonymous; but some distinction between them is observable. Action seems to have more relation to the power that acts, and its operation and process of acting; and act, more relation to the effect or operation complete. Action is also more generally used for ordinary transactions; and act, for such as are remarkable, or dignified; as, all our actions should be regulated by prudence; a prince is distinguished by acts of heroism or humanity. Encyc.

Action-taking, in Shakspeare, is used for litigious.

AC′TION-A-BLE, a. That will bear a suit, or for which an action at law may be sustained; as, to call a man a thief is actionable.

AC′TION-A-BLY, adv. In a manner that subjects to legal process.

AC′TION-A-RY, or AC′TION-IST, n. In Europe, a proprietor of stock in a joint-stock company; one who owns actions or shares of stock.

AC′T-IV-ATE, v. t. To make active. Bacon.

AC′T-IVE, a.† [L. activus; Fr. actif.]

1. That has the power or quality of acting; that contains the principle of action, indepondent of any visible external force; as, attraction is an active power; or it may be defined, that communicates action or motion, opposed to passive, that receives action; as, the active powers of the mind.

2. Having the power of quick motion, or the disposition to move with speed; nimble; lively; brisk; agile; as, an active animal. Hence,

3. Busy; constantly engaged in action; pursuing business with vigor and assiduity; opposed to dull, slow, or indolent; as, an active officer. It is also opposed to sedentary; as, an active life.

4. Requiring action or exertion; practical; operative; producing real effects; opposed to speculative; as, the active duties of life.

5. In grammar, active verbs are those which not only signify action, but have a noun or name following them, denoting the object of the action or impression; called also transitive, as they imply the passing of the action expressed by the verb to the object; as, a professor instructs his pupils.

6. Active capital, or wealth, is money, or property that may readily be converted into money, and used in commerce or other employment for profit. Hamilton.

7. Active commerce; the commerce in which a nation carries its own productions and foreign commodities in its own ships, or which is prosecuted by its own citizens; as contradistinguished from passive commerce, in which the productions of one country are transported by the people of another country.

The commerce of Great Britain and of the United States is active; that of China is passive.

It may be the interest of foreign nations to deprive us, as far as possible, of an active commerce in our own bottoms. Federalist, Hamilton.

AC′TIVE-LY, adv. In an active manner; by action; nimbly; briskly. In grammar, in an active signification; as, a word is used actively.

AC'T'IVE-NESS, n. The quality of being active; the faculty of acting; nimbleness; quickness of motion. Less used than ACTIVITY.

AC'T-IV'I-TY, n. The quality of being active; the active faculty; nimbleness; agility; also, the habit of diligent and vigorous pursuit of business; as, a man of activity. It is applied to persons or things.

Sphere of activity, is the whole space in which the virtue, power, or influence of any object, is exerted.

To put in activity; a French phrase, for putting in action or employment.

AC'T'LESS, a. Without action or spirit.

AC'T'OR, n. He that acts or performs; an active agent.

2. He that represents a character, or acts a part in a play; a stage player.

3. Among civilians, an advocate or proctor in civil courts or causes.

AC'T'RESS, n. A female who acts or performs, and especially on the stage, or in a play.

AC'T'U-AL, a.† [Fr. actuel. See ACT.]

1. Real or effectual, or that exists truly and absolutely; as, actual heat, opposed to that which is virtual or potential; actual cautery, or the burning by a red-hot iron, opposed to potential cautery, or a caustic application, that may produce the same effect upon the body by a different process.

2. Existing in act; real; in opposition to speculative, or existing in theory only; as, an actual crime.

3. Existing at the present time; as, the actual situation of the country. Burke.

4. In theology, actual sin is that which is committed by a person himself, opposed to original sin, or the corruption of nature supposed to be communicated from Adam.

5. That includes action.

> Besides her walking and other actual performances. [Hardly legitimate.] Shak.

AC'T-U-AL'I-TY, n. Reality. Haweis.

AC'T'U-AL-IZ-ING, ppr. Making actual. Coleridge.

AC'T'U-AL-NESS, n. The quality of being actual.

AC'T'U-A-RY, n. [L. actuarius.]

A registrar or clerk; a term of the civil law, and used originally in courts of civil law jurisdiction; but in Europe used for a clerk or registrar generally.

In England, this term is now used for the manager of a joint-stock company, particularly of an insurance company. P. Cyc.

In America, it is chiefly applied to the manager of a life insurance company.

AC'T'U-ATE, a. Put in action. [Little used.]

AC'T'U-ATE, v. t. [from act.]

To put into action; to move or incite to action; as, men are actuated by motives, or passions. It seems to have been used formerly in the sense of invigorate, noting increase of action; but the use is not legitimate.

AC'T'U-A-TED, pp. Put in action; incited to action.

AC'T'U-A-TING, ppr. Putting in action; inciting to action.

AC'T-U-A'TION, n. The state of being put in action; effectual operation. Glanville.

AC'U-ATE, v. t. [L. acuo, to sharpen. See ACID.]

To sharpen; to make pungent, or corrosive. [Little used.] Harvey.

AC-U-I'TION, n. [from L. acuo, to sharpen.] The sharpening of medicines to increase their effect.

A-CU'LE-ATE, a. [L. aculeus, from acus, Gr. ακη, a point, and the diminutive ul. See ACID.]

In botany, having prickles, or sharp points; pointed; used chiefly to denote prickles fixed in the bark, in distinction from thorns, which grow from the wood. Milne.

2. In zoology, having a sting, or prickles.

A-CU'LE-I, n. pl. [L.] In botany and zoology, prickles.

AC'U-LON, or AC'U-LOS, n. [Gr. ακυλος, probably from ac, an oak.]

The fruit or acorn of the ilex, or scarlet oak.

A-CU'MEN, n. [L. acumen, from acus or acuo.]

A sharp point; and figuratively, quickness of perception, penetration of mind, the faculty of nice discrimination.

A-CU'MIN-ATE, *a. [L. acuminatus, from acumen.]

Having a long projecting and highly tapering point. De Candolle.

A-CU'MIN-A-TED, a. Sharpened to a point.

A-CU-MIN-A'TION, n. A sharpening; termination in a sharp point.

AC-U-PUNC-TUR-A'TION, n. * See ACUPUNCTURE.

A surgical operation, performed by pricking the part affected with a needle, as in headaches and lethargies. Encyc.

A-CUTE', *a. †[L. acutus, sharp-pointed; Qu. from acuo, acus, or from the Oriental חד had or chad, sharp, Heb. Ch. Ar.]

*1. Sharp at the end; ending in a sharp point; opposed to blunt or obtuse. An acute angle, in geometry, is one which is less than a right angle, or which subtends less than ninety degrees. An acute-angled triangle, is one whose three angles are all acute, or less than ninety degrees each. An acute-angled cone, is one, the angle at the vertex of which is acute.

2. Figuratively, applied to mental powers; penetrating; having nice discernment; perceiving or using minute distinctions; opposed to dull or stupid; as, an acute reasoner.

3. Applied to the senses; having nice or quick sensibility; susceptible of slight impressions; having power to feel or perceive small objects; as, a man of acute eyesight, hearing, or feeling.

4. An acute disease, is one which is attended with symptoms of some degree of severity, and comes speedily to a crisis, as a pleurisy; opposed to chronic.

5 An acute accent, is that which elevates or sharpens the voice.

6. In music, acute is applied to a tone which is sharp, or high; opposed to grave.

*7. In botany, ending in an acute angle, as a leaf or perianth. Martyn.

A-CUTE'LY, adv. Sharply; keenly; with nice discrimination.

A-CUTE'NESS, n. Sharpness; but seldom used in this literal sense, as applied to material things.

2. Figuratively, the faculty of nice discernment or perception; applied to the senses, or the understanding. By an acuteness of feeling, we perceive small objects or slight impressions; by an acuteness of intellect, we discern nice distinctions.

3. Sharpness, or elevation of sound, in rhetoric or music. Boyle.

4. Violence of a disease, which brings it speedily to a crisis.

A-CU-TI-A'TOR, n. In the middle ages, a person whose office was to sharpen instruments. Before the invention of fire-arms, such officers attended armies to sharpen their instruments. Encyc.

AD, a Latin preposition, signifying to. It is probably from Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam. Eth. אתה, Ar. أتى to come near, to approach; from which root we may also deduce at. In composition, the last letter is usually changed into the first letter of the word to which it is prefixed. Thus for adclamo, the Romans wrote acclamo; for adgredior, aggredior; for adfirmo, affirmo; for adlego, allego; for adpono, appono; for adripio, arripio; for adscribo, ascribo; for adtineo, attineo. The reason of this change is found in the ease of pronunciation, and agreeableness of the sounds.

Ad hominem; to the man; in logic, an argument adapted to touch the prejudices of the person addressed.

Ad inquirendum; in law, a judicial writ commanding inquiry to be made.

Ad libitum; at pleasure; in music, applied to a part or accompaniment which may be performed or not, without interfering with the composition.

Ad valorem; according to the value; in commerce and finance, terms used to denote duties or charges laid upon goods, at a certain rate per cent. upon their value, as stated in their invoices; in opposition to a specific sum upon a given quantity or number.

A-DAC'TYL, n. [Gr. α priv. and δακτυλος, a digit.]

In zoology, a locomotive extremity without digits. Brande.

AD'AGE, n. † [L. adagium, or adagio; It. adagio.]

A proverb; an old saying, which has obtained credit by long use; a wise observation handed down from antiquity.

AD-A'GI-O, n. [It. adagio, a compound of ad and agio, leisure; Sp. and Port. ocio; L. otium; Fr. aise; Eng. ease.]

In music, a slow movement. A piece of music, to be performed in adagio; as, an adagio of Haydn. As an adverb, slowly, leisurely, and with grace. When repeated, adagio, adagio, it directs the movement to be very slow.

AD'AM, n. In Heb. Ch. Syr. Eth. Ar. Man; primarily, the name of the human species, mankind; appropriately, the first Man, the progenitor of the human race. The word signifies form, shape, or suitable form; hence, species. As a verb, the word signifies, in Ethiopic, to please or be agreeable; in Arabic, to join, unite, or be accordant, to agree. It is evidently connected with דמה damah, Heb. Ch. Syr., to be like or equal, to form an image, to assimilate; whence the sense of likeness, image, form, shape; Gr. δεμας, a body, like. [See MAN.]

Adam's apple; a species of citron, [see CITRON;] also, the prominent part of the throat.

Adam's needle; the popular name of the yucca, a plant of four species, cultivated in gardens. Of the roots, the Indians made a kind of bread. [See YUCCA.]

AD'A-MANT, n. [Gr. αδαμας; L. adamas; a word of Celtic origin; W chedvaen, a lodestone, from ched, to fly or move, and vaen, or maen, a stone. Chaucer uses adamant for the lodestone. Romaunt of the Rose, lin. 1182. Ger. diamant is adamant and diamond; Sp. diamante; Sw. damant; Fr. aimant, lodestone. See DIAMOND.]

A stone imagined by some to be of impenetrable hardness; a name given to the diamond and other substances of extreme hardness. The name has often been given to the lodestone; as, you draw me, you hard-hearted adamant. Shak. But in modern mineralogy it has no technical signification.

AD-A-MANT-E'AN, a. Hard as adamant. Milton.

AD-A-MANT'INE, a. Made of adamant; having the qualities of adamant; that can not be broken, dissolved, or penetrated; as, adamantine bonds, or chains.

Adamantine spar; a variety of corundum, with gray, brown, or greenish shades. This stone is very hard, and of difficult fusion. Dana.

AD-AM'IC, a. Pertaining to Adam. Adamic earth, is the term given to common red clay, so called by means of a mistaken opinion, that Adam means red earth.

AD'AM-ITES, n. pl. In church history, a sect of visionaries, who pretended to establish a state of innocence, and, like Adam, went naked. They abhorred marriage, holding it to be the effect of sin. Several attempts have been made to revive this sect; one as late as the 15th century. Encyc.

AD-AM-IT'IC, a. Like the Adamites. Taylor.

AD-AN-SO'NI-A, n. Ethiopian sour gourd, monkey's bread, or African calabash-tree. It is a genus of one species, called baobab, a native of Africa, and one of the largest of the vegetable kingdom. The stem rises not above twelve or fifteen feet, but is from sixty-five to seventy-eight feet in circumference. The branches shoot horizontally to the length of sixty feet, the ends bending to the ground. The fruit is oblong, pointed at both ends, ten inches in length, and covered with a greenish down, under which is a hard, ligneous rind. It hangs to the tree by a pedicle two feet long, and contains a white, spongy substance. The leaves and bark, dried and powdered, are used by the negroes as pepper on their food, to promote perspiration. The tree is named from M. Adanson, who has given a description of it. Encyc.

AD'A-PIS, n. An animal of the pachydermatous order of mammals, somewhat resembling a hedgehog; now extinct. Buckland.

A-DAPT', v. t. [Sp. adaptar; It. adattare; L. ad and apto, to fit; Gr. απτω.]

To make suitable; to fit, or suit; as, to adapt an instrument to its uses; we have provision adapted to our wants. It is applied to things material or immaterial.

A-DAPT-A-BIL'I-TY, } n. The quality of being A-DAPT'A-BLE-NESS, } capable of adaptation.

AD CAP-TAN'DUM, [L.] To captivate; ad captandum vulgus, to please and attract the populace.

AD-COR'PO-RATE, v. t. To unite one body with another.

ADD, v. t.† [L. addo, from ad and do, to give.]

1. To set or put together, join, or unite; as, one thing or sum to another, in an aggregate; as, add three to four, the sum is seven.

2. To unite in idea or consideration; to subjoin; as to what has been alleged, let this argument be added.

3. To increase number.

Thou shalt add three cities more of refuge. — Deut. xix.

4. To augment.

Rehoboam said, I will add to your yoke. — 1 Kings xii.
Ye shall not add to the word which I command you. — Deut. iv.

As here used, the verb is intransitive, but there may be an ellipsis.

To add to, is used in Scripture, as equivalent to give, or bestow upon. Gen. xxx. Matt. vi. In Gal. ii. the word is understood to signify instruction; "In conference they added nothing to me." In narration, he or they added, is elliptical; he added words, or what follows, or he continued his discourse.

In general, when used of things, add implies a principal thing, to which a smaller is to be annexed, as a part of the whole sum, mass, or number.

AD-DEC'I-MĀTE, v. t. [L. ad and decimus, tenth.] To take, or to ascertain tithes. Dict.

ADD'ED, pp. Joined in place, in sum, in mass or aggregate, in number, in idea, or consideration; united; put together.

AD-DI-BIL'I-TY, n. The possibility of being added. Locke.

AD'DI-BLE, a. [See Add.] That may be added. Locke.

AD'DICE, n. [Obs.] See Adz.

AD-DICT', a. Addicted. [Not much used.]

AD-DICT', v. t. [L. addico, to devote, from ad and dico, to dedicate.]

To apply one's self habitually; to devote time and attention by customary or constant practice. [Sometimes in a good sense.]

They have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints. —1 Cor. xv.

More usually, in a bad sense, to follow customarily, or devote, by habitually practicing that which is ill; as, a man is addicted to intemperance.

To addict one's self to a person — a sense borrowed from the Romans, who used the word for assigning debtors in service to their creditors — is found in Ben Jonson, but is not legitimate in English.

AD-DICT'ED, pp. † Devoted by customary practice.

AD-DICT'ED-NESS, n. The quality or state of being addicted.

AD-DICT'ING, ppr. Devoting time and attention; practicing customarily.

AD-DIC'TION, n. The act of devoting or giving up in practice; the state of being devoted.

His addiction was to courses vain. Shak.

2. Among the Romans, a making over goods to another by sale or legal sentence; also, an assignment of debtors in service to their creditors. Encyc.

ADD'ING, ppr. Joining; putting together; increasing.

AD-DIT'A-MENT, n. [L. additamentum, from additus and ment. See Add.]

An addition, or rather the thing added, as furniture in a house; any material mixed with the principal ingredients in a compound. Ancient anatomists gave the name to an epiphysis, or junction of bones without articulation. [Little used in either sense.]

AD-DI''TION, n. [L. additio, from addo.]

1. The act of adding, opposed to subtraction, or diminution; as, a sum is increased by addition.

2. Any thing added, whether material or immaterial.

3 In arithmetic, the uniting of two or more numbers in one sum; also the rule or branch of arithmetic which treats of adding numbers. Simple addition is the joining of sums of the same denomination, as pounds to pounds, dollars to dollars. Compound addition is the joining of sums of different denominations, as dollars and cents.

4. In law, a title annexed to a man's name, to show his rank, occupation, or place of residence; as, John Doe, Esq.; Richard Roe, Gent.; Robert Dale, Mason; Thomas Way, of New York.

5. In music, a dot at the right side of a note, to lengthen its sound one half.

Turnus addressed his men to single fight. Dryden.
The archangel and the evil spirit addressing themselves for the combat. Addison.

[This sense is, I believe, obsolete or little used.]

2. To direct words or discourse; to apply to by words; as, to address a discourse to an assembly; to address the judges.

3. To direct in writing, as a letter; or to direct and transmit; as, he addressed a letter to the Speaker. Sometimes it is used with the reciprocal pronoun; as, he addressed himself to the Speaker, instead of, he addressed his discourse The phrase is faulty, but less so than the following: To such I would address with this most affectionate petition.

Young Turnus to the beauteous maid addressed. Dryden.

The latter is admissible in poetry, as an elliptical phrase.

4. To present an address, as a letter of thanks or congratulation, a petition, or a testimony of respect; as, the legislature addressed the President.

5. To court or make suit as a lover.

6. In commerce, to consign or intrust to the care of another, as agent or factor; as, the ship was addressed to a merchant in Baltimore.

AD-DRESS', n. A speaking to; verbal application; a formal manner of speech; as, when introduced, the President made a short address.

2. A written or formal application; a message of respect, congratulation, thanks, petition, &c.; as, an address of thanks; an officer is removable upon the address of both houses of assembly.

3. Manner of speaking to another; as, a man of pleasing address.

AD'MI-RAL, n. [In the Latin of the middle ages, amira, amiras, admiralis, an emir; Sp. almirante; Port. id.; It. ammiraglio; Fr. amiral; from Ar. أمر amara, to command, أمير, a commander; Sans. amara; Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam אמר, to speak. The terminating syllable of admiral may be ἅλς, the sea. This word is said to have been introduced into Europe by the Genoese or Venetians, in the 12th or 13th century.]

A marine commander in chief; the commander of a fleet or navy.

1. The lord high admiral, in Great Britain, is an officer who superintends all maritime affairs, and has the government of the navy. He has also jurisdiction over all maritime causes, and commissions the naval officers.

2. The admiral of the fleet, the highest officer under the admiralty. When he embarks on an expedition, the union flag is displayed at the main-top-gallant-mast-head.

3. The vice-admiral, an officer next in rank and command to the admiral, has command of the second squadron. He carries his flag at the fore-top-gallant-mast-head. This name is given also to certain officers who have power to hold courts of vice-admiralty in various parts of the British dominions.

4. The rear admiral, next in rank to the vice-admiral, has command of the third squadron, and carries his flag at the mizzen-top-gallant-mast-head.

5. The commander of any single fleet, or in general any flag officer.

6. The ship which carries the admiral; also the most considerable ship of a fleet of merchantmen, or of fishing vessels. Encyc.

7. In zoology, a species of shell-fish. [See VOLUTA.]

8. A species of butterfly, which lays her eggs on the great stinging nettle, and delights in brambles. Encyc.

AD'MI-RAL-SHIP, n. The office or power of an admiral. [Little used.]

AD'MI-RAL-TY, n. In Great Britain, the office of lord high admiral. This office is discharged by one person, or by a board of commissioners, called lords of the admiralty; formerly seven, but now six in number.

2. The building where the lords of the admiralty transact business.

The admiralty court, or court of admiralty, is the supreme court for the trial of maritime causes, held before the lord high admiral, or lords of the admiralty.

In general, a court of admiralty is a court for the trial of causes arising on the high seas, as prize causes and the like. In the United States, there is no admiralty court, distinct from others; but the district courts, established in the several states by Congress, are invested with admiralty powers.

AD-MI-RĀ'TION, n. Wonder mingled with pleasing emotions, as approbation, esteem, love or veneration; a compound emotion excited by something novel, rare, great, or excellent; applied to persons and their works. It often includes a slight degree of surprise. Thus we view the solar system with admiration.

Very near to admiration is the wish to admire. Anon.

It has been sometimes used in an ill sense, denoting wonder with disapprobation.

Your boldness I with admiration see. Dryden.

When I saw her, I wondered with great admiration. — Rev. xvii.

AD-MIRE', v. t. [L. admiror, ad and miror, to wonder; Sp. and Port. admirar; Fr. admirer; It. ammirare; Fr. mirer, to look, to take aim; Corn. miras, to look, see, or face; Arm. miret, to stop, hold, keep; W. mir, visage; also, fair, comely; and maer, one that looks after, keeps or guards, a mayor, or bailiff; Russ. zamirayu, to be astonished or stupefied; za, a prefix, and mir, peace; miryu, to pacify; zamiriayu, to make peace. The primary sense is to hold, to stop, or strain. Ch. and Syr. דמר; L. demiror. See MOOR and MAR.]

1. To regard with wonder or surprise, mingled with approbation, esteem, reverence, or affection.

When he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and be admired in all them that love him. —2 Thess. i.

This word has been used in an ill sense, but seems now correctly restricted to the sense here given, and implying something great, rare, or excellent, in the object admired.

2. To regard with affection; a familiar term for to love greatly. [It is an error to follow this verb with an infinitive; as, I admire to see a man consistent in his conduct. Ed.]

AD-MĪRE′, v. i. To wonder; to be affected with slight surprise; sometimes with at; as, to admire at his own contrivance. Ray.

To admire at sometimes implies disapprobation.

AD-MĪR′ED, pp. Regarded with wonder, mingled with pleasurable sensations, as esteem, love, or reverence.

AD-MĪR′ER, n. One who admires; one who esteems or loves greatly.

AD-MĪR′ING, ppr. Regarding with wonder united with love or esteem.

AD-MĪR′ING-LY, adv. With admiration; in the manner of an admirer.

AD-MIS-SI-BIL′I-TY, n. The quality of being admissible. Judge Chase.

AD-MIS′SI-BLE, a. [See ADMIT.] That may be admitted, allowed, or conceded; as, the testimony is admissible.

AD-MIS′SI-BLY, adv. So as to be admitted.

AD-MIS′SION, n.† [L. admissio.]

1. The act or practice of admitting; as, the admission of aliens into our country; also, the state of being admitted.

2. Admittance; power or permission to enter; entrance; access; power to approach; as, our laws give to foreigners easy admission to the rights of citizens; the admission of a clerk to a benefice.

3. Allowance; grant of an argument or position not fully proved.

AD-MIT′, v. t. [L. admitto, from ad and mitto, to send; Fr. mettre.]

1. To suffer to enter; to grant entrance, whether into a place, or an office, or into the mind, or consideration; as, to admit a student into college; to admit a serious thought into the mind.

2. To give right of entrance; as, a ticket admits one into a play-house.

3. To allow; to receive as true; as, the argument or fact is admitted.

4. To permit, grant, or allow, or to be capable of; as, the words do not admit of such a construction. In this sense, of may be used after the verb, or omitted.

AD-MIT′TA-BLE, a. That may be admitted or allowed.

AD-MIT′TANCE, n.† The act of admitting; allowance. More usually,

2. Permission to enter; the power or right of entrance; and hence, actual entrance; as, he gained admittance into the church.

3. Concession; admission; allowance; as, the admittance of an argument. [Not used.]

4. Shakspeare uses the word for the custom or prerogative of being admitted; "Sir John, you are a gentleman of excellent breeding, of great admittance;" but the license is unwarrantable.

AD-MIT′TED, pp. Permitted to enter or approach; allowed; granted; conceded.

AD-MIT′TER, n. He that admits.

AD-MIT′TING, ppr. Permitting to enter or approach; allowing; conceding.

AD-MIX′, v. t. To mingle with something else. [See MIX.]

AD-MIX′TION, (ad-mix′chun,) n. [L. admixtio, or admistia, of ad and misceo, to mix. See MIX.]

A mingling of bodies; a union by mixing different substances together. It differs from composition or chemical combination; for admixtion does not alter the nature of the substances mixed, but merely blends them together; whereas in composition, the particles unite by affinity, lose their former properties, and form new compounds, with different properties.

AD-MIX′TURE, n. [from admix.]

The substance mingled with another; sometimes the act of mixture, or the state of being mixed. We say, an admixture of sulphur with alum, or the admixture of different bodies.

AD-MON′ISH, v. t.† [L. admoneo, ad and moneo, to teach, warn, admonish; Fr. admoncter; Norm. amoncster; Sp. amonestar; Port. amoestar, or admoestar; It. ammonire: G. mahnen, ermahnen; D. maanen, to dun, vermaanen, to admonish; Sw. mana, förmana; Dan. mane, formane; Sax. mænan, to mean.]

1. To warn or notify of a fault; to reprove with mildness.

Count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother. —2 Thess. iii.

2. To counsel against wrong practices; to caution or advise.

Admonish one another in psalms and hymns. —Col. iii.

3. To instruct or direct.

Moses was admonished by God, when he was about to make the tabernacle. —Heb. viii.

4. In ecclesiastical affairs, to reprove a member of the church for a fault, either publicly or privately; the first step of church discipline. It is followed by of or against; as, to admonish of a fault committed, or against committing a fault. It has a like use in colleges.

AD-MON′ISH-ED, pp. Reproved; advised; warned; instructed.

AD-MON′ISH-ER, n. One who reproves or counsels.

AD-MON′ISH-ING, ppr. Reproving; warning; counseling; directing.

AD-MON′ISH-MENT, n. Admonition. Shak.

AD-MO-NI′′TION, n. Gentle reproof; counseling against a fault; instruction in duties; caution; direction. Tit. iii. 1 Cor. x. In church discipline, public or private reproof to reclaim an offender; a step preliminary to excommunication.

AD-MO-NI′′TION-ER, n. A dispenser of admonitions. Hooker.

AD-MON′I-TIVE, a. Containing admonition. Barrow.

AD-MON′I-TIVE-LY, adv. By admonition.

A-DON′IC, n. An Adonic verse. Among the Anglo-Saxons, a poetic verse consisting of one long, two short and two long syllables. Henry's Brit. 2, 383.

A-DŌ′NIS, n. In mythology, the favorite of Venus, said to be the son of Cinyras, king of Cyprus. He was fond of hunting, and received a mortal wound from the tusk of a wild boar. Venus lamented his death, and changed him into the flower anemone.

A-DŌ′NIS, n. In botany, bird's eye or pheasant's eye.

A-DŌ′NISTS, n. pl. [Heb. Ch. and Syr. אדון Adon, Lord, a scriptural title of the Supreme Being.]

Among critics, a sect or party who maintain that the Hebrew points ordinarily annexed to the consonants of the word Jehovah, are not the natural points belonging to that word, and that they do not express the true pronunciation of it; but that they are vowel points belonging to the words Adonai and Elohim, applied to the ineffable name Jehovah, which the Jews were forbid to utter, and the true pronunciation of which was lost; they were therefore always to pronounce the word Adonai, instead of Jehovah. Encyc.

A-DOPT′, v. t. [L. adopto, of ad and opto, to desire or choose. See OPTION.]

1. To take a stranger into one's family, as son and heir; to take one who is not a child, and treat him as one, giving him a title to the privileges and rights of a child.

2. In a spiritual sense, to receive the sinful children of men into the invisible church, and into God's favor and protection, by which they become heirs of salvation by Christ. Brown.

3. To take or receive as one's own that which is not naturally so; as, to adopt the opinions of another; or to receive that which is new; as, to adopt a particular mode of husbandry.

4. To select and take; as, which mode will you adopt?

A-DOPT′ED, pp. or a. Taken as one's own; received as son and heir; selected for use.

A-DOPT′ED-LY, adv. In the manner of something adopted.

A-DOPT′ER, n. One who adopts.

2. In chemistry, a large, round receiver, with two necks, diametrically opposite to each other, one of which admits the neck of a retort, and the other is joined to another receiver. It is used in distillations, to give more space to elastic vapors, or to increase the length of the neck of a retort.

A-DOPT′ING, ppr. Taking a stranger as a son; taking as one's own.

A-DŌP′TION, n. [L. adoptio.]

1. The act of adopting, or the state of being adopted; the taking and treating of a stranger as one's own child.

2. The receiving as one's own what is new or not natural.

3. God's taking the sinful children of men into his favor and protection. Eph. iv.

Adoption by arms; an ancient ceremony of presenting arms to one for his merit or valor, which laid the person under an obligation to defend the giver.

Adoption by baptism, is the spiritual affinity which is contracted by god-fathers and god-children, in the ceremony of baptism. It was introduced into the Greek church, and afterward among the ancient Franks. This affinity was supposed to entitle the god-child to a share of the god-father's estate. Encyc.

Adoption by hair, was performed by cutting off the hair of a person and giving it to the adoptive father. Thus Pope John VIII. adopted Boson, king of Arles.

Adoption by matrimony, is the taking of the children of a wife or husband, by a former marriage, into the condition of natural children. This is a practice peculiar to the Germans, but is not so properly adoption as adjiliation. Encyc.

Adoption by testament, is the appointing of a person to be heir, by will, on condition of his taking the name, arms, &c., of the adopter. Encyc.

In Europe, adoption is used for many kinds of admission to a more intimate relation, and is nearly equivalent to reception; as, the admission of persons into hospitals or monasteries, or of one society into another. Encyc.

A-DOP′TION-IST, n. One who maintains that Christ was the son of God by adoption only Mu de Sk.

A-DŌR′A-BLE, a. That ought to be adored; worthy of divine honors. In popular use, worthy of the utmost love or respect.

A-DŌR′A-BLE-NESS, n. The quality of being adorable, or worthy of adoration.

A-DŌR′A-BLY, adv. In a manner worthy of adoration.

AD-O-RĀ′TION, n. The act of paying honors to a divine being; the worship paid to God; the act of addressing as a God. Adoration consists in external homage, accompanied with the highest reverence. It is used for the act of praying, or preferring requests or thanksgiving to the Supreme Being.

2. Homage paid to one in high esteem; profound reverence.

Adoration, among the Jews, was performed by bowing, kneeling, and prostration. Among the Romans, the devotee, with his head covered or vailed, applied his right hand to his lips, bowing and turning himself from left to right. The Persians fell on the face, striking the forehead against the earth, and kissing the ground. The adoration paid to the Grecian and Roman emperors consisted in bowing and kneeling at the feet of the prince, laying hold of his robe, then withdrawing the hand and clapping it to the lips. In modern times, adoration is paid to the pope by kissing his feet, and to princes by kneeling and kissing the hand. This word was used by the Romans for acclamation or great applause, given to public performers; and the election of a pope is sometimes by adoration, that is, by sudden acclamation without scrutiny. Encyc.

A-DŌRE′, v. t. [L. adoro. In Ch. and Heb. הדר, hadar, to honor, reverence, or glorify, to adorn; Heb. אדר, to be magnificent or glorious, to magnify, to glorify. This word is usually referred to the Latin ad orare, to carry to one's mouth; ad and os, oris; as, in order to kiss one's hand, the hand is carried to one's mouth. See Calmet, ad verbum, who cites, in confirmation of this opinion, the ancient practice of kissing the hand. See Job xxxi. 1 Kings xix. Ps. ii. Gen. xli. Ainsworth supposes the word to be a compound of ad and oro, to pray; and if the word is compound, as I suspect, this opinion is most probably correct.]

1. To worship with profound reverence; to address with exalted thoughts, by prayer and thanksgiving; to pay divine honors to; to honor as a god, or as divine. Dryden.

2. To love in the highest degree; to regard with the utmost esteem, affection, and respect; as, the people adore their prince. Tatler.
